If a shareholder, being solvent, should refuse to pay his calls, it may theoretically true that the company would be within its rights in accep a surrender from him. It would, however, be the duty of the company enforce payment of the calls already made, notwithstanding the surren and the acceptance of a surrender from a solvent shareholder on a tacit un standing that he was to be released from his obligation to pay the calls alre made would, in my apprehension, be undistinguishable in principle from a chase of the shares, because it would amount to a surrender by the company a part of the capital which ought to be available for the payment of its de But if the shareholder be insolvent, and if the transaction he entered into good faith, I think it is within the spirit of the exception indicated in the of Trevor v. Whitworth. In the present case there can be no doubt tha Craig was insolvent when he surrendered his shares to the company whi now represented by its liquidator. Mr Craig was a shareholder in the C Glasgow Bank; calls had been made upon him by the liquidator of the which he was unable to meet, and he had in consequence assigned all his perty to the liquidator. It is not to be altogether overlooked that the dire of the General Property Investment Company might have reduced the as ment to the liquidator of the City of Glasgow Bank, or might have applied sequestration of the estates of Mr Craig, which would have had the effe cutting down the assignment, and might in one or other of these ways h recovered a dividend on these calls, less the expense of the proceedings neces to establish their right.

On the other hand, it is fair to remember that the creditors of an insolv when they come to consider an offer of compromise, never have exact informa as to what the insolvent's estate is likely to produce if brought to sale. this reason, and no doubt in many cases out of consideration for the chara and future prospects of a debtor who has been brought to bankruptcy by inn misfortune, creditors are generally willing to consider favourably a fair offe an honest debtor, and I may add that our law of bankruptcy recognises expediency of such voluntary arrangements, and makes provision for carr them into effect.

In the case before us, Mr Craig being unable to pay the calls due to the Gen Property Investment Company, and having, as I have said, conveyed his wh

No. 86.
Jan. 15, 1891.
General Property Investment Co., Limited, and Liquidator v. Craig.

estate to the liquidator of the City of Glasgow Bank, proposed to transfer his shares in the Investment Company to the company by way of surrender. His proposal was accepted, and he executed a gratuitous transfer accordingly. The matter was arranged by correspondence, nothing being said in the letters about liability for past-due calls. It is right to notice that Mr Craig's agent gave evidence to the effect that he understood that the company waived its right to enforce the calls, but so far as I can gather this understanding rested on nothing more than reasonable expectation. Mr Craig had not the means to pay anything personally, and there was no question of cutting down the conveyance to the City of Glasgow Bank. It was therefore not an unreasonable expectation on the part of Mr Craig and his agent that after he had surrendered his shares the company would not press him further for payment of the past-due calls. The case against Mr Craig is thus reduced to this extremely fine point, that this surrender of shares is to be treated as a purchase by the company, either because the company did not expressly reserve its right to sue for arrears, or because the company did not in fact press Mr Craig for payment after accepting the surrender. The company could not get anything out of Mr Craig's estate without making him bankrupt, and I rather think that the argument for the pursuer must be carried this length, that it is the duty of a company in such a case to make its shareholder bankrupt on the chance of recovering a dividend, without any consideration of his conduct, of the value of his estate, or of the effect of such a proceeding on the prospects of their debtor and on the interest of other creditors. The other view is, that the surrender was a fair settlement with an insolvent debtor such as the law will support, and in no true sense a purchase of the company's shares or a giving away of the company's capital. The latter is in my opinion the true character of the transaction, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defender has been released from his obligations to the company by the surrender of his shares, and that he is not liable to contribute to its funds.

LORD ADAM and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred; and the Lord President intimated that LORD KINNEAR, who was absent at the advising, had authorised him to state that he had not seen any reason to change the opinion he had formed in the Outer-House.

THE COURT adhered.

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 87.
Jan. 15, 1891.*
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Robertson—Sol.-Gen. Pearson—Johnston—C. N. Johnston.

THE EARL OF HOME, Defender (Reclaimer).—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

Lease—Long lease—Valuation of buildings at end of lease—Contract—Construction.—A lease of ground with houses thereon for ninety-nine years, inter alia, provided,—"In regard the present houses on the subjects hereby set are in a most ruinous condition, insomuch as to be only proper for a quarry, and as the said" tenant "and his foresaids may during the currency of this lease erect different houses and buildings on these subjects, it is hereby specially agreed upon between the parties that, at the expiry of this tack, the whole houses and buildings then upon the subjects hereby let shall be valued and apprised by two neutral persons, one to be chosen by each party, and, in the case of variance between the said persons, by an oversman to be named by them"; and the land-

* Decided Jan. 12, 1891.

No. 87.

Jan. 15, 1891. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

lord bound himself and his foresaids, at the first term of Whitsunday after t expiry of the lease, to pay to the tenant and his foresaids "the one-half of t sums at which the said houses and buildings shall be so valued and apprised manner above mentioned."

Some years after the date of the lease the tenant sublet a portion of the grou with the houses thereon, to the War Office, and assigned to the subtenant t whole clauses and obligements incumbent on the proprietor under the princi lease. The War Office converted the houses into barracks, and also erect other buildings for the same purpose. At the expiration of the lease the L Advocate, for the War Office, brought an action against the proprietor, concl ing for decree ordaining the defender to nominate a neutral person in terms the principal lease, and to pay one-half the value of the buildings when so as tained. The defender averred that the barracks were not buildings in the se of the lease, and pleaded that, at all events, the Court ought to instruct valuers as to the principle of valuation on which they were to proceed.

The Court ordained the defender to nominate a neutral person in terms of lease, and further found that the neutral persons to be appointed were to as tain to what extent, if any, the value of the lands was enhanced by the exist buildings on the lands.

1st Division. Lord Kincairney. C.

By tack, dated 25th May and 18th June 1791, Archibald Lord Dou let to William Douglas, of Brigton, "and his heirs, assignees, and tenants, All and Whole the park of Dudhope, with the houses and offi thereof, and particularly the materials of the old house of Dudhope, of the other houses on the subjects hereby let," all in the parish Dundee and county of Forfar, and that for ninety-nine years from M tinmas 1790.

The tack, inter alia, provided,—"And further, in regard the pres houses on the subjects hereby set are in a most ruinous condition, in much as to be only proper for a quarry, and as the said William Doug and his foresaids may during the currency of this lease erect differ houses and buildings on these subjects, it is hereby specially agreed u between the parties that, at the expiry of this tack, the whole houses buildings then upon the subjects hereby let shall be valued and appri by two neutral persons, one to be chosen by each party, and, in the of variance between the said persons, by an oversman to be nam them: And the said Archibald Lord Douglas shall be bound and obl as he hereby binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, at the first t of Whitsunday after the expiry of this lease, to content and pay to said William Douglas and his foresaids the one-half of the sums at wh the said houses and buildings shall be so valued and apprised in man above mentioned."

By subtack, dated 10th August and 17th December 1796, betw Douglas of Brigton, of the first part, and the Right Honourable Will Windham, His Majesty's Principal Secretary at War, on behalf of Majesty, of the second part, on the narrative of the above principal t the first party sublet to the second party and his successors in offi portion of the park of Dudhope, amounting to about nineteen acres Sc and comprehending the old house or castle of Dudhope, and the w other houses and buildings on the said portion, and that for the term ninety-four years from Martinmas 1795, being the space then to ru the principal tack; and the first party further assigned the said princi tack to the second party, "with the whole clauses and obligements the contained incumbent on the part of the proprietor," in so far as concer the portion of the subjects thereby sublet.

The subtenancy having expired at Martinmas 1889, the military aut rities removed from the subjects sublet, and the Earl of Home, the s cessor of Archibald Lord Douglas in the lands of Dudhope, having decli

No. 87.
Jan. 15, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

to nominate a valuer to value the houses and buildings upon the lands sublet, in terms of the provision above quoted of the principal tack, the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Secretary of State for War, on 8th March 1890, brought an action against the Earl, concluding for declarator that the defender was bound to pay to the pursuer one-half of the value of the whole houses, as at Martinmas 1889, erected and existing upon the portion of Dudhope Park sublet to Douglas of Brigton; for decree ordaining the defender to appoint a neutral person to value the said houses in terms of the provision of the principal tack; and for decree ordaining the defender to make payment to the pursuer of one-half of the value when so ascertained.

The pursuer, after narrating the lease and sublease, averred;—(Cond. 6) "During the course of their occupation under the said sublease the present Secretary of State for War, and his predecessors in office, have restored and greatly added to the old house or Castle of Dudhope and its pertinents described in the principal tack, and have used the same as military barracks. They have further, on the portion of the ground so sublet to them, from time to time erected other houses and buildings which are of a permanent character and of considerable value. With reference to the averment in the separate statement of facts for the defender, denied that" these houses and buildings "are of a different character from that of the houses and buildings which were contemplated by the said principal tack, and that they are not houses and buildings in the sense of the said tack."

The defender answered;—(Ans. 6) "Admitted that during the course of their occupation under the said sublease the present Secretary of State for War and his predecessors in office have restored and greatly added to the old house or Castle of Dudhope, and have used the same as military barracks. Admitted that they further, on the portion of the ground so sublet to them, from time to time erected other houses and buildings which are of a permanent character. Quoad ultra denied."

The defender in his statement of facts further averred;—(Stat. 3) "The only buildings on the said ground at the date of the said tack in 1791, consisted of the mansion-house of Dudhope, with the buildings and offices thereof, all of which buildings were then in a ruinous condition. The whole of said park, except so far as the said buildings occupied it, was then in grass. It was then a rural subject, lying outside the boundaries of Dundee, but now it has been included within these boundaries, and is largely occupied by streets and ordinary town buildings." (Stat. 4) "The buildings which the pursuer now wishes to be valued consist of the Castle of Dudhope, and of large barracks, guard-house, magazine, and other buildings erected for military purposes, are not useful to the defender, and are of an entirely different character from that of the buildings which were contemplated by the said tack, and they are not houses or buildings in the sense of said tack."

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The defender, as heritable proprietor of the lands of Dudhope Park mentioned in the summons, under the progress of titles set out in the condescendence, being bound to implement the lessor's obligations contained in the said principal lease, decree should be pronounced, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. 2. The defender having failed to nominate and appoint a neutral person to act as his valuator in terms of the lessor's obligation contained in the said principal lease, decree should be pronounced in terms of the remaining conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—3. The defender should be assoilzied in respect . . . (3) the houses and buildings now on the ground in question are not houses and buildings in the sense of the said tack. 4.

No. 87.

Jan. 15, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

The pursuer's material averments being unfounded in fact, the defend should be assoilzied.

On 12th June 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced t interlocutor—(after repelling pleas for the defender not here quoted): "Before further answer, decerns and ordains the defender to nominate a appoint a neutral person to act along with a neutral person to be nor nated and appointed by the pursuer in valuing and apprising the wh houses and buildings upon the subjects specified in the conclusions of t summons, at Martinmas 1889, reserving as to expenses meantime: Gra leave to reclaim." *

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The sound construction of t clause here in question was that only buildings ejusdem generis with th on the ground at the date of the lease fell within the clause. The m generality of the clause was not enough, it was open to constructio At the date of the lease the subjects were agricultural, and it was o buildings appropriate to an agricultural subject that could fairly regarded as within the contemplation of the parties to the lease. At events, barracks could not be held to have been in the contemplation the parties. But admitting that the buildings were within the scope the clause, it was for the Court to settle the principle of valuation bef remitting to valuers;[2] and the sound principle of valuation was that t subjects were to be taken at their marketable value, not the acciden value which they happened to possess for the outgoing tenant,[2] i.e. t subjects here were to be valued not as barracks, but as houses.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was perhaps possible to figure buildi of a character which would not fall within the clause here in questi but it was to be remembered that this was a long lease—for ninety-n years—and it was therefore doubtful whether the parties contempla that any particular class of buildings should be on the ground at the e of so long a period. The subjects were no doubt agricultural at the d of the lease, but looking to their proximity to Dundee they might w have been covered with streets of houses or factories, and such buildi were as different in character from agricultural buildings as were barra Then if the buildings were within the clause the mode of valuation w settled by the contract; it was for the valuers to determine the valu

On 6th November 1890, the Court of consent, and before futher ans remitted to "Alexander Beith Macdonald, Master of Works, Glasgow examine the houses and buildings on the ground in question, and to rep

---

* "OPINION.— . . . But there remains the defender's averment relative plea to the effect that the houses which have been built on the gro are not useful to the defender, and are not of the nature of the buildings refe to in the lease. As to their usefulness to the defender, that may possibly f an element in determining the sum which the defender will have to pay; an do not think that that averment necessitates an allowance of proof. As to averment that the houses are not of the kind contemplated by the lease, I h come, although not without hesitation, to the conclusion that there ought to be a proof about that either. Considering the generality of the langua the lease, and the fact that it was a lease for ninety-nine years, it was nex impossible to imagine that it was understood that the tenant was to be restri to any particular kind of houses; and I consider that far more specific averm on this point would be necessary before a defence of this nature could be regar as relevantly averred. But I think it would not be quite safe at this st absolutely to repel this plea, and it seems better to pronounce the operative p of the interlocutor before answer on this point."

[1] Scott v. Edmond, June 25, 1850, 12 D. 1070, 22 Scot. Jur. 473.

[2] Frier v. Earl of Haddington, Nov. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 118, 44 Scot. Jur

No. 87.
Jan. 15, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

quam primum on the character and condition of the same, and how far they are and can be made available for ordinary occupation to the Earl of Home, as proprietor of Dudhope Park, having regard to the circumstances of the neighbourhood, including those of the remainder of Dudhope Park."

On 1st December the reporter reported in substance that in his opinion the buildings were in a state of more or less considerable disrepair, that in their present state they were not available for ordinary occupation, and that they were not by any reasonable expenditure capable of being made available for such occupation.

The parties were thereafter farther heard.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only difficulty in construing this old tack of 1791 is the impossibility, one may call it, I think, of placing ourselves exactly in the position in which the parties stood when they entered into that contract. But there are some things that are expressed or very clearly implied in the clause of the tack which guide us at least so far. The subject conveyed in the tack is the "park of Dudhope, with the houses and offices thereof, and particularly the materials of the old house of Dudhope, and of the other houses on the subjects hereby let." Now, that seems to imply, if it stood alone, that it is rather the materials of the houses than the houses themselves that were then upon the ground. But this is made a great deal more clear in a subsequent clause of the tack, which says,—"In regard the present houses on the subjects hereby set are in a most ruinous condition, insomuch as to be only proper for a quarry"—shewing that the houses at the time, if they had any value at all, were valuable only as materials that might be used in the construction of other houses. That is one point that comes out very clearly. And another appears to me to be this, that it was contemplated—and indeed could not but be contemplated—that other houses might be erected on the land during the currency of the tack, and accordingly the parties express themselves thus—"As the said William Douglas and his foresaids may, during the currency of this lease, erect different houses and buildings on these subjects, it is hereby specially agreed upon between the parties that at the expiry of this tack the whole houses and buildings then upon the subjects hereby let shall be valued and appraised." Now, that shews again that the houses which the parties foresaw might be upon the lands at the expiry of the tack might be either houses substantially in the same dilapidated condition as those which were at the beginning of the lease, or they might be houses of a different description, or at all events there might be other houses in a very different condition from those that were on the lands at the commencement of the tack.

Now, these things being clear, I think the rest of the tack can be very easily construed. The conclusion is that the whole houses and buildings upon the subjects at the expiry shall be valued and appraised by two neutral persons, one to be chosen by each party, and in case of variance between these parties, by an oversman to be named by them, and then there is a conclusion for payment of the amount. Now, the suggestion which I have already made leads me to this further inference—that it is quite possible that at the expiry of the tack there may be no houses of any value on the land at all—that is to say, the subject may be at the expiry of the tack very much in the same condition as it was at its commencement—and in that case there would be nothing to value, or at least the value would be nil. It appears to me therefore that all of the must be kept open in any reference that is to be made to the persons who a to be appointed to value and appraise, and I think in that respect probably th interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is a little defective, because I think the onl value which the lessee is entitled to get from the lessor at the expiry of th tack is the advantage which the lands have gained by the existence of buildin upon the lands at the expiry of the tack, or in other words, what the less has got to pay is any enhanced value of the lands by reason of there bei existing buildings on the lands at the expiry of the lease.

No. 87.

Jan. 15, 1891.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

It therefore appears to me that before making any remit to valuers or a praisers it would be desirable to define what is the duty of those parties, what is the valuation or appraisement which they are to make under this clau of the contract, and that will be done probably most fittingly by a finding the effect that the neutral persons who are to appraise and value are to take in account only the enhanced value of the lands by reason of the existence of th houses at the expiry of the tack, and of course the extent of the enhancem will depend entirely on the value of the houses built on the land. Wha should therefore propose to your Lordships is that we should make a find to that effect, and quoad ultra adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

It might have been more conducive to despatch if the Lord Ordinary h made an appointment upon each party to appoint a valuator, but as I suppo the pursuer, the lessee, is anxious to get on, we may take it for granted tha would not interpose any delay in the way of constituting this valuing tribu if he gets decree against the lessor to appoint a man on his side.

Lord Adam.—I concur with your Lordship. What the predecessor of respondent undertook to do was to agree that the whole houses and buildi then upon the subjects thereby let—"then" being at the expiry of the tack should be valued and appraised by two neutral persons, and then he binds a obliges himself to content and pay one-half of the sum at which the houses buildings should be so valued. That is quite clear. But I agree with y Lordship that the expression "whole houses and buildings" on the subjects must be subject to some construction. It was suggested in the course of discussion, for example, that supposing a monument had been built on subject, a building of that character could not possibly be within the c templation of parties to this tack as being houses or buildings of that k which the defender was bound to pay for. I think that would be so, and think, as your Lordship has put it, that the true test is, whether there houses or buildings of that class or character which go to increase and enha the value of the subjects there. I think that is really what the parties inten by the clause, and therefore I agree with your Lordship that we should h a finding to that effect, and then do as the Lord Ordinary has done as regar the appointment of valuers.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordships, and have v little to add. I understand it to be the wish of both parties that the C should construe this contract so far as it stands in need of construction. T question is, what is the legal effect of the clause under which Lord Douglas, predecessor of the defender, agreed that the buildings to be erected upon land should be valued at the expiration of the term of ninety-nine years, a

No. 87.

Jan. 15, 1891. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Home.

that the proprietor should then pay one-half of the appraised value. Now, the word "value" may have different meanings, like many other words in common use, according as it is used in pure literature, or in a business communication, or in conversation. But I think that "value" when it occurs in a contract has a perfectly definite and known meaning unless there be something in the contract itself to suggest a meaning different from the ordinary meaning. It means exchangeable value—the price which the subject will bring when exposed to the test of competition. In the remit which the parties are to make, I apprehend it will be the duty of the neutral persons to ascertain the value in this sense, and the only way in which the exchangeable value of the buildings can be found is by taking the difference of the price of the land with the buildings upon it and the price of the land if these buildings had never been put up or are supposed to be non-existent. Now, if that test be applied, all the difficulties which have been suggested arising out of the character of the buildings disappear, because if buildings have been put on the land which are of no use to anyone but the tenant who erected them they do not represent any exchangeable value, and nothing would be allowed for them. These buildings are of a peculiar character, for they were put up for the purposes of a military station. The report we have obtained rather indicates that they have no commercial value, or very little indeed, because the cost of adapting them to civil purposes would be disproportionate to any benefit which could be obtained from them. That, however, is a matter for the valuers. I agree with your Lordships that all we have to do at present is to make a finding, and to appoint the defender to name a neutral person to act as a valuer, reserving the disposal of the second conclusion in case it should be necessary for the parties to come here to obtain decree for payment.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Refuse the reclaiming note, and further find that the neutral persons to be appointed in terms of the lease are to ascertain to what extent, if any, the value of the lands of Dudhope Park is enhanced by the existing buildings now on the land, reserving the question of expenses, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to dispose of the expenses incurred in the Inner-House as part of the expenses of the case."

DONALD BEITH, W.S.—ROBERT STRATHERN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 88.

Jan. 15, 1891. Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone.

PATERSON BROTHERS, Complainers (Respondents).—M'Kechnie—Watt.
ANDREW A. GLADSTONE, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Law.

Partnership—Liability—Firm signature—Bill of exchange.—A partner in a firm of builders, who by the contract of copartnery was precluded from signing bills, adhibited the firm name to certain promissory-notes in favour of a money-lender, with whom he discounted them at the rate of 40 per cent per annum. The notes were not granted in the course of the firm's business, and the proceeds were applied to the partner's own use. The firm, having been charged upon the notes, brought a suspension.

Held that the loss occasioned by the fraudulent granting of the notes must fall upon the money-lender, who discounted them in suspicious circumstances without inquiry, and not upon the partners of the firm, as they were ignorant of the transaction, and as the transaction was not in the course of the firm's business or for its behoof.

No. 88.

Jan. 15, 1891.
Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone.

1st Division.
Lord Kincairney.
M.

THE firm of Paterson Brothers, builders and joiners in Edinburgh, consisted of three partners, Robert, William, and John Paterson. The contract of copartnery provided that William should take the whole charge of the financial transactions of the copartnery, and alone sign the company name to bonds and bills.

The firm and William and John, two of the partners, brought a suspension of a threatened charge on four promissory-notes for £63, 10s. in all, dated in October and November 1889, and bearing to be granted by Robert Paterson, Paterson Brothers, Margaret Hope, and R. M. Ramage in favour of Mr A. A. Gladstone, a money-lender in Edinburgh. The stated that the signature of the firm's name was unauthorised, and that the bills did not relate to any transaction of the firm, or in the line of the firm's business, and pleaded;—(1) The complainers not being liable in payment of the said promissory-notes, or any of them, the threatened proceedings should be suspended as craved. (2) The signature of "Paterson Brothers" to the said notes having been unauthorised, and these not being related to any transaction of Messrs Paterson Brothers, or in the line of their trade, the respondent is not entitled to enforce the same against the complainers. (3) The said notes having been granted to respondent for private purposes, or in connection with private debts or advances, in which, as respondent knew, or ought to have known, the firm of Paterson Brothers had no concern, suspension and interdict should be granted, with expenses.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The sums specified in the said promissory-notes having been advanced by the respondent on the faith of the signature of the name of the complainers' firm, and the signature being equivalent to the signature of the names of all the partners of the firm, including the individual complainers, the reasons of suspension should be repelled. (5) The said sums having been advanced by the respondent to the said Robert Paterson without any knowledge on his part of the said Robert Paterson's contract with his copartners, and being in the belief of the respondent applied for purposes within the line of the firm's business, or at least not manifestly without that line, the reasons of suspension should be repelled.

It was proved that in all the notes Robert Paterson had adhibited the firm name without the knowledge or authority of the other partners, and not in the course of the firm's business; that he kept the contents, minus a discount charge at the rate of 40 per cent per annum retained by the respondent, and that the firm got no benefit by them. The further import of the proof sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 13th June 1890, suspended the proceedings complained of, &c.*

---

* "Opinion.— . . . In point of fact, the notes were not signed in the course of the business of the company, or for its behoof. But, although that so, there is no doubt that, unless the settled law on this point has been alte by the 24th section of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882, to which counsel the complainers has referred, no member of the public dealing with a part of a firm can be bound or affected by any private stipulation in the contract copartnery; and I think that prima facie a partner in a firm in trade will the firm by bills granted in the ordinary course of business, whatever the provisions of the contract of copartnery may be.

"I think that this rule of law applies to builders in the position of Paterson Brothers; and I therefore think that they would be liable on bills granted their name, in the ordinary course of business, by Robert Paterson, although

No. 88.

Jan. 15, 1891.

Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The advances in question were made in the ordinary course of business. At least it was represented to signing of such bills was without any true authority, and in breach of the contract of copartnery. On the other hand, I think that they would not be liable for bills granted out of the ordinary course of business, nor if the person in whose favour these bills were granted knew, or ought to have known, or suspected, that the bills were granted without the authority of the firm. . . . . It has been pointed out that the respondent was aware that there were other partners of the firm, and that, from the first letter he had from Robert Paterson, he must have known that the firm kept a bank account; and that that letter suggested that the firm had no difficulties with their bankers. Various suspicious circumstances have also been brought out in evidence; such as the fact that many of the respondent's letters were addressed, and many, if not the whole of them, were sent, not to the place of business of the firm, but to Robert Paterson's private residence. It is further said to be suspicious that the respondent got the names of parties to the notes who were connected with Robert Paterson, and in no way related to the firm, and that he bolstered up his security by policies of insurance. . . . . But I take the case on the footing that the respondent did not know, or suspect, the true state of the facts. Thus taking the case, it comes to this, that Robert Paterson cheated both the complainers and the respondent, and the question is,—On which of the two is the loss to fall? In several cases in which that question has arisen, it has been solved by throwing the loss on the party who put the instrument of fraud in the hands of the party defrauding, and so enabled him to defraud. But there is nothing of that kind, I think, in this case. There was, in fact, no instrument of fraud at all in the hands of Robert Paterson. He could not have used the contract of copartnery for that purpose, for it would have, at once, disclosed his want of power. I think that, in this case, the loss should fall on the party whose negligence, or rashness, or supineness, made the fraud possible; and I see no negligence or rashness on the part of Paterson Brothers, but a great deal on the part of the respondent, in failing to make due inquiries.

"Further, the loss has fallen on the respondent, and I see no good reason for shifting it to the complainers.

"Perhaps it may be a simpler ground of judgment to say that, while the complainers might have been liable for bills or notes signed by their partner in the ordinary course of trade, they are not liable for bills which are not in the ordinary course of trade. And I am of opinion that, having in view what has been proved as to the character of the business of Paterson Brothers, and their financial position, bills at 40 per cent discount were not bills in the ordinary course of business. They may have been ordinary enough in the respondent's business, but there is no proof that such bills were in the ordinary course of the complainers' business, or of such a business as they carried on. When the partner of a firm of some years' standing, and in sound public repute, comes to a money-lender to borrow money at 40 per cent, I think that the money-lender is put on his inquiry, and if he advances money at that rate he does it at his own risk and peril.

"With regard to the Bills of Exchange Act it is not necessary that I should say much. The respondent appealed to section 23, which is to the effect that the signature of the name of a firm is equivalent to the signature by the person so signing of the names of the persons liable as partners in that firm. As to that provision, I shall only say that, whatever it means, it cannot possibly mean that a totally unauthorised subscription of the name of a firm can bind the partners of the firm. It must assume the authority of the person signing.

"Section 24 was pleaded by the complainers, and it was maintained that, in respect of its provisions, the unauthorised signature of their firm could not bind them, unless they were barred from proving the want of authority. I was informed that there has been, as yet, no decision on the import and effect of this clause. But as, apart altogether from the import of the clause, my decision is in favour of the complainers, it is not necessary that I should express any

No. 88.
Jan. 15, 1891.
Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone.

the respondent that the complainers' business was a speculative one and required frequent pecuniary advances in order to pay wages. It was true that William Paterson alone had charge of the financial transactions of the firm, but there was no special exclusion of Robert's authority. The reclaimer was not bound to inquire, and had not the means of inquiring into the special circumstances of Robert's position and powers.[1] By the terms of the 24th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the complainers were not therefore entitled to plead "want of authority," and it was only in the event of their being in a position to state that plea that the firm's signature would be inoperative.

The complainers were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a suspension of a charge on certain promissory notes bearing to be granted by the firm of Paterson Brothers, the ground of suspension being that although the promissory-notes bear the firm's name the signature was adhibited without authority. Prima facie that is a very good answer to the charge, but there is a further question whether the firm may not be precluded by the circumstances of the case from pleading such a defence. There are many implied obligations in the law of partnership, one of which—and it is well known—is that the firm will be liable for all drafts made by any of the partners in the course of the business of the firm. But in the present case the circumstances are so remarkable that I am almost driven to wonder that Mr Law should have found so much to say in support of his reclaiming note.

The firm of Paterson Brothers appear to be engaged in a very respectable business, not only as contractors, but also as speculative builders who erect houses upon ground which they have feued. That is a perfectly legitimate branch of trade, and if the so-called speculative builders have capital to carry on that trade, I do not see why the name "speculative builders" should imply anything against the credit of the firm. There is nothing really against the credit. It is said that their balances fell low from time to time, and it is no wonderful that they should, because there must have been a constant drain upon their funds in providing materials for the erection of the houses. But this matter is not of any importance as tending to throw discredit upon the nature of the business they were engaged in conducting.

Robert Paterson, one of the partners of the firm, was expressly excluded from signing the firm's name for pecuniary obligations, and accordingly when he signed the name of the firm to these bills he committed a fraud upon his partners, because he did not use the proceeds for the purposes of their trade, but for his own private purposes. Mr Gladstone's position is that he met Robert Paterson in the ordinary course of business, and without any inquiry as to Paterson's position, or the authority he had to append the firm's name to the bills, he advanced money upon them, retaining discount at the rate of 40 per cent per annum. The circumstances were such as to create a suspicion against the conduct of Robert Paterson. In a letter dated 28th October 1887, the first which appears in the correspondence between the parties, Robert Paterson wrote to Gladstone enclosing a bill drawn by himself upon R. Ramage for £15, which he asked Gladstone to discount. He says in this letter,—"I would not have opinion on the question whether this clause operates any change on previous existing law as to the right of the public to rely on the signature of the name of a firm by one of its partners."

[1] Authority cited.—Shitta v. Montaignac, July 1890, L. R. 15 App. Ca. 357.

troubled you but I cannot do without the money myself. . . . Of course this is strictly confidential between you and I." But when he comes back to Mr Gladstone to transact with him it is ostensibly not upon his own account, but for the firm, and it is then, I apprehend, that the money-lender begins to be in fault, for he must have had suspicions aroused that things were not all right when a firm of builders in good repute required to borrow at 40 per cent. He must have known that the strain would be such as very shortly to bring any ordinary business to an end, and that it was not a likely thing that a firm in good repute would find it necessary to resort to him for such a purpose. It was quite in Mr Gladstone's power to ascertain whether Robert Paterson was dealing fairly by him and with his copartners, and whether his action was authorised by the firm. But he abstains from inquiry of any kind, and is satisfied to take his 40 per cent and incur all risks.

No. 88.
Jan. 15, 1891.
Paterson Brothers v. Gladstone.

The question then comes to be, who is in fault? A fraud, and a very bad fraud, has been committed, but if it could have been shewn that the firm of Paterson Brothers had derived benefit from it they would have been liable, or if it could have been shewn that the firm had enabled Robert Paterson to commit the fraud, even although there had been no benefit to the firm, the law would also probably have held them liable. But they knew nothing about Robert Paterson's doings. In short, Paterson Brothers were perfectly faultless in the circumstances, and I do not see by what precautions they could have saved themselves. When their position is contrasted with that of Mr Gladstone, the case seems a very clear one. He had the means of finding out the true nature of the transaction, and if he had moved even his finger, no harm would have been done. Accordingly, upon him alone the loss must fall, because if one of two innocent parties is not in fault, and the other is grossly negligent, the latter must suffer as being the party who made the fraud possible.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MARTIN & M'GLASHAN, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT THOMAS NAPIER SPEIR, Objector and Respondent.—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.
LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY, Respondent and Reclaimer.—Asher—Dundas.

No. 89.
Jan. 16, 1891.
Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

Teinds—Subvaluation—Summons of approbation—Decreet—Ambiguity—Construction—Prescription.—In a report in 1629 of a valuation by subcommissioners of lands and teinds in a parish, the lands of P. were reported to be of the value of forty bolls victual. In a note appended to the report, the lands of D. were declared to be "nocht valued becaus yai ar sett decimis inclusis."

In 1797 an action of approbation and valuation was brought by A and B. The extract-decreet in the action set forth that the action was brought by A as proprietor of the lands of P., and by B as "infeft" in part of the lands of D., "with pertinents . . . and which lands of D. were formerly part of the said lands of P."; that the report of the subcommissioners of 1629 had valued the lands of P.; that therefore that report ought to be approved "in so far as concerns the valuation of the pursuers' lands before specified"; that the pursuers appeared by their procurators, who produced the report of the subcommissioners, "and particularly the valuation of the pursuers' lands libelled, and appearance was made for the Officers of State"; that the Lords thereupon ratified, allowed, and

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

approved the said report, in so far as concerned the "valuation of the pursuers lands libelled" and interponed their decreet and authority thereto, and found and declared in terms thereof that the yearly avail of the stock and teind of the lands of P. were and should be in all time coming forty bolls victual, and decerned "conform to conclusions of the libel."

More than forty years after the date of the decree the proprietor of the part of D. which belonged to B objected to be localled on for augmentation of stipend maintaining that his part of D. had been valued under the above decree. Another proprietor lodged answers in which he maintained (1) that the decree of approbation, when fairly construed along with the report, which it expressly approved, did not value the lands of D.; or otherwise (2) that there was a latent ambiguity in the decree, which fell to be explained by documentary evidence.

Held (1) that the decree valued the part of the lands of D. which belonged to B as having formed part of the lands of P. at the date of the subvaluation; and (2) that the objections stated to it were extrinsic objections which could not be maintained after the lapse of forty years.

Teinds—Procedure in locality—Res judicata.—An augmentation of stipend having been granted and modified a process of locality followed in which in 1850 an interim scheme was approved. To this scheme the Lord Advocate, as having right on behalf of the Crown to the bishops' teinds, lodged objections in which he stated that the teinds of the lands of D. and certain other lands in the parish, the teinds of which were held on heritable rights, were unvalued. He objected to the scheme in so far as it laid no portion of the augmentation upon the teinds of these lands. The common agent lodged a note in which he admitted that the teinds of certain of the lands in question, including the lands of D., were unvalued, and stated what he believed to be the rental. In 1858 the Lord Advocate lodged a note stating that he was satisfied with the extent to which the common agent had given effect to the objections as regarded the rents stated for the lands which were let unvalued including the lands of D., and he craved the Lord Ordinary to sustain the objections, and to remit to the clerk to rectify the locality, and to allocate the augmentation primo loco on the teinds of these lands. By interlocutor of 3d June 1858, the Lord Ordinary allowed the note to be received and seen, and by interlocutor of 9th July he remitted to the clerk to rectify the locality and report. This interlocutor was not reclaimed against. The clerk reported a rectified scheme, but it was never approved final, and no further proceedings took place in the locality until after a new augmentation was granted in 1885.

In 1890 the question was raised whether the teinds of the lands of D. were valued or unvalued. The party alleging that the teinds were not valued pleaded res judicata in respect of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 9th July 1858.

Held that the interlocutor of 9th July 1858 did not support the plea.

1st Division. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

In 1869 the minister of the parish of Muthill raised a process of augmentation, modification, and locality, and obtained an augmentation of three chalders. By the rectified interim scheme of locality of the stipend of the parish, dated in April 1873, the augmentation was localled on, inter alia, the teinds of the lands of half of Wester Drummawhance and three-quarters of Easter Drummawhance, both belonging to Mr Speir of Culdees, and of certain other lands belonging to Lord Willoughby de Eresby. The other teinds in the parish either were bishops' teinds or were valued and exhausted.

Mr Speir objected to the above allocation of the stipend on the ground inter alia, that the teinds of the one-half of Wester Drummawhance and of the three-quarters of Easter Drummawhance were valued and exhausted. He founded upon a decreet of approbation and valuation dated 5th July 1797, of which he produced an extract.

This extract-decreet of approbation and valuation narrated a summons of approbation and valuation at the instance of James Drummond of Perth, and Anthony Murray, of Crieff, against the Officers of State

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891.
Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

patrons of the parish of Muthill, and titulars of the teinds thereof, and the minister of the parish, "the which summons maketh mention that the pursuer, the said James Drummond, of Perth, stands heritably infeft and seised in All and Whole the lands of Pitzalton now called Pitkellony, Over and Nether, ... lying within the parish of Muthill and sheriffdom of Perth, conform to instrument of sasine in favour of the said James Drummond, dated the 31st day of January 1786, and registered in the Particular Register of Sasines for the shire of Perth the 20th day of February thereafter: That the other pursuer, the said Anthony Murray, stands heritably infeft and seised in All and Whole the just and equal half of the town and lands of Wester Drummawhance, with . . . . pertinents thereof, lying within the parish of Muthill and sheriffdom of Perth, and likewise All and Whole these parts and portions of the lands of Easter Drumachance which belonged to the deceased Mungo Graeme, of Gorthy, with the teinds thereof included, with . . . . whole pertinents thereof, lying within the said parish of Muthill and sheriffdom of Perth, conform to instrument of sasine in favour of the said Anthony Murray, dated the 12th day of May 1791, and registered in the Particular Register of Sasines for Perthshire the 5th day of July thereafter, and which lands of Easter and Wester Drummawhance were formerly a part of the said lands of Pitkellony; . . . and true it was that the Subcommissioners appointed for valuing the stock and teind of the lands within the presbytery of Muthill, now Auchterarder, by their report, dated the 20th day of October 1629, found and declared 'the lands of Pitkellonie, Over and Nether, pertaining to James Drummond of Pitkellonie, pays stock and teind fourtie bolls victual,' as the principal report of the Subcommissioners in the hands of the clerk of the High Commission will testify: Therefore the report of the Subcommissioners above recited ought and should be ratified, allowed, and approven by the said Lords Commissioners aforesaid, in so far as concerns the valuation of the pursuers' lands before specified, and their decreet and authority should be interponed thereto, and in terms thereof it ought and should be found and declared that the stock and teind of the pursuers' said lands shall be now and in all time coming the particular quantity of victual before specified and contained in the said report, conform to the laws and daily practice of Scotland used and observed in like cases in all points. . . ." The extract-decreet further set forth that the summons "being called, and the said pursuers compearing by Mr William Ereskine, advocate, their procurator, who, for instructing their active title and right to pursue the foresaid action and cause, produced in presence of the said Lords the instruments of sasine libelled on, of the dates, tenor, and contents above mentioned; and, for verifying the points and articles of the libel, produced a book or record containing the principal report of the Subcommissioners of Muthill, and particularly the valuation of the pursuers' lands libelled, of the date, tenor, and contents above mentioned, as the said writes in themselves more fully bear: And the Officer of State compearing by Mr Andrew Balfour, advocate, His Majesty's Solicitor for the late bishops' tythes, their procurator, and the other defenders being lawfully summoned to this action, . . . and not compearing. The foresaid summons and writes produced, with the desire of the pursuers' procurator after mentioned, being all at length read, heard, seen, and considered by the said Lords, and they therewith being well and ripely advised, the Lords of Council and Session, Commissioners aforesaid, have ratified, allowed, and approved, and hereby ratify, allow, and approve, the report of the Subcommissioners of the presbytery of Muthill in so far as concerns the valuation of the pursuers' lands libeled, and have interponed,

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

and hereby interpone, their decreet and authority thereto, and in terms thereof have found and declared, and hereby find and declare, the just worth and constant yearly avail of the stock and teind of the lands of Pitkellonie, Over and Nether, with the pertinents, lying in manner libeled to be now and in all time coming 40 bolls victual, which quantitys of victual above mentioned the said Lords decern and ordain to stand, continue, and endure, and to be repute and holden the just worth and constant yearly avail of the stock and teind of the said lands above mentioned in all time coming; . . . which desire of the pursuers' procurator above mentioned, with the libel and report of the Subcommissioners of the presbytery of Muthill, being upon the day and date of these presents heard read, seen, and considered by the said Lords, and they therewith, and with the haill steps and procedure of this proces, being well and ripely advised, ratified, allowed, and approved the said report in so far as concerned the valuation of the pursuers' lands libeled, and interponed their decreet and authority thereto, and decerned, conform to the conclusions of the libel; and so the said Lords gave their decreet in the said matter in manner at length above mentioned."

Lord Willoughby de Eresby lodged answers to Mr Speir's objections, in which he denied that the teinds of the lands of Drummawhance had been valued, and founded upon the report of the Subcommissioners, which bore to be approved of by the decreet of approbation, and maintained that the lands in question were expressly excepted from the valuation.

The report of the Subcommissioners declared, inter alia, that "Pitcellonie ower and nethir perteining to James Drūmond of Pitzellonie payis stok and teind fourtie bollis victuall. . . . Nota.—Landis in this parochin of Muthill nocht valued becaus yai ar sett decimis inclusis viz Banibeg . . . Thrie Drūmaquhensis Warde of Muthill."

The objector further maintained that it had already been judicially decided by an interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie (Ordinary), of date 9th July 1858, that the teinds of the lands in question were not valued.

The facts bearing upon this latter question were as follows:—

In March 1849 an augmentation of the stipend of the minister of the parish of Muthill was granted and modified, and in the process of locality following thereon an interim scheme was, in March 1850, approved of. By that scheme the teinds of the parish were divided into teinds exhausted, teinds held on heritable right, and bishops' teinds, and by the same scheme the whole of the augmentation was laid upon the teinds of the lands of Braco and Middle Drummawhance (one of the three Drummawhances about which there was no question in the present case) as being held in heritable right, and no part was laid upon bishops' teinds.

In June 1850 the Lord Advocate, having on the part of the Crown right to the bishops' teinds, lodged objections to the interim scheme. He stated that certain lands in the parish, including the half of Wester Drummawhance and three-fourths of Easter Drummawhance, were described in the report of the Subcommissioners in 1629 as "nocht valued, becaus they are set cum decimis inclusis." He further stated that he could not "discover from the present locality who is now proprietor of the half of Wester Drummawhance and three-fourths of Easter Drummawhance, but the common agent can, of course, ascertain. Sir William Stirling, of Ardoch, appears to have been the proprietor in 1670. . . . . The objector therefore objects to the said interim locality in so far as it lays no portion of the present augmentation upon the teinds of the lands above mentioned, and protests against any portion of the present or any future augmentation being laid upon the bishops' teinds until the teinds of the whole of these lands are allocated upon and exhausted."

No. 89.
Jan. 16, 1891.
Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

In July 1851 the common agent lodged answers to these objections, in which he stated, with regard to the lands of Drumaquhance, that he had not yet had "an opportunity of making an investigation into the ancient titles of the Ardoch family, who are said to have been the proprietors of the half of the lands of Wester Drumaquhance and of three-quarters of Easter Drumaquhance so far back as 1670, but he expects to have this accomplished during the ensuing vacation by tracing the lands thro' the titles down to the present time."

In January 1854 the common agent lodged a note, in which he gave the result of his investigations. The note concluded thus:—"The common agent, contrasting the several lands of Drumawhance which appear to be unvalued for teind with the proportion valued for teind, must hold that the real rent of the lands Drumawhance, in so far as unvalued for teind, cannot be taken at a less sum than £750, one-fifth of which will be appropriated for teind. At the same time, if the proprietor of Culdees and Drumawhance can bring evidence to shew that the rental is overstated, it will be remedied in preparing for a final locality."

In November 1856 a rectified scheme of locality was prepared, in which a portion of the augmentation was allocated upon a portion of the bishops' teinds belonging to the Crown.

In December 1856 the Lord Advocate lodged objections to the rectified scheme, in which he referred to the objections formerly lodged by him to the interim locality, which objections were made upon the ground that it omitted certain lands to the teinds of which heritors had right, and did not lay any portion of the augmentation upon the teinds of these lands. The objector pointed out that the common agent had, in the note subsequently lodged by him, given effect to these objections so far as concerned some of the lands in question, and among these the Drummawhances. He therefore objected to the rectified scheme in so far as a portion of the augmentation was allocated upon the bishops' teinds belonging to the Crown instead of upon the teinds of the lands mentioned, which were held under heritable rights, and among them the Drummawhances; and he protested against any portion of the augmentation being laid upon the bishops' teinds until the whole teinds held upon heritable rights were exhausted. The objector further craved that effect might be given to his former as well as to his present objections, that the same might be sustained, and the interim and rectified schemes objected to be rectified accordingly.

On 21st May 1858 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) sustained the objections for the Lord Advocate, and remitted to the clerk to rectify the locality. On 4th June following the Lord Ordinary of consent recalled the interlocutor of 21st May, and appointed the objections for the Lord Advocate and for the common agent to be revised respectively.

In June 1858 the Lord Advocate lodged a note, in which he stated that he "is satisfied that a revisal is quite unnecessary, as he is content, so far as regards the present locality, to rest satisfied with the extent to which the common agent, in said answers and note, has given effect to his objections, both as regards the lands the teinds of which are held upon heritable right, and as regards the rents which he states for these lands which are yet unvalued." He then set forth the lands as to which his objections had been given effect to, among which were included the half of Wester Drummawhance and three-quarters of Easter Drummawhance at a rent of £400, and he craved the Court to "sustain the objections to the interim schemes, in so far as they lay no portion of the present augmentation on the above lands, and remit to the clerk to rectify the same,

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891.
Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

and to allocate the present augmentation primo loco on the teinds of th said lands."

On 25th June 1858 the Lord Ordinary allowed the note for the Lor Advocate to be received and seen, and, on 9th July, pronounced the inte locutor particularly founded upon by Lord Willoughby de Eresby, b which he remitted to the clerk to rectify the locality and to report. N reclaiming note was lodged against this interlocutor.

Thereafter the clerk prepared a rectified locality, but it was nev approved of as final, and apparently was never acted upon. No furth proceedings took place in the case until after the new augmentation i 1873.

The objector pleaded;—(1) The teinds of the said half of Wester Drum mawhance and three-fourths of Easter Drummawhance having be valued by said decreet of valuation and approbation of 5th July 179 and having been exhausted by payment of old stipend, the said locali should be rectified accordingly.

Lord Willoughby de Eresby pleaded;—(1) Res judicata, in respect the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary. (3) The objections shou be repelled, so far as regards the half of the lands of Wester Drum whance and three-quarters of Easter Drummawhance before mentio in respect that no part of the lands of Drummawhance is included in th subvaluation of 1629 or in the decree of approbation of 1797.

The record having been closed on the objections by Mr Speir and t answers by Lord Willoughby de Eresby, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllach on 19th June 1890, pronounced an interlocutor finding "that the lands one-half of Wester Drummawhance and the parts and portions of East Drummawhance, which belonged to Mr Graeme, of Gorthy, are includ in the valuation of the lands of Pitkellony, dated 20th October 1629, a approved 5th July 1797," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—The main question raised under this record, which has b made up between Mr Speir, of Culdees, and Lord Willoughby de Eresby, whether certain lands belonging to the former, and being one-half of the la of Wester Drummawhance and three-fourths of the lands of Easter Drum whance, are to be held as having been valued as part of the lands of Pitkel by subvaluation, dated 20th October 1629, and decree of approbation the dated 5th July 1797.

"The lands in question, it may be explained, were treated as valued do to the institution of the present locality in 1846, and thereafter down t preparation of the rectified scheme, No. 112 of process, in October 1860. have they been treated as unvalued in any scheme approved interim or i prior to the interim locality now objected to, which was approved interim 1870, and has since then formed the rule of payment of stipend.

"Mr Speir (the objector) maintains that the decree of approbation expre applies the subvaluation to the lands in dispute, identifying them as part of lands of Pitkellony, of which the stock and teinds were valued by the Subs missioners at forty bolls victual. At least he maintains that this identifica will be complete on his proving—as he says he is prepared to prove—that three-fourths of the lands of Easter Drummawhance are identical with the p and portions of Easter Drummawhance which belonged to the deceased Mr Graeme, of Gorthy.

"The respondent, on the other hand, maintains that the lands in que were expressly excepted from the subvaluation as being held, or supposed t held, cum decimis inclusis; that this appears from a note appended to the valuation; and that the decree of approbation cannot in these circumstance read as including those lands, or, if it must be so read, cannot receive effec valuing them. He further maintains that the question is res judicata, hav been decided in his favour by an interlocutor in the present process, dated

Lord Willoughby de Eresby reclaimed, and argued;—It was clear that in 1629 the lands in question were not valued, because in the subvalua-

July 1858. He has also a minor point to the effect that, at all events, one quarter of the three-fourths of Easter Drummawhance did not belong to Mungo Graeme, of Gorthy, and do not therefore, in any view, fall within the valuation.

"I confess that I am not able to read the decree of approbation otherwise than as the objector reads it—that is to say, I do not think it is doubtful that on its just construction it imports a finding that the one-half of Wester Drummawhance and the parts of Easter Drummawhance which belonged to Graeme of Gorthy were included in the valuation by the Subcommissioners of the lands of Pitkellony. There is no doubt that the summons of approbation so concluded, and that decree was granted conform to the conclusions of the summons; and I am not able to attach the importance which the respondent attaches to the absence in the operative decree of renewed reference to the fact that the lands of Pitkellony—which were the lands valued—included the parts in question of the lands of Drummawhance. That matter is, after all, one affecting only the correctness of the extract. There can be no doubt as to what was the judgment of the Court.

"But if the decree of approbation does, upon its just construction, profess to value the lands in question, or identify them as valued by the Subcommissioners under a different name, I do not see how the respondent can now challenge that decree, or claim that it shall be denied effect. It may be that the 'Three Drummawhances' mentioned in the note to the subvaluation are the lands, or include the lands, to which the present question relates. It is not certain that that is so, but it very probably is so. But so taking it, the result only is that the decree of approbation was erroneous—that is to say, was wrong on its merits. It was certainly its function to apply the subvaluation to the various parcels of land which, under old names, or some common name, the subvaluation included; and if it did so erroneously, either from misreading the subvaluation, or ignoring or misreading the note on which the respondent founds, I am not aware that, after forty years have passed, there is any remedy. The judgment is now as much res judicata as if it had passed causa cognita; and I do not suppose it can be suggested that if the respondent or his authors had appeared in the process of approbation, and raised the present question, and had done so unsuccessfully, they could at any time afterwards have contended that the decree of approbation was disconform to the subvaluation, and that therefore they were not bound by it.

"I am therefore against the respondent on the merits of Mr Speir's objection. But it remains to consider whether the objection is not foreclosed by previous judgments in the present process of locality.

"There is no doubt that the question as to the valuation of the lands of Easter and Wester Drummawhance was raised in the present locality so far back as the year 1850—the Lord Advocate on the part of the Crown having in that year lodged objections claiming that the 'Three Drummawhances' should be treated as unvalued. There is no doubt also that the common agent appears upon such inquiry as he happened to make, to have conceded that unless the proprietor brought forward further evidence before the locality was approved final, the objection of the Lord Advocate must receive effect. It is also true that after some delay the Lord Advocate in June 1858 moved to have his objections sustained and the locality rectified, and that on 9th July 1858 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie), having allowed the Lord Advocate's note to be seen, pronounced the following interlocutor:—'Act. Buchanan—Alt. A. B. Shand.—Lord Mackenzie.—9th July 1858.—The Lord Ordinary remits to the Clerk to rectify the locality, and to report. T. MACKENZIE.'

"There was no reclaiming note. The clerk did report a new rectified scheme, but the same was never approved. Nothing more was done in the locality until after the new augmentation in 1873 when the present interim

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

tion of 30th October of that year they were expressly exclude supposed to be held cum decimis inclusis. In construing, decreet of 1797 which professed to approve of the subvaluation would not readily adopt a construction which involved a det that the commissioners had gone beyond their powers. Fairl decreet of 1797 did not value the lands of Drummawhance only the lands of "Pitkellonie, Over and Nether." The cla decree in which the lands of Easter and Wester Drummawh said to have been "formerly a part of the said lands of P formed merely the closing portion of the description of Anthon sasine, which was inserted narrative to instruct his title to clause did not imply that he desired to have all the parcels of l which he said were to be found within his infeftment. The su of the summons shewed that he put forward the subvaluati as the foundation of his case, and in that deed the "lands of Over and Nether," were alone valued. The operative part of contained no finding that the lands of Drummawhance were i the lands of Pitkellony, and in that it was consistent with the tion of the summons.[1] The clause "with pertinents" could n as including parts of Drummawhance.[2] (2) If, however, this v proper construction of the decreet, then there was a latent ambi phraseology, to explain which extrinsic evidence was competen cases of Earl of Fife's Trustees and M'Intyre,[4] which were fou by the respondent, it was patent, upon the face of the de the commissioners had gone beyond their powers, and in suc stances it was held that after forty years the decrees could no lenged. (3) It was res judicata that the teinds of the lands of whance belonging to the objector were unvalued.[5] The questio they were valued or not was raised in 1850 by the Lord Adv maintained that they were unvalued, and he had a good title t question on behalf of the Crown, as the holder of the bishops the parish. The heritors' interests, and more particularly t objector, were represented by the common agent, whose duty locality was established, giving effect for the first time practically t Advocate's objection.

---

"The question is whether all this constituted a res judicata. I an in the negative. It is not perhaps enough to exclude that plea tha as yet been no final locality. The more important fact is that the been no proper trial of the question. For I cannot hold that a re clerk to prepare a rectified scheme and to report amounted to a final ju foreclosed further discussion. I rather think that the interlocutor n remit may still be reclaimed against, I mean, ex gr., along with the approving the final locality. But whether that be so or not, I am hold that as the interlocutor stands it is a res judicata."

[1] Cameron v. Macpherson, April 1, 1853, 15 D. 657, 25 Scot. Jur. 3

[2] Murray v. Common Agent in Locality of Selkirk, July 6, 1864 1312.

[3] Bell's Prins. sec. 524; Morton v. Hunters & Co., Nov. 26, 1830, 379, 3 Scot. Jur. 104; Macleod v. Smith, &c., May 25, 1869, 7 Macpl July 10, 1873, 11 Macph. (H. L.) 62, 41 Scot. Jur. 325 and 435.

[4] Earl of Fife's Trustees v. Commissioners of Woods and Forests, Fe 11 D. 889, 21 Scot. Jur. 310; M'Intyre v. Maclean, March 7, 1828, Sh Cases, 160, and also reported in 3 Fac. Decns. March 8, 1828, p. 794

[5] Earl of Hopetoun v. Ramsay, &c., March 27, 1846, 5 Bell's App. Jur. 398; Dundas v. Waddell, Dec. 19, 1878, 6 R. 345, revd. Feb. 27, (H. L.) 19.

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

defend the heritors' rights against anyone attacking them.[1] The point was, in short, properly contested between the parties.[2] The common agent was satisfied on inquiry, and allowed that the Lord Advocate was right. The result was that, on the motion of the Lord Advocate, the Lord Ordinary remitted to the clerk to rectify the locality, and to report. That interlocutor was not reclaimed against within twenty-one days, and therefore became final.[3]

Argued for Mr Speir;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the decreet of approbation, the teinds of the lands of one-half of Wester Drummawhance and the parts of Easter Drummawhance which belonged to Graeme of Gorthy were valued by the decreet as having formed a part of the lands of Pitkellony at the date of the subvaluation. Both the pursuers in the summons of approbation concurred in stating this, and they each asked that the subvaluation should be applied to their respective lands. Decreet was given "conform to the conclusions of the libel." The respondent's objections were extrinsic objections not appearing ex facie of the decreet, and they were cut off by the negative prescription.[4] There was no such ambiguity here as in the Morven[5] case, where a number of lands were valued under a general name, and it was doubtful whether certain lands called Knock, specially mentioned neither in the subvaluation nor in the operative part of the decree of approbation, had been valued under the general name. (2) The respondent's plea of res judicata was ill founded. The interlocutor of 9th July 1858 was in no sense one upon the merits of the Lord Advocate's objections. Further, the common agent acted for the general body of heritors, and not for a dissentient, and accordingly he could not from 1850 to 1858 have properly represented the interest of the objector against the Lord Advocate. The question then whether the objector's lands of Drummawhance were unvalued had never been properly raised between parties who were proper contradictors and had a good title to raise it.[6]

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—It appears to me that the first question for consideration is, whether on a sound construction of the decree of approbation and valuation of 1797 the teinds of the objector's lands in question are thereby valued. If they are so valued, then all objections not appearing ex facie of the decree will, having regard to its date, 1797, be cut off by the negative prescription. [His Lordship then recapitulated the substance of the narrative of the extract decree.]

Now, I think, there is no doubt or difficulty as to what is here meant by the "pursuers' said lands," and that they are the pursuer James Drummond's lands

---

[1] Duke of Buccleuch v. Common Agent in Locality of Inveresk, Nov. 10, 1868, 7 Macph. 95, 41 Scot. Jur. 55, per Lord President, 7 Macph. 98.

[2] Earl of Mansfield, &c. v. Stewart, Jan. 30, 1880, 7 R. 552, per Lord Rutherfurd Clark, p. 98.

[3] Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 54; Act of Sederunt, Nov. 12, 1825, sec. 16.

[4] Earl of Fife's Trustees v. Commissioners of Woods and Forests, 11 D. 889; M'Intyre v. Maclean, Shaw's Teind Cases, 160, and 3 Fac. Decns. p. 794; Dean of the Chapel Royal and Her Majesty's Advocate v. Johnstone, &c., Feb. 20, 1867, 5 Macph. 414, 39 Scot. Jur. 220, affd. March 18, 1869, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 19, 41 Scot. Jur. 348.

[5] Macleod v. Smith, &c., supra.

[6] Dean of the Chapel Royal and Her Majesty's Advocate v. Johnstone, &c., supra, per Lord Chancellor (Hatherley), 7 Macph. (H. L.) p. 24.

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891.
Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

of Pitkellony, Over and Nether, and the other pursuer Anthony Murray's part of the lands of Drummawhance, Easter and Wester.

It accordingly appears to me that the summons clearly concluded that it ought and should be found and declared that the stock and teind of the lands of Pitkellony, Over and Nether, and of the parts of the lands of Drummawhance Easter and Wester, in question should be in all time coming the particular quantity of victual "before specified." If, therefore, decree was pronounced by the Lord High Commissioners in terms of the conclusions of the summons it would appear to me to be clear that the objector's lands in question are valued by the decree of approbation and valuation.

Now, we learn from the extract decreet that the pursuers appeared by the procurator, who produced a book or record containing the principal report of the Subcommissioners of Muthill, and particularly the valuation of the pursuers' lands libelled, that appearance was made for the Officers of State, but not for the minister, and that the Lords "ratified, allowed, and approved the said report in so far as concerned the pursuers' lands libelled, and interponed their decreet and authority thereto, and decerned conform to the conclusions of the libel."

The extract of the decree so pronounced is given out in the following terms. [His Lordship quoted the extract decree.]

It appears to me to be clear that the teinds of the objector's lands in question are valued by this decree as having been parts of the lands of Pitkellony, Over and Nether, at the date of the subvaluation.

For the reasons which the respondent now alleges, it is possibly not consistent with the facts of the case that the objector's lands were included in the subvaluation. But the decree affirms that the lands were valued, and confirms the valuation of the Subcommissioners. It is too late, however, now to inquire into that matter. The objections which the respondent urges are extrinsic objections not arising ex facie of the decree, and all such objections are, as I have said, cut off by the negative prescription. On this part of the case, therefore, I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

The respondent, however, pleads that it is res judicata that the lands in question are unvalued, and he founds upon an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 9th July 1858 in these terms—"The Lord Ordinary remits to the clerk to rectify the locality and to report." That interlocutor certainly does not appear on the face of it to be a judgment of the Court on any question of right, but to be merely a direction that a farther step of procedure should be taken in the case.

But as I understand the respondent's contention, he maintains that it was a direction to rectify the locality so as to give effect to certain objections stated by the Lord Advocate in the locality in which the question had been raised between him and the common agent as to whether the teinds of the lands in question were valued or not, and that the common agent had admitted that they were not valued.

In order to see how this matter stands it is necessary to refer in some detail to the proceedings which took place in the locality. [His Lordship then narrated the proceedings as stated above.]

Now, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the question whether the teinds of the lands now in question were valued or unvalued was raised in the course of the proceedings as between the Crown and the common agent. It is true that it was not raised in the form in which it is raised in the present case, viz.

whether the lands in question were valued in 1797 as part of the lands of Pitkellony. No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891. Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

Neither was the question directly raised in the course of the proceedings, but it was necessarily involved in the question whether or not the lands in question were liable to be localled on for one-fifth of the real rent as being unvalued, and if the interlocutor of 9th July 1858 is to be held as importing a judgment of the Court to that effect, then I think it is res judicata that the teinds of these lands are unvalued.

But then I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the interlocutor in question does not import a judgment to that effect. It will be observed that the note of the Lord Advocate craves the Court to sustain his objections, but the interlocutor does not do so, but merely remits to the clerk to rectify the locality. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that such a remit does not imply any judgment on the merits of the objections and answers, and I think the interlocutor submitted to us ought to be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

Poor MICHAEL M'EVOY, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Cosens. No. 90.
ALEXANDER MILLER AND OTHERS (Braes' Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—M'Lennan.

Jan. 16, 1891. M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees.

Process—Judicature Act, 1825 (Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 18—A. S., 11*th July* 1828, s. 7—Reclaiming Note without record appended—Competency.—A reclaiming note against a judgment by a Lord Ordinary sustaining the defenders' pleas, and dismissing an action at the instance of a person who sued in forma pauperis, quoad as incompetent, in respect that the record was not appended.

MICHAEL M'EVOY, who sued in forma pauperis, brought an action in the Court of Session for reduction of a decree obtained against him in the Sheriff Court in an action under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1857, which the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 11th December 1890, dismissed, his Lordship sustaining certain pleas for the defender.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. M.

The record had not been printed in the Outer-House of consent of the parties.

The pursuer reclaimed, but did not print or append the record to the reclaiming note.

When objection was taken in the Single Bills to the competency of the reclaiming note the pursuer argued that the provisions of the 18th section of the Judicature Act, 1825 (quoted in the Lord President's opinion, infra), regarding the boxing of printed copies of the record, were directory and not imperative.[1] Accordingly, it was in the discretion of the Court to dispense with the printing here.

Argued for the respondents;—The practice under the provisions of the 18th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, and the 77th section of the Act of Sederunt of 11th July 1828 (quoted by the Lord President) following upon it was quite settled; a reclaiming note without the record appended had been frequently held to be incompetent.[2] There was no decided case originating in the Court of Session where the provisions of the Act

[1] Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, March 7, 1868, 6 Macph. 563, 40 Scot. Jur. 290.

[2] Miller v. Simpson, Dec. 9, 1863, 2 Macph. 225, 36 Scot. Jur. 116; Muir v. Muir, Oct. 17, 1874, 2 R. 26.

No. 90.

Jan. 16, 1891.
M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees.

had been dispensed with. The reclaimer ought to have presented manuscript note to the Court before the expiration of the reclaiming da to ask that printing should be dispensed with, and it was now too la to make such an application.

The Lord President intimated that before giving judgment the Co would confer with the Judges of the Second Division.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of L Wellwood (Ordinary) pronounced in foro, which runs thus :—"Having c sidered the debate, together with the process, sustains the first, third, and fou pleas in law for the defender, dismisses the action, and decerns." It theref appears on the face of the interlocutor that it was pronounced after heari parties and disposing of the whole merits of the case.

An objection has been taken to the competency of the reclaiming note on t ground that the record is not appended to it. In discussing that objecti several cases were cited, which left an impression that there was some doubt to the practice of the Court in such circumstances. That turns out to ha been quite a mistaken impression, and I cannot help thinking that there w some confusion in the minds of the parties or of their legal advisers betwe questions of competency, such as this is, and questions as to the printing appeals under the Court of Session Act. Being under that impression, we in mated at the close of the discussion that, before disposing of the matter, would consult our brethren in the other Division. But, on looking into t cases we find that there is no occasion for any such conference, for the mat is settled by a whole series of authorities, and therefore the object which had in view in proposing such a conference does not require to be attained.

The question depends on the 18th section of the Judicature Act of 1825, a on the 77th section of the Act of Sederunt of 11th July 1828, following up the statute. Now, the statute provides,—"That when any interlocutor sh have been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, either of the parties dissatisfi therewith shall be entitled to apply for a review of it to the Inner-House of t Division to which the Lord Ordinary belongs, provided that such party sh within twenty-one days from the date of the interlocutor, print and put in the boxes appointed for receiving the papers to be perused by the Judges a re reciting the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and praying the Court to alter t same, in whole or in part; and if the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary sh have been pronounced on cases, the party applying for review shall, along wi the note as above directed, print and put into the boxes the cases which ha been before the Lord Ordinary; and if the interlocutor has been pronounc without cases, the party so applying shall, along with his note as above directe put into the boxes printed copies of the record authenticated as before, an shall at the same time give notice of his application for review by delivery six copies of the note to the known agent of the opposite party; and it sh in no case be competent for either party . . . to bring any interlocut of the Lord Ordinary under review of the Inner-House by the form of reclaimi petition now in use, but only in the mode thus directed."

There cannot be the least doubt that this provision is expressed in imperati terms. Certain things shall be done to enable the party to bring the Lo Ordinary's interlocutor under review. One of these things is that he shall "pu into the boxes printed copies of the record."

No. 89.

Jan. 16, 1891.
Speir v. Lord Willoughby de Eresby.

whether the lands in question were valued in 1797 as part of the lands of Pitkellony.

Neither was the question directly raised in the course of the proceedings, but it was necessarily involved in the question whether or not the lands in question were liable to be localled on for one-fifth of the real rent as being unvalued, and if the interlocutor of 9th July 1858 is to be held as importing a judgment of the Court to that effect, then I think it is res judicata that the teinds of these lands are unvalued.

But then I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the interlocutor in question does not import a judgment to that effect. It will be observed that the note of the Lord Advocate craves the Court to sustain his objections, but the interlocutor does not do so, but merely remits to the clerk to rectify the locality. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that such a remit does not imply any judgment on the merits of the objections and answers, and I think the interlocutor submitted to review ought to be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 90.

Jan. 16, 1891.
M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees.

Poor MICHAEL M'EVOY, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Cosens.
ALEXANDER MILLER AND OTHERS (Braes' Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—M'Lennan.

Process—Judicature Act, 1825 (Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 18—A. S., 11*th July* 1828, sec. 77—Reclaiming Note without record appended—Competency.—A reclaiming note against a judgment by a Lord Ordinary sustaining the defenders' pleas, and dismissing an action at the instance of a person who sued in forma pauperis, refused as incompetent, in respect that the record was not appended.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. M.

MICHAEL M'EVOY, who sued in forma pauperis, brought an action in the Court of Session for reduction of a decree obtained against him in the Sheriff Court in an action under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, which the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 11th December 1890, dismissed, his Lordship sustaining certain pleas for the defender.

The record had not been printed in the Outer-House of consent of the defenders.

The pursuer reclaimed, but did not print or append the record to the reclaiming note.

When objection was taken in the Single Bills to the competency of the reclaiming note the pursuer argued that the provisions of the 18th section of the Judicature Act, 1825 (quoted in the Lord President's opinion, infra), regarding the boxing of printed copies of the record, were directory and not imperative.[1] Accordingly, it was in the discretion of the Court to dispense with the printing here.

Argued for the respondents;—The practice under the provisions of the 18th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, and the 77th section of the Act of Sederunt of 11th July 1828 (quoted by the Lord President) following upon it was quite settled; a reclaiming note without the record appended had been frequently held to be incompetent.[2] There was no decided case originating in the Court of Session where the provisions of the Act

[1] Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, March 7, 1868, 6 Macph. 563, 40 Scot. Jur. 290.

[2] Miller v. Simpson, Dec. 9, 1863, 2 Macph. 225, 36 Scot. Jur. 116; Muir v. Muir, Oct. 17, 1874, 2 R. 26.

No. 91.

Jan. 20, 1891.
Collie v. Pyper.

that the residue of the estate should "be under the control and at the dispo of my said executor, W. P." W. P. founded on the settlement as giving hin beneficial right to the residue.

In an action of reduction of the trust-settlement raised against W. P. b brother of the deceased the pursuer averred that the deceased had signed t deed under essential error as to its import and effect induced by the false a fraudulent representations of the defender—that the deed merely appointed h the trustee or manager of the estate, and that the pursuer and other relati were to have the beneficial interest therein.

The pursuer contended that he was entitled to an issue of essential er induced by the defender's misrepresentations. Held that the issue must b essential error induced by the defender's false and fraudulent representations 1st Division. Ld. Stormonth Darling. C.

GEORGE COLLIE, grocer in Aberdeen, died on 12th August 1889, p sessed of moveable property of the value of £2726, and of certain herita estate. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th Septem 1888, by which he revoked all previous settlements made by him, a made over to William Pyper, of Hillhead, Pitfodels, Aberdeen, for t purposes therein mentioned, the whole heritable and moveable est which should belong to him at the time of his death, and also appoint William Pyper to be his sole executor.

The trust-settlement contained directions to his trustee and execu (1) to pay his debts, &c.; (2) to pay various legacies, amounting £1199, 15s., including legacies of £500 each to his brothers, Thom and James Collie, and further bore,—"And whatever residue there m be of my said estate shall be under the control and at the disposal of m said executor, William Pyper."

William Pyper claimed the whole residue after deduction of the deb legacies, &c. Thomson Collie, on 13th August 1890, brought an act against him for reduction of the settlement, and to have him ordain to make payment of such sum as should be found to be the pursue true interest in the estate of his brother George Collie.

The pursuer averred that the truster had, upon 12th October 1883, ex cuted a trust-settlement under which the pursuer and his brother Jam or the survivor, succeeded to the whole estate (with a small excepti of which the truster should die possessed; that the pretended settlem of 12th September 1888 was not the deed of the deceased; that it w procured by the defender by fraud, circumvention, and undue influe on the part of the defender at a time when the deceased was in a we and facile state of mind consequent upon excessive drinking.

The pursuer further averred;—"The deceased gave no instructions f the preparation of said settlement. At the time the testator signed it h did not understand the nature and effect of said settlement, and that cancelled all previous settlements. Defender purposely did not expl to him that, in particular, it revoked his prior will of 12th October 18 and made the defender his sole residuary legatee. The deed was pu posely and fraudulently made by defender in the form of a trust favour of defender, in order to lead the deceased to suppose that the fender was appointed merely a trustee or manager of the estate for benefit of the relatives of the deceased. It was not explained to testator that the said settlement was truly an absolute conveyance to defender of the bulk of the testator's estate. The defender alone instru the preparation of the said settlement. He got Messrs J. & G. Col who are his own law-agents, and were not the law-agents of the decea to draft the deed, and the signature of the deceased was adhibited to said draft in defender's business premises. The defender prevented deceased from having the advice of his own or any law-agent, and con

No. 90.

Jan. 16, 1891.
M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees.

The Act of Sederunt does not add any additional condition or penalty, but merely makes provision for giving effect to the provisions of the statute. Section 77 says that reclaiming notes shall first be moved as Single Bills and sent to the roll, "provided always that such notes, if reclaiming against an Outer-House interlocutor, shall not be received unless there be appended thereto copies of the mutual cases, if any, and of the papers authenticated as the record, in terms of the statute, if the record has been closed."

That is merely a direction to the Clerks of Court to give effect to the statutory provision by refusing to receive reclaiming notes to which a print of the record is not appended.

There is therefore no room for doubt or hesitation as to the meaning of the statute or the force and effect of the Act of Sederunt.

Accordingly, it has been decided over and over again that any failure to comply with these provisions is fatal to the reclaiming note. The first case I find upon the point is the case of Brown and Others v. Moodie and Others (19th July 1845, 17 Scot. Jur. 568). The failure there consisted in not having appended to the reclaiming note the original summons and defences, although the revised condescendence and answers were appended. That was in the days when the original summons and defences formed part of the record.

The second case was a case where the party had failed altogether to print the record, viz., The National Exchange Co. v. Drew & Dick (Nov. 16, 1860, 23 D. 27, 33 Scot. Jur. 11), and that was followed by the case of Bell v. Ogilvie (Jan. 28, 1872, 24 D. 375, 34 Scot. Jur. 249). In these cases the statutory provision was held to be imperative, and the want of the record was held to be fatal.

But there are cases which go further, e.g., Carter and Others v. Johnston and Others (Feb. 6, 1847, 9 D. 598). There were three papers there on which the record was closed, viz., the summons, defences, and the pleas in law for the pursuer. The omission to print the pursuer's pleas was held to be fatal.

There is yet another case which strongly illustrates the same principle, giving effect to the statute in circumstances in which the application of it seemed rather hard,—I mean the case of Muir v. Muir (Oct. 17, 1874, 2 R. 26). There the record had, in the Outer-House, been amended in writing. The record appended to the reclaiming note was the original record without the manuscript additions. That was held to be fatal to the reclaiming note, although the failure there looked very like an inadvertence.

In these circumstances, I think it would be spending judicial time very idly to consider the matter further, for we have here a complete series rerum judicatarum. It is obvious from the judgment that there must have been a closed record here. It is thus an indispensable appendage of the reclaiming note, without which it cannot be received.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note as incompetent.

A. GORDON-PETRIE, S.S.C.—THOMAS LIDDLE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 91.

Jan. 20, 1891.
Collie v. Pyper.

THOMSON COLLIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—Glegg.
WILLIAM PYPER, Defender (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Balfour—Shaw.

Error—Issue—Fraud—Reduction—Essential error induced by misrepresentation—"Falsely and fraudulently."—In a trust-settlement the testator directed

No. 91.
Jan. 20, 1891.
Collie v. Pyper.

that the residue of the estate should "be under the control and at t of my said executor, W. P." W. P. founded on the settlement as gi beneficial right to the residue.

In an action of reduction of the trust-settlement raised against brother of the deceased the pursuer averred that the deceased had deed under essential error as to its import and effect induced by th fraudulent representations of the defender—that the deed merely app the trustee or manager of the estate, and that the pursuer and oth were to have the beneficial interest therein.

The pursuer contended that he was entitled to an issue of ess induced by the defender's misrepresentations. Held that the issue essential error induced by the defender's false and fraudulent represe

1st Division.
Ld. Stormonth Darling.

GEORGE COLLIE, grocer in Aberdeen, died on 12th August sessed of moveable property of the value of £2726, and of certai estate. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th 1888, by which he revoked all previous settlements made b made over to William Pyper, of Hillhead, Pitfodels, Aberde purposes therein mentioned, the whole heritable and move which should belong to him at the time of his death, and also William Pyper to be his sole executor.

The trust-settlement contained directions to his trustee an (1) to pay his debts, &c.; (2) to pay various legacies, am £1199, 15s., including legacies of £500 each to his brother and James Collie, and further bore,—"And whatever residue be of my said estate shall be under the control and at the disp said executor, William Pyper."

William Pyper claimed the whole residue after deduction of legacies, &c. Thomson Collie, on 13th August 1890, brought against him for reduction of the settlement, and to have hi to make payment of such sum as should be found to be the true interest in the estate of his brother George Collie.

The pursuer averred that the truster had, upon 12th October cuted a trust-settlement under which the pursuer and his brot or the survivor, succeeded to the whole estate (with a small of which the truster should die possessed; that the pretended of 12th September 1888 was not the deed of the deceased; procured by the defender by fraud, circumvention, and undue on the part of the defender at a time when the deceased was and facile state of mind consequent upon excessive drinking.

The pursuer further averred;—"The deceased gave no instr the preparation of said settlement. At the time the testator si did not understand the nature and effect of said settlement, a cancelled all previous settlements. Defender purposely did n to him that, in particular, it revoked his prior will of 12th Oct and made the defender his sole residuary legatee. The deed posely and fraudulently made by defender in the form of favour of defender, in order to lead the deceased to suppose th fender was appointed merely a trustee or manager of the est benefit of the relatives of the deceased. It was not explain testator that the said settlement was truly an absolute conveya defender of the bulk of the testator's estate. The defender alone the preparation of the said settlement. He got Messrs J. & who are his own law-agents, and were not the law-agents of the to draft the deed, and the signature of the deceased was adhibi said draft in defender's business premises. The defender prev deceased from having the advice of his own or any law-agent, a tuted himself his sole adviser. Neither Messrs J. & G. Collie, nor any one on their behalf, ever received instructions from the deceased or consulted him regarding it. The deed was not read over to or by the deceased. For some time prior to execution of said settlement the defender stood in the relation of adviser to the deceased as regards his money matters. He invested his money for him, advised him in reference to his affairs generally, and had great influence over the deceased, and by fraud and circumvention and undue influence, or one or other of them, upon the deceased, who was at the time in a feeble condition of body and mind, and weak and facile, the defender induced him to sign the said settlement. He fraudulently represented to the deceased that his estate was, by the said deed, conveyed to his (deceased's) relatives or some of them, and not to the defender, and he fraudulently concealed the fact that by said settlement nearly two-thirds of his estate was conveyed to the defender himself. This was not the intention of the testator, and if he had not been deceived by defender as to the import of the deed, and been acted upon by the fraud and circumvention and dominating and undue influence and pressure used by the defender, he would not have signed it. The deceased signed the said settlement under essential error as to its contents and its effect fraudulently induced by defender."

The defender denied these averments.

The pursuer proposed issues as to whether the deed was the deed of the testator, and of facility, fraud, and circumvention. The fourth issue proposed was in these terms:—"(4) Whether the defender represented to the deceased that the said trust-settlement merely appointed the defender a trustee or manager of the estate, and that the pursuer and other relatives of the deceased were to have the beneficial interest therein—such not being the nature and import of the said deed; and whether the said deceased George Collie executed the said deed under essential error as to its nature and import induced by the said misrepresentation?"

On 2d December 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) approved of the issues proposed, and appointed them to be the issues for the trial of the cause.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The fourth issue fell to be disallowed. It could not be reasonably extracted from the averments in the record, which were absolutely inconsistent. The pursuer first charged the defender with concealment, and then charged him with having represented that which he was said to have concealed. In any view, if an issue of essential error were to be allowed, it should only be of error induced by "false and fraudulent" representations. His representation might be quite innocent, for he might have had an honest though mistaken belief that the will had the particular effect which he was said to have represented to the pursuer.

Argued for the pursuer;—The fourth issue should be allowed. The averments on record were not inconsistent. The pursuer charged the defender with guilty silence, and then with having made certain representations. There was authority for holding that though it was averred upon record that a deed had been executed under essential error induced by false and fraudulent representations, still it was not necessary that "false and fraudulent" should be inserted in the issue, even although some benefit might be taken by the person said to have made the representations.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are of opinion that the fourth issue should run thus:

[1] Munro v. Strain, Feb. 14, 1874, 1 R. 522; Hogg and Others v. Campbell and Others, March 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 848, 36 Scot. Jur. 428.

No. 91.
Jan. 20, 1891.
Collie v. Pyper.

—"Whether the defender falsely and fraudulently represented to the deceased that the said trust-settlement merely appointed the defender as trustee or manager of the estate, and that the pursuer and other relatives of the deceased were to have the beneficial interest therein; and whether the said deceased George Collie executed the said deed under essential error as to its nature and effect induced by the said false and fraudulent representations?"

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords hold the issue as amended at the bar as adjusted and settled: Approve of the same as now authenticated accordingly: Appoint the same to be the issue for the trial of the cause, and remit to Lord Stormonth Darling to proceed."

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 92.
Jan. 20, 1891.
Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

DAVID LITTLEJOHN (Sheriff-Clerk of Aberdeenshire), Pursuer and Nominal Raiser.
WILLIAM STIVEN (John Grieve & Company's Trustee), Claimant and Real Raiser (Appellant).—Asher—Rhind.
CHARLES REYNOLDS & COMPANY, Claimants.—Jameson—M'Lennan.

Bankruptcy—19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, secs. 5 and 108—Computation of time—Arrestment.—Held that the 108th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856* applied in a case where an arrestment had been used on 20th April and sequestration had taken place on June 19th, according to the computation of time prescribed by the 5th section of the Act.†

Bankruptcy—Arrestment—Consignation—Preference—1696, c. 5.—A pursuer used arrestments on the dependence of an action. Subsequently by arrangement between him and the defender, who denied liability, the latter consigned a sum in the hands of the Clerk of Court. The defender was sequestrated within sixty days of the arrestment, and thereafter the pursuer obtained decree in the action, in respect of the trustee not having sisted himself as a defender and the bankrupt having failed to find caution. In a competition for the consigned fund, between the bankrupt's trustee and the pursuer, held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the pursuer was entitled to the fund, on the ground that the effect of the consignation was to divest the bankrupt of all right in the sum consigned, and that it was not struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.

CHARLES REYNOLDS & COMPANY, manufacturers and warehousemen in London, on 18th March 1889 raised an action for a sum of £79, 16s. 2d against John Grieve & Company, auctioneers in Aberdeen, in the Sheriff Court there, and, on 20th April, used arrestments in the hands of the Town and County Bank to the extent of £100 on the dependence of that action. Thereafter parties arranged that the arrestment should be recalled the defenders consigning £100 in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk. This was done by the defenders on 27th April, and the arrestments were withdrawn.

The estates of John Grieve & Company were sequestrated on 19th June, and William Stiven, accountant, Dundee, was appointed trustee

* Sec. 108.—" . . . . And no arrestment or poinding executed of the funds or effects of the bankrupt, on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration shall be effectual."

† Sec. 5.—"Periods of time in this Act shall be reckoned exclusive of the day from which such period is directed to run."

No. 92.

Jan. 20, 1891.

Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

The action was intimated to the trustee, who did not sist himself, and, on 6th November 1889, the defenders having failed to find caution, decree was pronounced against them.

William Stiven, as real raiser, then raised an action of multiplepoinding, to determine the right to the consigned money, in name of the Sheriff-clerk as pursuer, calling himself and Charles Reynolds & Company as defenders.

Charles Reynolds & Company stated in their claim,—"Explained that the intention of the parties in carrying out the arrangement entered into for the consignation of said sum was that the consignation was to be in security of such sums, principal, interest, and expenses, as might be decerned for in the claimants' favour in the said action, and to allow of the said arrestment being withdrawn."

They pleaded;—(8) The claimants having obtained decree in the said action for the amount sued for, with interest and expenses, the right of the claimants to the free fund in medio, whether the same was judicially consigned or only extrajudicially consigned, or to so much of the said fund as is necessary to satisfy their claims, is preferable to that of the said William Stiven, as trustee for the creditors of the said John Grieve & Company, and the claimants are therefore entitled to be ranked primo loco on the free fund in medio in terms of their claim. (9) The said arrestment on the dependence of the said action having been used in the hands of the said bank more than sixty days before the date on which the said John Grieve & Company were rendered notour bankrupt, or the date of the said sequestration of their estates, the claimants are entitled to be ranked primo loco as aforesaid.

Stiven claimed the fund also, pleading;—(3) The deposit of the said sum of £100 cannot in the circumstances give the defenders, the said Charles Reynolds & Company, a higher right than they held under their said arrestment, and that arrestment having been cut down by the sequestration, the present claimant is entitled to be preferred to the fund in medio. (4) The bankrupts, the said John Grieve & Company, having been in a state of hopeless bankruptcy at the time when the said deposit was made, were not entitled to do anything to change the condition of matters under which a preference would be given to any creditor, and especially to a creditor whose debt was bona fide disputed, to the prejudice of the general body of creditors.

A proof was led.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 16th July 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact)—"Finds that said consignation is not struck at by the Act 1696: Therefore repels the claim for the said William Stiven, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said John Grieve & Company: Sustains the claim for the said Charles Reynolds & Company, and ranks and prefers them on the fund in medio, in terms thereof: Grants warrant to the Clerk of Court to pay over the consigned money to the said Charles Reynolds & Company, so far as is necessary to satisfy the said claim," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . The trustee says that the transaction is struck at by the Act 1696. To this the claimants Messrs Reynolds & Company answer, in the first place, and I think with some force, that it being the contention of the trustee, that what was done before the Sheriff-clerk on the 27th of April was a mere substitution of another nexus for that imposed by the arrestment used on the 20th of April, they are, according to the computation of time applicable to such challenges, outwith the limitation of the statute, the transaction not falling within the period of constructive bankruptcy. But apart from the

No. 92.

Jan. 20, 1891.
Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

The Sheriff (J. G. Smith), on 8th October 1890, dismissed the appeal and affirmed the judgment.*

The trustee appealed, and argued;—That the arrestment fell within the sixty days, and was therefore ineffectual, was plain upon the Statute of 1856.[1] Any doubt[2] was unintelligible in the face of so plain an enactment. That being so, and the arrestment being ineffectual, then either (1) the consignation, being a mere surrogatum for the arrestment, must, like it, be ineffectual, or (2) if it was not a surrogatum, but a security by which the creditor was bettered, it was struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5. Now the Court did not order consignation, but only allowed it. It was no payment, for the action went on after it. And it was a bargain between the parties. The claimants Reynolds & Company themselves called it security, and they were right. The right of the successful party was effect of the arrestment, which, indeed, was recalled, my opinion is that the challenge under the statute is not well founded. In the first place, I think the point is concluded by authority, for in Gordon v. Brock it was held that the trustee of a bankrupt had no claim on money consigned by him, Lord Gillies remarking,—'To say that this is defeated by the bankruptcy, would just be to make every consignation a mere mockery.' The ratio of the principle thus applied apparently is that consignation operates as a cash payment through the medium of the Court, the consigned money, indeed, being subject to arrestment to the extent of any balance after the orders of Court are satisfied, but otherwise being not only earmarked, but placed by the bankrupt beyond his control, and specifically appropriated. No doubt the consignation was conditional on the issue of the action, and if the defence had been successful it would have reverted to the bankrupt, and as a consequence fallen to his trustee, but Reynolds & Company having prevailed, the decree of the Court in their favour, operating retro, practically puts the consigned money in the position of a cash payment. . . ."

---

* "NOTE.—It is well settled that money consigned in a depending process ceases to be part of the estate of the person consigning it. The Sheriff clerk becomes custodier or trustee for the party in whose favour the process may ultimately be decided. If the defender succeeds he will get it back; if he fails the other party will be entitled to it. It is in fact conditional payment, the condition being that the creditor who has brought the action will succeed in making the claim good to meet which the consignation has been made. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that there is no difference between consignation judicially ordered and consignation arranged by the parties, for in either case the money, through the medium of the Clerk of Court, is placed in manibus curiæ. This being the nature of the transaction, I do not see how the trustee can reclaim the fund, whether the bankrupt succeeds or no, for, as Lord Gillies puts it in the case of Gordon v. Brock, 1 D. 1, what is the meaning of consignation if it is not 'to provide against the risk of the debtor's bankruptcy.' It is evidently one of those cases in which the trustee, on the principle of tantum de tale, is bound by the act of the bankrupt, just the same as if he had withdrawn his defence and made payment of the debt. Arrestment is a different matter. That is a diligence done by the creditor for his own protection, and requires to be cut down when executed within the period of constructive bankruptcy with a view to the equal distribution of the estate. But I cannot accede to the view of the trustee, that because the bankrupt in this case was forced to make consignation in order to get rid of the arrestment of his bank account, it is to be treated as the substitution of one form of security for another, and that both are equally challengeable in the interests of the general body of creditors. The argument probably would have prevailed if the depositary chosen had been a private party; but the moment the money was placed sub judice the matter was ended, as far as the bankrupt was concerned, if the case ended against him."

[1] Murdoch on Bankruptcy, p. 222.

[2] Goudy on Bankruptcy, p. 83, note c.

No. 92.
Jan. 20, 1891.
Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

secured by putting the money to satisfy it in a safe place. There was another kind of consignation, viz., where a person admittedly owing money, but knowing not to which of several claimants to pay it, paid it into Court and washed his hands of it, leaving the rival claimants to establish their rights to it. That was Gordon's case,[1] and it was quite fair to hold consignation such as that payment. The present case, where the debt was disputed to the end, and consignation was made simply to have the arrestment removed, was very different. It was absurd to speak of payment of a debt when that debt was not admitted to be due. (Second) If this was not payment, but a deposit in security, and something different from the arrestment, then it was struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5.[2]

Argued for Reynolds & Company;—Before 1856 diligence used as here was held to be beyond the sixty days,[3] and it had been doubted whether the Act of 1856 had made any change, and whether it was not merely declaratory of the old law.[4] [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It is plainly declaratory that diligence on the sixtieth day, the day of sequestration being excluded, is ineffectual. That is the whole matter.] Consignation was truly payment. It stopped the running of interest; it removed the risks of the arrestee's bankruptcy. The consigner was no longer debtor. The consigned fund could be arrested either by a creditor of the consigner or of his opponent, and that arrestment would, on the determination of the suit, draw back to the date at which it was used.[5] An arrestment in the hands of a consignee was preferable to one in the hands of the consigner.[6] That was because the debt was extinguished by the consignation. Even an order to an agent to pay a sum in his hands to a particular creditor operated so as to earmark that fund, and preserve it for that creditor against the general body of creditors.[7] But consignation had been pronounced to be equivalent to payment in Gordon's case,[1] and the dicta in that case were quite general.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After narrating the facts)—The first question which arises in these circumstances is whether there was consignation of this money, and for the determination of that question it is important to see what was said by Mr Conner and Mr Murison, the Sheriff-clerk-deputes, who are perfectly independent witnesses. Mr Conner states that the parties' agents came to him and stated that they wished steps taken to have the arrestment recalled. He then says,—"Mr Murison asked Mr Mitchell," the pursuers' agent, "in my presence, whether he was agreeable the £100 should be consigned with the Sheriff-clerk, and the arrestment should be given up, and whether he would not give the bank a letter withdrawing the arrestment. Mr Keith," the defenders' agent, "then handed me £100, and asked a receipt for it. I said we did not give receipts for such sums, but that we entered them in the usual way in the consignation book. Then, to satisfy Mr Keith, and after consulting with Mr Murison, I marked the consignation of the £100 on the interlocutor sheet."

---

[1] Gordon v. Brock, Nov. 13, 1838, 1 D. 1, 11 Scot. Jur. 25.
[2] Speir v. Dunlop, May 30, 1827, 5 Shaw, 680, aliter 729.
[3] Scott v. Rutherfurd, Dec. 7, 1839, 2 D. 206, 12 Scot. Jur. 234.
[4] Goudy on Bankruptcy, p. 83, note c.
[5] Pollock v. Scott, July 16, 1844, 6 D. 1297, 16 Scot. Jur. 551.
[6] Lockwood v. Wilson, 1738, M. 736.
[7] Brierly v. Mackintosh, June 1, 1843, 5 D. 1100, 15 Scot. Jur. 440, affd. Feb. 19, 1846, 5 Bell's App. 1, 18 Scot. Jur. 380.

No. 92.

Jan. 20, 1891. Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

Mr Murison, who had been consulted on the matter, says,—"I then suggested to Mr Mitchell to withdraw the arrestment on the consignation of the £100. The consignation was deliberately made. If I recollect rightly, Mr Keith asked for a receipt, and I told him that we were not in the habit of giving receipts, but that the usual marking would be made in the consignation book and interlocutor sheet."

I take that evidence to mean that this consignation was made in the ordinary form in the books of the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire. There is no cross-examination on that evidence, and the only possible meaning of it is that consignation was made in the ordinary form. I cannot understand how a man of business should decline to give a receipt for the money which was handed to him if it is merely deposited with him; but if it is consigned with an official of Court, and that official enters it in the usual way in the Court records, then there is no need for a receipt. There is no evidence before us to shew that anything else is required in the Sheriff Court to constitute consignation than what was done here. On the contrary, the ordinary course was followed: the money was paid to the proper officer, and entered in the ordinary way. There was therefore effectual and sufficient consignation.

If that be so, what is the legal effect of that consignation? In my opinion the legal effect is, as it is expressed by Lord Mackenzie in the case of Gordon (1 D. 1), which was cited to us, that "nothing more remained to be done by the debtor to pass the money to the creditor." After consignation was made the debtor could have no claim on the money except in so far as too much had been consigned, or the result of the action was unfavourable to the party for whose satisfaction the money was paid in. The creditor, if he obtained a decree would do so as at the date of the consignation. In short, the decree would convert the consignation into payment as at that date.

It would be rendering the consignation altogether nugatory if, merely on the ground—and this is the only ground left for the trustee to take—that the debtor had a good defence against the action, it were to be held that effect should not be given to the consignation in favour of the party in whose favour it was made. If the defenders had a good defence, it is an extraordinary thing that the trustee should not have sisted himself as a party to the action and got back the money in that way. I have no doubt that Reynolds & Company are entitled to make good the decree which they hold, to the effect of getting payment of this fund.

The result is that we shall adhere to the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute. I observe that the Sheriff-substitute has found the trustee liable in expenses "as an individual." I think these words should not have been inserted, for they might be read as implying that he has litigated improperly. At the same time, it will not be necessary to recall that interlocutor. His liability for expenses will follow the ordinary rules in such cases, viz., that the trustee may employ the funds in his hands to pay the expenses incurred by him. He is, of course, liable as an individual, and, should he not have sufficient funds of the estate to pay the expenses, may have to pay any balance himself. That is the only effect to be attached to the finding of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I cannot assent to the judgment which your Lordship proposes.

The arrestments were used within sixty days of the sequestration of the estate

No. 92.

Jan. 20, 1891.
Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

of the common debtors. It is plain, therefore, that they could not of their own force create any preferential security in favour of the arresters. This is, indeed, admitted, and it follows as a necessary consequence from the provisions of the 12th and 108th sections of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856.

But the arrestments were withdrawn on an arrangement under which the common debtors consigned £100 in the action on the dependence of which the arrestments were used. I do not think that this makes any difference. The consigned money came in place of the arrested fund. The new security was originated by the arrestments, and was created over a part of the common debtor's estate.

It is true that the arrangement for the consignation was made by the agreement of parties. But it was not in a proper sense voluntary. The arresters might have been compelled by the intervention of the Court, on a petition for loosing or recall of arrestments, to take the consignation in place of the arrestments. On the part of the common debtors the consignation was made by the constraint of the arrestments. If it had been purely voluntary on their side it would, in my opinion, have fallen under the Act 1696, c. 5.

A security which takes its origin in an arrestment cannot, I think, have a greater force than the arrestment itself so long as it is constituted over the estate of the common debtor. Of course, there would be a difference if the arrestments had been loosed on caution, for in that case the security is constituted by the obligation of a third party, so that the provisions of the Act of 1856 are no longer applicable. But when the arrestments are recalled or withdrawn on consignation, the security remains over the estate of the common debtor. The consignation is, I think, made in order to give to the arrester the same security in character and legal effect which he had under the arrestments. It works out the security by anticipation, so that in the meantime the common debtor shall be freed from the arrestment, and the arrester shall not be under the necessity of raising an action of furthcoming. But the consigned fund represents the sum which the arrester could have recovered under the action of furthcoming, and must, I think, be taken under the same conditions as those which would affect any sum recovered under a decree of furthcoming. It is unnecessary to say that if they had resorted to a furthcoming the respondents could have no preference.

It is said that the money on being consigned ceased to be a part of the common debtors' estate. I cannot adopt that view. It was nothing more than a part of the common debtors' estate put into the hands of the Court to await the issue of the action, to be paid to the pursuers if they succeeded, and to be handed back to the defenders if they were assoilzied. I do not see anything more in all this than a security over a part of the common debtors' estate, originating in an arrestment, and having the same legal force. From what circumstance it can acquire greater force I fail to see.

I do not think that the case of Gordon is at all applicable. The circumstances were very different. But what is most material, the Court had not to consider the questions which are before us in this case.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with the Sheriff in thinking that there was here effective judicial consignation of the money which forms the fund in medio. The effect of such consignation is determined by the decision in the case of Gordon v. Brock (1 D. 1), which is not distinguishable in principle from the present case. It is quite true that in that case the person who made the consignation admitted that he was debtor in the sum consigned, and consigned it in order that it might be awarded by the Court to the person who could shew the be right to it; while here the consignee denied liability, and made consignation on to get rid of his creditor's, or pretended creditor's, diligence. I think that th makes no difference in the effect of judicial consignation when once made. Th effect of such consignation is to divest the consigner of the sum consigned, a to place it in the hands of the Court, to be dealt with as the Court may ord If the pursuer of the action in which consignation has been made obtains decr the consigned money is his as from the date of its consignation, and it is his in t character of a cash payment as from that date. From that date the creditor h no claim for interest on the amount consigned as against his debtor.

No. 92.

Jan. 20, 1891.
Stiven v. Reynolds & Co.

It was maintained for the appellant that consignation only came in place the arrestment, just as if one security had been substituted for another, but bo alike subject to be cut down by the debtor's bankruptcy. I cannot adopt th view. The arrestment only laid a nexus on the bankrupt's estate for the cre tor's security, but the consignation divested him of that estate, and the subs quent bankruptcy could not carry to the bankrupt's trustee estate which was n his at the date of the sequestration. Nor is there any room for the contenti in my opinion, that the consignation is struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5.

Lord Young was absent.

The Court found, in fact and law, in terms of the interlocutor of th Sheriff-substitute of 16th July 1890, and dismissed the appeal.

Auld & Macdonald, W.S.—William Officer, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

Alexander Tennant, Appellant.—Murray—C. J. Guthrie.
Inland Revenue, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Sir C. Pearson—A. J. Fe

Revenue—Income-tax—Abatement—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. 35), Schedule D, Case II., Rule I.—Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. 34), sec. 51—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. sec. 8.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8, provides for abatement of income-tax in the case of any person whose "total income f all sources" is less than £400.

A bank-agent, who had an income of £374 and occupied rent free a ho forming part of the bank premises, which was of the annual value of £50, disallowed the abatement by the Assessor of Income-Tax, on the ground t the value of the house fell to be reckoned as part of his income, and that income was not under £400. The bank-agent objected, on the ground that was part of his duty as bank-agent to occupy the house, and that he could sublet the house or vacate it even temporarily without consent of the direct and without another bank official being appointed to occupy it in his absen and that he was liable to be removed at any time. The house was suitable the bank-agent, and if it had not been provided he would have required anot of the same annual value.

Held, by a majority of seven Judges, the Lord President, the Lord Just Clerk, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and Lord M'Laren, diss. Lord Young, Lord Ad and Lord Trayner, that the annual value of the house occupied by the ba agent fell to be reckoned as part of his income.

Exchequer Cause.
2d Division, with three consulted Judges.
M.

At a meeting of the General Commissioners of Income-Tax for district of Brechin Alexander Tennant, agent at Montrose for the Ro of Scotland, appealed against an assessment made on him under sched D and E of the Income-Tax Act, for the year ending 5th April 1890, £317 of income, less £22 of insurance premiums, on the ground that he w entitled to a further abatement from his income of £120 allowed on incomes under £400.*

The appellant stated that his whole income was £374, but that the assessor had improperly taken his income as above £400 by adding £50 as the value of a house in the bank occupied by him.

The Commissioners of Income-Tax sustained the appeal, and allowed the abatement.

The Surveyor of Taxes took a case for appeal.

The facts as stated in the case were as follows:—

Mr Tennant had a stated income from the bank of £300 per annum, from commissions, &c., £17, making together £317, besides an income from invested capital, from which tax had been deducted, £57. These three sums amounted to £374.

With respect to the house the case bore:—"1. The appellant is bound, as part of his duty, to occupy the bank house as custodier of the whole premises belonging to the bank, and also for the transaction of any special bank business after bank hours. He is not allowed to vacate the house even for a temporary period unless with the special consent of the directors, who, in that case, sanction the occupation of the house by another official of the bank during the absence of the agent. It is imperative that in the absence of the agent some responsible person should occupy the house and attend to the carrying on of the bank's business, so far as that may be necessary, after bank hours, and to the due locking up of the premises, and specially to the security of the cash and books in the bank's safe, communicating with which there is a night bolt from the agent's bedroom. The annual value of the house so occupied is £50. 2. The appellant is not entitled to sublet the bank house or any part thereof, and is not entitled to use it for other than the bank's business, but the appellant, with the tacit consent of the bank, carries on insurance business in the bank's premises. 3. By bond of fidelity granted by the appellant on his appointment as agent at Montrose, dated 17th February 1888, he agreed that he should be liable to removal at any time, and in case of his removal from office, that he should be obliged forthwith to flit and remove from the whole premises occupied by him. 4. If the appellant were to desire not to occupy the bank house, the sanction of the directors would be necessary for any arrangement which he might propose. In other cases where a bank-agent has desired not to occupy the bank house, the directors have agreed to his not doing so, and have made arrangements for its occupation by a subordinate official at the branch. In such cases the bank-agent's salary has not been affected by the change, and the subordinate officer of the bank who was appointed to occupy the house did not pay the agent any rent for the bank house, and the said officer's own salary was not affected by the change. In some special cases the bank have increased the salary to the official required to occupy the house

* The Act 39 and 40 Vict. c. 16 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876) enacts (sec. 8) that "the exemption granted by the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, to persons whose respective incomes are less than £150 a-year is hereby restored, and . . . any person . . . who shall claim, and prove in the manner prescribed by the Acts relating to income-tax, that his total income from all sources, though amounting to £150 or upwards, is less than £400 shall be entitled to be relieved from so much of the said duties assessed upon or paid by him as an assessment or charge of the said duties upon £120 of his income would amount unto, and the relief shall be given either by reduction or abatement of the assessment upon such person, or by the repayment to him of so much of the excess as he shall have paid, or by both of those means as the case may require."

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891. Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

on account of their requiring him to do so. In such cases the bank hou was unsuitable for his use. 5. The general rule of the bank is that t bank-agent must occupy the bank house, and no case has ever occur in which they have asked the agent to give up his house, and they ha accordingly never had to consider whether any increase of salary wo be given to the agent if such a case ever arose. 6. The bank house suitable in respect of size and accommodation for the appellant. I dwelling-house were not provided by the bank, he would require to p vide a house for himself of similar size to the bank house. . . ."

Mr Tennant's contentions against the annual value of the house be reckoned as part of his income were thus stated in the case:—"(1) T the occupancy of the house is imposed upon him as part of his duty. That the premises are not a dwelling-house in the sense of the Act, are truly bank premises occupied by him specially in connection with bank's business. (3) That his occupancy of the premises does not under schedule E and the rules applicable thereto. (4) That the p mises come under the exemption of section 51* of 16 and 17 Victo cap. 34, as being a necessary expense incurred in the performance of duties of his office."

The arguments of the parties fully appear from the opinions of t Judges.

The undernoted authorities were referred to.[1]

On 4th June 1890 the Second Division, in respect of the difficulty a importance of the question submitted for decision, appointed the cause be argued before them and three Judges of the First Division.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The premises belonging to the Bank of Scotland Montrose consist of buildings in which the business of the branch is tra acted, and also of a dwelling-house occupied by the local manager and family and servants. In this respect the case seems indistinguishable in facts from the Town and County Bank at Aberdeen, which was the subj of consideration by the First Division of the Court nearly four years ago it were now proposed by the officers of the Inland Revenue to assess the B of Scotland under schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts on the annual profits their business, allowing deduction only of the premises in which the bank bu ness is transacted, but refusing deduction of the portion occupied as a dwelli house by the local manager, they would be violating the rule established in former case of the Town and County Bank by this Court and the House of Lor

That case, however, is not decisive of the present, nor indeed has the one a direct bearing on the other. But the rules of schedule D for ascertaining pro of trade and of professional income afford a good deal of light to guide us in determination of the question now before us. Neither the trader nor the p fessional man is chargeable with tax in respect of the value of any premi occupied for the purposes of the trade or professional business which he carr on. And in estimating his income from his trade or business he is entitled deduct the value of the premises so occupied. But premises or part of premi occupied by the trader or professional man as a residence stand in the oppos category. In framing the balance-sheet of a professional man's business, t

* Quoted infra in opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk.

[1] Town and County Bank, Limited, v. Inland Revenue, March 4, 1887, 14 R 528, aff. (sub nom. Russell v. Town and County Bank), April 26, 1888, 15 R (H. L.) 51; Bent v. Roberts, 1877, L. R., 3 Ex. Div. 66.

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

annual value of such premises cannot be deducted in striking the balance of professional income and expenditure, but must be entered as an item of credit.

In this case the dwelling-house in question is not occupied by the trader, but by his official or servant free of rent. It is therefore within the meaning of the Town and County Bank case occupied for the purpose of the trade or professional business, and forms an item of debit in ascertaining the balance of trade profit or professional income.

But we are dealing here not with the income of the trader or professional man, but with the income of his official or manager.

The question arises in this form. The appellant, who is agent or manager for the Bank of Scotland at Montrose, has an income of £374, exclusive of the annual value of the house, which he holds rent free from the bank. If no account is to be taken of the rent-free house as part of his emoluments, then his income being under £400 he would be entitled in accounting with the Inland Revenue to the abatement of £120 allowed on incomes under £400. But the annual value of his rent-free house is £50, which, if taken into account, would raise his income above £400, and so disentitle him to the abatement demanded.

It was not, as I understand, disputed in argument that the appellant holds an employment or vocation from which he derives profits or gains within the meaning of both schedule D and schedule E of the whole series of Income-Tax Acts. Of what such profits or gains consist we must ascertain from the rules applicable to the second case under schedule D, and to the case of employments under schedule E. Rule second applicable to professions, employments, or vocations under schedule D requires the duty to be "computed at not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits, gains, and emoluments of such professions or vocations." And in the first rule applicable to both the first and second cases under schedule D, "No sum shall be allowed to be set against or deducted from such profits or gains," "for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices," "nor for any sum expended in any other domestic or private purposes distinct from the purposes of such" "profession, employment, or vocation." The first rule under schedule E directs that the duties shall be charged on the persons holding the employments mentioned in the schedule "for all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever accruing by reason of such employment." The fourth rule directs that "the perquisites to be assessed under this Act shall be deemed to be such profits of offices and employments as arise from fees or other emoluments."

The only question therefore is whether the annual value of the rent-free house occupied by the appellant is within the meaning of schedule D part of the "profits, gains, and emoluments," or under schedule E part of his "salary, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever accruing by reason of" his employment as bank-manager.

This question would be somewhat difficult to answer in the abstract, because the circumstances under which a house is occupied rent free may greatly vary, and make the occupation either a clear pecuniary benefit or a heavy burden.

If the employer gives the employee money to pay the rent of his dwelling-house, which he has hired from a third party, merely requiring the employee to report the receipts for rent; or if the employer pays the rent direct to the landlord, it cannot be disputed that the employee receives as part of his salary or wages the amount of the rent.

On the other hand, if the employee is taken bound as part of his contract of

No. 93.
Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

employment personally to occupy a house quite unsuitable for his domesti arrangements, and which may require him to live separately from his wife an family, this would be not a benefit but a burden, and the annual value or ren of the house would form no part of his profits or emoluments.

These are extreme cases. But others may arise between the limits of the extremes, which may create difficulties in the application of the enactment referred to.

The facts of the case before us do not appear to me to present such difficu ties.

On the one hand, the bank-agent is bound to constant occupation, exce when absent with the sanction of the directors, when his place is occupied b another official. He cannot sublet the house. And he is liable to removal bot from his office and his house at any time. In other words, his tenure of offi is at the pleasure of the directors.

On the other hand, we have it distinctly found as matter of fact in the ca stated by the commissioners that the house is suitable in respect of size an accommodation for the appellant, and that if a dwelling-house were not pro vided by the bank he would require to provide a house for himself of simila size. It is not said that a house of similar size could be provided by himself at a less rent than £50, and in the absence of any such statement we cannot assume the fact to be so.

Something was suggested in the argument to the effect that the conditions the tenure of this house were productive of hardship to the appellant as unde restraining his natural liberty in the choice of a place of abode. But this nothing but sentiment, and very fanciful and false sentiment. For I cann conceive anything more desirable for a bank-agent, or more conducive to h comfort and convenience, than that he should be able to occupy a house suitabl to his domestic requirements in immediate vicinity to the centre of his dai labours and duties.

It seems to me a matter of very small importance whether the assessment held to fall more appropriately under the second case of schedule D or und schedule E. It has been in fact made under both, and I have no doubt th both schedules are applicable.

I am therefore for reversing the determination of the Commissioners, a sustaining the assessment.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Your Lordship, in your opinion, has so clearly a fully stated the facts upon which this case must be decided, that I shall n recapitulate them.

The question to be decided upon these facts relates not to assessment but exemption from assessment. It is not the question whether a certain pers assessable income shall be assessed to income-tax, but whether, on its bei assessed, relief shall be given from a portion of the assessment under the S section of the Act 39 and 40 Vict. c. 16. By that clause any person who m be assessed or charged to any of the duties of income-tax, "who shall cla and prove in the manner prescribed by the Acts relating to income-tax that h total income from all sources, although amounting to £150 or upwards, is le than £400, shall be entitled to be relieved from so much of the said duti assessed upon or paid by him as an assessment or charge of the said duties £120 of his income would amount unto." Three things are clear in this ena

No. 93.
Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

ment—first, that it relates to a relief claimed from part of an assessment made, such relief to be allowed either by "deduction or abatement" from the charge as assessed, or repayment of part of an assessment paid; second, that the abatement shall only be given where the claimant's income from all sources, whether assessable to income-tax or not, is less than £400; and third, that the person claiming the abatement must prove the fact that his income from all sources is less than £400. Under the Income-Tax Acts the income of a person in a profession such as that of the bank-agent in this case falls to be computed on the "profits, gains, and emoluments" of such profession under schedule D, and on the "salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever" under schedule E. And in ascertaining the income no deduction is to be made for any premises occupied as a dwelling-house; that is to say, that the amount assessable is not to suffer diminution by reason of part of it being expended in house-rent.

Mr Tennant maintains that although he occupies a dwelling-house which is stated in the case to be a suitable house in size and accommodation for his requirements, which is provided for him rent free by his employers, and which he occupies under his employment by them, the value of his occupation is not to be computed as an emolument—that is, as a profitable advantage—of his employment. He bases his objection on the grounds that his occupancy is imposed on him as part of his duty; that the house is not a dwelling-house but bank premises occupied in connection with the business, and that, in any case, he is entitled to the deduction under the 51st section of the Income-Tax Act of 1853.

The first ground is one plainly not tenable. For it may be necessary for a person to occupy a certain dwelling-house for the proper fulfilment of his duty, while, beyond all possibility of doubt, the provision of the particular house for his occupation may be a most substantial addition to the gains he makes or the emoluments he enjoys in consequence of his being appointed to the office. In my opinion the occupation of the house in this case constitutes a gain to the person obtaining the office to which it is attached, and is a substantial emolument which he enjoys.

The second ground is equally untenable, for the house is provided to Mr Tennant by the bank as a dwelling-house and nothing else, and it is occupied by him solely as a dwelling-house, although in occupying it as such he is doing that which is also of advantage to the bank's business.

The third ground is, I think, sufficiently answered by quoting the terms of the clause itself:—"In assessing the duty chargeable under schedule E of this Act, in respect of any public office or employment where the person exercising the same is necessarily obliged to incur and defray out of the salary, fees, or emoluments of such office or employment, the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties thereof, or of keeping and maintaining a horse to enable him to perform the same, or otherwise to lay out and expend money wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of the duties of his office or employment, it shall be lawful to deduct from the amount of the said salary, fees, and emoluments to be assessed under this Act, the amount of all such expenses and disbursements necessarily incurred and defrayed in manner aforesaid."

Now, in the present case Mr Tennant in occupying this house does not incur expenses or lay out or expend money in the performance of the duties of his employment. I cannot look upon his occupation of the house as a burden,

No. 93.
Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

He has agreed with the bank that he shall receive a certain salary, and have that house rent free, upon condition that he occupies it, it being to the advantage of the bank that he should do so. The case must be dealt with on its own facts, and not on any abstract or general view. It is a question of fact in the particular case whether a person provided with a house by his employer has it value as part of his income from all sources. That a person being a candidate for a position in the employment of a bank should not consider a house provided by the bank as a profit, gain, or emolument of the office in considering whether he will accept the employment, seems to be contrary to common sense. So much salary and a free house constitute the profit, gain, or emolument offered to him, in respect of which he is to give certain services, of which one is, that he shall personally reside in the house. No doubt all his gains, both from salary, commission, and house, are at the pleasure of his employers, who may dismiss him when they please. But it is what a man enjoys, apart altogether from certainty of future enjoyment, upon which he must be assessed for income-tax; and if he in fact enjoys the occupation of a house, I consider that his liability to be removed from the house is no more a ground for holding that its annual value while he does occupy is not a gain of his office, than his liability to lose his whole money income by dismissal is a ground for holding that the money he has received is not a profit or gain of his position. Of course if a citizen has paid income-tax in respect of a salary which he is drawing, and is removed from his office, he is entitled to restitution of such an amount of the duty paid by him on computation as corresponds to what he is deprived of by the loss of his office during the year for which the computation was made. But what he pays upon is what he is at the time of the computation enjoying. The respondent in this case has not been assessed for income-tax upon the annual value of the house which he occupies rent free. There is no question of assessment before us. The question before us is, whether the respondent's income in money having been duly assessed, he is entitled to a deduction from the assessment corresponding to £120 of his income, on the ground that his income from all sources is less than £400 a-year. It is not disputed that if the annual value of the house he occupies rent free is to be held to be a gain or emolument of his office, and therefore to be computed as part of his income, that then his income does exceed £400 a-year. I am of opinion with your Lordship that it is in accordance with the true meaning and intent of the Income-Tax Acts that it should be so computed, and that we should therefore find that the deliverance of the Commissioners was wrong.

LORD YOUNG.—This question, as the Lord Justice-Clerk has accurately pointed out, is not one of assessment but one of exemption from assessment. Your Lordship in the chair, if I rightly followed, dealt with the question as if it were whether the annual value of the bank-agent's house were assessable for income-tax. I think that is also quite accurate. The arguments of your Lordship and the Lord Justice-Clerk go to this, that the annual value of the house which is £50, is part of the gain or emoluments of the bank-agent, and therefore that he is liable to be assessed for income-tax thereon. If so, I distinctly differ from both your Lordships. My opinion is indeed quite the opposite, except indeed upon one point, which is that the case of Russell v. Town and County Bank has no application to the question in this case at all. There the question was only whether the bank's outlay, the cost and charge to the bank of providing an establishment for the agent, must be deducted before ascertaining the profit upon which the bank was to be taxed. It is certain that such expenditure on their premises, including the house in which the agent lodged, was necessary for conducting their business as they did conduct it. If the profit was not sufficient to meet that, there was no profit for the year. That expenditure must all be provided before there could be profit to be divided by the bank.

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

That therefore was a plain question. The view might have been suggested that the bank might have demanded a rent from their officer or anyone else who was occupying their house. But they did not demand any rent, and could not have got any rent without giving their officer just so much more salary, and that would have amounted to just the same thing, for it would have been so much expenditure which would have required to be deducted before any profits were struck. The question here is altogether different. It is not doubtful that a bank-agent occupies a situation, the income of which is subject to be assessed for income-tax. In this instance the emoluments or income of the agent consist of £300 a-year of salary, and £17 of commission. That is his whole income as bank-agent. But he has other income amounting to £57 a-year from invested capital. Upon that he pays tax in the usual way by retention, that is, his debtors deduct income-tax in paying their interest to him. There are thus three sources of income, and it amounts to £374. He pays tax, as I have said, by retention upon £57, and he has been assessed upon the remaining £317. The question is whether the accommodation in the bank buildings is also to be included as part of his income. Is the house part of his income?

Now, I think we must deal with this case as raising a general question, and that it would not be proper to enter upon any question as to the domestic surroundings of the bank-agent in a particular case, as for instance whether he was married or had a family. Such considerations would lead to what are mere questions of sentiment as your Lordship has called them. I avoid them by dealing with the case as one presenting a general question. The first thing to be considered is, what is the establishment of the bank at this place? The bank, which best knows its own business, sees fit to conduct it by having premises such that a responsible agent may live in them. His duty is to give attention to the bank in and out of bank hours, and he has to attend to the safety of the premises and contents by sleeping in a room which is in communication with the safe. The bank further think it right that the agent shall be liable to be dismissed at a moment's notice. Now, the question is whether the accommodation of their servant, so employed, in their premises is part of that servant's income. Some observations were made to us as to his occupation being a thing distinct from his vocation. But it is imperative on him as part of his duty to occupy the house. He must do it in order to earn his salary. Of course he may like it, he may enjoy it as men like and enjoy their employment. Men can hardly be induced in some cases to relinquish even their employment when they have no need at all as a matter of earning their income to remain in it. A bank-agent may enjoy living as this agent is called upon to do. But the occupation is not at all distinct from his vocation. It is given in the course of his vocation, for which he is paid. The case informs us that "the appellant (the agent) is bound as a part of his duty to occupy the house as custodier of the whole premises belonging to the bank, and also for the transaction of any special bank business after bank hours. He is not allowed to vacate the house even for a temporary period unless with the special consent of t directors, who in that case sanction the occupation of the house by another offic of the bank during the absence of the agent. It is imperative that in the abse of the agent some responsible person should occupy the house and attend to t carrying on of the bank's business so far as that may be necessary after bank hou and to the due locking up of the premises, and specially to the security of t cash and books in the bank's safe, communicating with which there is a ni bolt from the agent's bedroom. The annual value of the house so occupied £50. The appellant is not entitled to sublet the bank house or any p thereof, and is not entitled to use it for other than the bank's business, but t appellant, with the tacit consent of the bank, carries on insurance busines the bank's premises." I cannot regard a house so occupied as a free house. is so in the sense that the bank-agent does not pay for it any more than t servants in one's house pay for their bedrooms. I suppose £50 is the valu it according to the Valuation-roll. But could such a rent be got for such a ho if the tenant were told that he must live in it, cannot let it, and that he m be turned out of it without any notice? For a house occupied on such co tions it is clear that the rent stated on the Valuation-roll could not be obt I see quite well that the occupation of the house is an advantage to the ag But it is not income. In like manner the captain of a ship may enjoy t accommodation provided for him in a ship. He may prefer it to any oth But it is not part of his income. I pointed out during the argument th income must be money, or money's worth, convertible into money at t recipient's pleasure. Therefore, if a man had a house worth £50 a-year, wh he could live in or let at his pleasure, that would be money's worth, and if l let it the rent would be income subject to duty. But when he cannot let t house, but it is simply part of the premises in which he must give his perso presence and attendance the case is different. Let me put one or two case which a man must occupy a house, yet it is not income to him. Take a bish Lambeth Palace is a building which the Archbishop of Canterbury must occ for the honour of the Church. But it is not income to him, but a source expense. If he could let it and draw income from it he might get a large su But he cannot. Surely it is not assessable for income-tax. Or take a hou keeper in a large mansion-house put there to keep it. She must live the Her income from her savings and moneys may be close upon £400 a-year, a she has rooms and maintenance in the great house, the value of which pro sions would raise her income above £400 if added. But that is not inco In my opinion, accommodation in premises where business is carried on is n income of the official who occupies the accommodation as part of his duty, a in order to discharge his other duties.

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

I think there is a distinction between the question whether a sum is asse able and whether it is to be taken into account in bringing an income up to above £400 a-year. It was not dwelt upon in argument. Income or profit to be assessed. In considering whether an income is to be considered ov £400 a-year "income from all sources" is to be considered. My view is th the occupation of this house is not income from any source.

A suggestion was made that income from a source abroad though not asses able in this country might be taken into account in considering whether a income exceeded £400 a-year. I concede that, though there is no need here t determine it either way. But that could only be where there is no objection being assessed, except that the income is from abroad. But that cannot aid this argument. This alleged income does not come from abroad.

On the grounds I have stated I am of opinion that the annual value of this house is not part of the appellant's income, and that the abatement ought to be allowed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether Mr Tennant's income from all sources amounts to less than £400 per annum, and that depends upon whether the annual value of the bank house, which is stated to be £50 and is occupied by him rent free, is to be reckoned as part of his income.

Prima facie it would not occur to me that a person's income was increased by his occupying a house rent free. His income no doubt would be more valuable to him by the extent to which he did not require to expend it on house rent or other necessaries, but I do not see that the amount of his income would be thereby in any way altered, although his expenditure would be less.

But however that may be, the question must depend for its solution upon the terms of the assessing Acts. Mr Tennant's income is derived from several sources, but it appears to me that that part of it which he derives from the bank falls to be assessed under schedule E.

The duties granted by that schedule are directed by rule 1 to be charged on persons having, using, or exercising the offices or employments of profit, mentioned in the said schedule, for all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever, accruing by reason of such offices and employments. Rule 3 specifies these offices and employments of profit, and among these there is included any office or employment of profit held under any public corporation, or any company, or society, whether corporate or not corporate.

Mr Tennant holds an office or employment of profit under the Bank of Scotland, which is a public corporation, and he therefore falls to be assessed under this schedule as regards his income from that source. If that be so, then I think he is not assessable under schedule D, because the duties granted under that schedule only apply to every description of property or profits which shall not be contained in either schedule A, B, or C, and to every description of employment of profit not contained in schedule E. If this case were within schedule D at all, it would fall within the second case, but that case relates only to the duty charged in respect of professions, employment, or vocations not contained in any other schedule of the Act. But if I am right in thinking that Mr Tennant's employment of profit is contained in schedule E, then it does not fall within schedule D.

In my view, therefore, we have only to consider the terms of schedule E. Now, schedule E declares that the duties shall be charged on the persons holding such offices or employments "for all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever accruing by reason of such offices, employments, &c." I think that if the annual value of the house is to be treated as assessable income it must be brought under one or other of these words. Now, the word "salary" seems to me to imply a money payment. If Mr Tennant were asked how much he got from the bank, he would probably, and I think quite correctly, answer so much salary and a free house. So the words "fees" and "wages" imply money payments, and can have no reference to the annual value of the house. The next word is "perquisites," and I think that if it had been intended that such advantages or emoluments as a free house should be treated as assessable income, that it would have fallen under this word, but rule 4 explains what we are to regard as "perquisites" in the sense of the Act. It is there said that "the perquisites to be assessed under this Act shall be deemed to be such profits of offices and employments as arise from fees or other emoluments, and payable either by the Crown or the subject in the course of executing such offices or employments." Now, this free house may be said to be, in one sense, an emolument received by Mr Tennant in respect of his office—but does it at all answer the description of an emolument payable by the Crown or the subject? Is it possible to say that the annual value of the house is paid by the bank to Mr Tennant? I think not. I cannot think therefore that the annual value of the house falls under the word "perquisites," as interpreted by the statute.

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

The only other word used is "profits," and it also appears to me to refer to money only. I think accordingly that the Act treats as income only money payments made to the recipient, or it may be immediately convertible into money.

The manner in which the duties are directed to be dealt with in rule 3 also appears to me to point in the same direction. That rule declares that in all cases where any salaries, wages, or other perquisites or profits shall be payable at any public office, which includes such an office as the Bank of Scotland, the duties chargeable under the Act in respect of such salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits shall be detained and stopped out of the same, or out of any money which shall be payable upon such salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits, and be applied to the satisfaction of the duties on such offices or employments in the manner directed by the Act.

I do not see how the duties could be detained or stopped out of perquisites, emoluments, or profits, which are not money perquisites, emoluments, or profits.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the annual value of the house in question ought not to be reckoned as part of Mr Tennant's income, assessable for income-tax, and that therefore the deliverance of the Commissioners ought to be affirmed.

I only wish further to add that I doubt whether the house ought to be considered an emolument at all, or whether it is not more of the nature of a burden. It is true that its annual value is stated in the case to be £50. It is not stated what that value is, but I suppose it is the value appearing in the Valuation-roll, or the value which such a house would fetch in the market. If that be so, and if the house is to be treated as an emolument of the office, then I think that that is not the true criterion of value in this case. The question is, what is the value to Mr Tennant? and looking to the terms and conditions on which he is bound to occupy the house, its value to him cannot possibly be the same as if he were free to let in the market or turn it into money.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord President. I wish only to add one observation in order to make it quite clear that, in my opinion, the question does not depend on the possibility of assessing the bank-agent in respect of his occupation of the bank-house. The bank-agent is not entitled to claim the benefit of the statutory abatement unless his "income from all sources" is less than £400 per annum. The word "income" is not here used in any technical sense. In my opinion it includes income from foreign estates although such estate may not be assessable under the Income-Tax Acts, and see no reason why "income" in this use of the word should not include income derived from estate within the United Kingdom, although the enjoyment of such estate may not in that particular case be assessable for income-tax. I only use this illustration to shew that there may be income which is not assessable, and yet which everyone would admit ought to be taken into account in considering whether the abatement can be claimed.

The question is, whether the occupation of the bank-house is a source of income in the sense of the statute. It is certainly a source of income in the economic sense. Its value to the agent is £50 per annum, which I take to be part of his income, although it comes to him not in the form of money but of money's worth. I cannot agree that the conditions of the bank-agent's occupancy are comparable with domestic services. I think the bank-agent is not in the position of a person whose income from all sources is less than £400 a-year, and he is therefore not entitled to the abatement given to persons in that position.

LORD TRAYNER.—The appellant, Mr Tennant, is agent for the Bank of Scotland in Montrose, and receives from the bank a yearly salary, or, as it is called in the case before us, "a stated income" of £300. He has income from other sources amounting to £74. As bank-agent he has also the occupancy as a dwelling-house of part of the bank's premises, and this house is said to be of the yearly value of £50. Mr Tennant, maintaining that his income from all sources does not amount to £400, claims that in estimating the amount of income-tax payable by him he shall have the abatement allowed to those persons whose income does not amount to £400 per annum. This claim the Commissioners have allowed, and the question we have to decide is whether the determination of the Commissioners is right.

If the yearly value of the dwelling-house is regarded as part of Mr Tennant's income, then he is not entitled to any abatement, for in that case his income exceeds £400 a-year. On the other hand, if the value of the house is not regarded as part of his income, Mr Tennant is entitled to the abatement which he claims.

I think it of importance to keep in view the conditions under which Mr Tennant occupies the house in question. It is not optional to him to occupy the house or not, according as his desire or convenience dictates. It is required of him "as part of his duty" to occupy the house as custodier of the whole premises belonging to the bank, and "for the transaction of any special bank business after bank hours"; he is not permitted to vacate it even for a temporary period without the special consent of the directors; he may not sublet the whole or any part of it; he must not use it for other than the bank's business; he may be required to remove from it, even while he remains the bank's servant, "at any time," and if he ceases to be the bank's servant, he is obliged "forthwith to flit and remove" from the premises. I note these facts to shew that the nature and conditions of Mr Tennant's occupancy are very different from the usual conditions attending the ordinary tenancy of a dwelling-house. They appear to me to shew that the occupancy of the house is not in any sense an emolument or benefit attached to the office which Mr Tennant holds, but rather that such occupancy is a condition or obligation which must be observed and fulfilled by him (along with others no doubt) in order to his earning the salary of £300 a-year, which the bank pays him for all the services he renders or duties he performs. His occupancy of the house, as custodier of the whole bank premises, and for performance of bank business after bank hours, is just as much a part of his duty or service, in return for which his salary is paid, as his occupancy of the agent's or manager's room in which he performs bank business during bank hours.

No. 93.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Tennant v. Inland Revenue.

Apart from this view, and assuming it to be unsound, the question remains, under what provisions in the statute is Mr Tennant chargeable for the value of the house as income upon which income-tax is chargeable? In Russell's case (1 R. 528), the Lord President expressed the opinion that it falls within the provisions of schedule E, while in the same case in the House of Lords Lord Herschell said (15 R. 51, H. L.), "that the liability, if it exists, is not under schedule E, but under schedule D, case 2." I am humbly of opinion that the Lord President's view is the right one, at all events in so far as the salary derived from the bank is concerned, but as this difference of opinion has been expressed, both schedules must be examined to see under which, if either, the liability exists. Schedule E provides that income-tax shall be exigible from "all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits" accruing from employment. I think it plain that the words "salaries, fees, wages," are nothing else than money payments received by the servant in return for his service; and the Lord President has clearly shewn in Russell's case that the word "profits" means pecuniary gain. "Perquisites" might be regarded in some circumstances as including something other than money payments. But the statute interprets this word so that there is no room for doubt as to what it means. "The perquisites (rule 4) to be assessed under this Act shall be deemed to be such profits of offices and employments as arise from fees or other emoluments, and payable either by the Crown or the subject," &c. So that perquisites, just like salaries, fees, wages, and profits, are things payable to the recipient. Now, the right, or privilege, or duty, of occupying the house in question cannot be said to be anything payable to Mr Tennant, and therefore, in my opinion, there is no liability imposed on him for income-tax in respect of the value of the house in question under schedule E.

Under schedule D (case 2) income-tax is chargeable on "the full amount of the balance of the profits, gains, and emoluments of such professions, employments, or vocations, after making such deductions and no other as by this Act are allowed," &c. Here again the words used (which are synonymous) to designate the kind of income which is chargeable are words descriptive of money payments. They represent just the money profits or gains derived from profession or vocation. It is out of them that those sums are paid, expended or disbursed, which are allowed as deductions in estimating or ascertaining the net income on which duty is to be paid. I think it impossible to read the Income-tax Acts in any other sense than as meaning that income-tax—a money tax—is to be chargeable on, and paid in respect of, and out of, the money gains by the person chargeable. The right to occupy the house in question cannot be so described. It is not, in my opinion, in any proper sense income, and I am of opinion therefore that the determination of the Commissioners is right.

THIS interlocutor was thereafter pronounced in the Second Division:—"In respect of the opinions of the majority of the Judges present at the hearing, reverse the decision of the Commissioners of Income-tax, and sustain the assessment."

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—D. CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Agents.

GUINNESS, MAHON, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Asher—Ure.
JAMES GOODWIN & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Murray—Kennedy.

No. 94.

Jan. 21, 1891.*
Guinness, Mahon, & Co. v. Coats Iron and Steel Co.

Process—Amendment of Record—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29.—After a judgment had been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary against the defenders in an action, certain defenders, after reclaiming, moved the Court to allow them to amend the record to the effect of stating an entirely new defence, on payment of all expenses already incurred in the action.

Held (1) that under sec. 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868,† the Court were bound to allow the amendment on such conditions as to the Court should seem proper; and (2) that the amendment should be allowed on payment of the expenses already incurred by the pursuers.

2D DIVISION. Lord Trayner. M.

MESSRS GUINNESS, MAHON, & COMPANY, bankers, Dublin, raised an action, concluding for payment of £6000, against (1) the Coats Iron and Steel Company and the individual partners thereof, and (2) James Goodwin & Company, and James Goodwin, John Goodwin, David Goodwin, Robert Boyd Goodwin, John Topping Goodwin, and David Boyd Goodwin, the individual partners of the said latter firm. The pursuers averred that they were holders for value of certain promissory-notes, all dated 16th April 1889, which were granted by the defenders, the Coats Iron and Steel Company and James Goodwin & Company, in favour of Hume Webster, Hoare, & Company, London, "payable at the Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, Cornhill, London, E.C., on 19th July 1889."

The action was not defended by the Coats Iron and Steel Company, but William Jardine, one of the partners of that firm, appeared and lodged defences, which he afterwards withdrew.

Defences were lodged for the partners of the firm of James Goodwin & Company (other than John Topping Goodwin), in which, besides explaining the circumstances in which the promissory-notes were granted, they averred that various sums had been paid to Hume Webster & Company to account, leaving only a balance of £2028 unpaid, and payment of that sum was accordingly tendered. They also (ans. 2) averred that "all of said promissory-notes were made payable in London, and were only signed as follows:—'Coats Iron and Steel Co., William Jardine, partner, James Goodwin & Co.' By the law of England none of said notes import any liability on these defenders, et separatim, none of them import any joint and several liability on the defenders." They also averred (stat. 6) a

---

* Decided Jan. 20, 1891.

† The Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, enacts,—"The Court or the Lord Ordinary may at any time amend any error or defect in the record or issues in any action or proceeding in the Court of Session upon such terms, as to expenses and otherwise, as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made: Provided always that it shall not be competent by amendment of the record or issues under this Act to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading, unless all the parties interested shall consent to such amendment: And provided also that no such amendment shall have the effect of validating diligence used on the dependence of the action so as to prejudice the rights of creditors of the defender interested in defeating such diligence, but shall be operative to the effect of obviating any objections to such diligence when stated by the defender himself, or by any person representing him, by a title or in the right of a debt contracted by him subsequent to the execution of such diligence."

No. 94.

Jan. 21, 1891. Guinness, Mahon, & Co. v. Coats Iron and Steel Co.

special agreement with the pursuers, entered into in January 1890, to accept a promissory-note for £3500 and a cash payment of £500 in full of their claim.

They pleaded;—(3) In respect of the terms of the said promissory-notes, and that by the law of England the same import no liability on the defenders, et separatim, no joint and several liability, the defenders should be assoilzied. (4) In respect of the agreement condescended on by the defenders, they should be assoilzied.

John Topping Goodwin adopted the statements and pleas of the other defenders, but averred in addition that he had ceased to be a partner of the firm of James Goodwin & Company prior to 19th April 1889, when the notes were granted; and pleaded (2) that the said promissory-notes not having been granted by the defender or any firm of which he was a member, he should be assoilzied. In consequence, however, of a decision in another case that he was still a member of the firm at that date, he withdrew this special defence.

A proof was led, and on 19th July 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) decerned against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders James Goodwin, John Goodwin, Robert Boyd Goodwin, David Boyd Goodwin, and John Topping Goodwin reclaimed, and craved permission to amend the record. The purport of the proposed amendment was to withdraw the whole of the original defence on which the proof had been led, and to substitute averments to the effect that the firm of James Goodwin & Company had ceased to exist from and after 31st March 1889 for all purposes except that of winding up; that none of the defenders had signed or authorised the signature of the firm name James Goodwin & Company, to the promissory-notes or any of them; and that the notes were granted, without the knowledge of these defenders, by the defenders William Jardine and Matthew Dean Goodwin, and after the said firm had ceased to exist except for the purpose of winding up.

They proposed to add the following pleas, viz.:—(1) The signature of James Goodwin & Company to the promissory-notes sued on having been unauthorised by these defenders, they are not liable thereon. (2) The firm of James Goodwin & Company having ceased to exist prior to the granting of the said notes, the said signature is not binding on these defenders or any of them.

Argued for the reclaimers;—This new defence was one on which, if the facts averred were true, they were bound to prevail.[1] The only question was whether judicial admissions did or did not preclude the defence. These, however, were not enough for the decision of the case. It was one thing to admit the debt; quite another to admit the authority to grant bills. There was a good answer to Hume Webster & Company, viz., that money was duly paid to them, and an answer to them, apart from negotiable instruments, would be good against anybody in their right. What was asked was leave to amend only on payment of all expense caused by this defence not having been originally stated, and, if that were refused, substantial justice between the parties would not be done.[2] This was not a mere reverting to John Topping Goodwin's original defence. He denied, it was true, having given authority, on the ground that he was out of the firm, not on the ground that the bills could not be signed during the liquidation, and when in another case there was a judgment settling that he was still a partner of James Goodwin & Company, he put in a minute withdrawing this defence.

[1] Goodwin v. Industrial and General Trust, Limited, Dec. 6, 1890, supra, p. 193.

[2] Cf. Gelot v. Stewart, March 4, 1870, 8 Macph. 649, 42 Scot. Jur. 321.

No. 94.

Jan. 21, 1891.

Guinness, Mahon, & Co. v. Coats Iron and Steel Co.

Argued for the respondents;—The defenders adopted and paid nearly the whole of the notes. Assuming the competency of such amendment as was asked, no sufficient reason had been given for this change of front. If the amendment were allowed, the result would be that a man who wanted delay would merely have to state a bad defence, and after judgment had been pronounced against him, come and start a new and seemingly sound defence. The case of Gelot was very special. There a new ground of liability emerged in the proof, and so a new trial was allowed. There was absolutely no precedent for allowing a record to be opened up, and amended to the extent of contradicting judicial admissions on which judgment had proceeded.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When this reclaiming note for James Goodwin & Company came before us the reclaimers indicated that on the pleadings as then existing they could have no case, and they asked that they might be allowed to amend the record. The statement which was made to us of that proposed amendment very plainly indicated that practically the whole of the record as it existed was to be set aside in so far as it raised a question between the parties—a new question altogether was to be set up by the amendment. That was so very strong a motion, and one which hitherto, as far as I know, has never been dealt with judicially in the Inner-House—although I understand such a motion has been made in the Outer-House, and made successfully—that we thought it desirable to take time to consider whether or not so sweeping an alteration of the pleadings in a case could be made consistently with the Court of Session Act of 1868; but after considering the statute, and in particular clause 29, which relates to this matter, I have come to be of opinion that such an amendment may be made. The clause is to the effect that "the Court or the Lord Ordinary may at any time amend any error or defect in the record or issues in any action or proceeding in the Court of Session, upon such terms as to expenses and otherwise as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made." That appears to me to be a most general and comprehensive enactment, that where a case has been brought into Court, and where an alteration of the record is necessary for the purpose of enabling the real question between the parties to be decided in that action, such amendment shall be allowed upon conditions. And the comprehensiveness of the clause I think is brought into very sharp relief by the portion of the clause which follows, and which appears to me to be the only restriction which is put upon the broad power and duty of the Court to allow the record to be amended and put into such shape as shall really shew the question between the parties,—"It shall not be competent by amendment of the record or issues under this Act to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading, unless all the parties interested shall consent to such amendment." It seems to me that the Legislature carefully guarded against allowing the scope of the pleading to be enlarged, while on the other hand making it quite clear that the statement necessary to bring out what should really try the question between the parties was ordered to be allowed, because the words are not "may be so made," but "shall be so made." Therefore I have come to be of opinion that the reclaimers here must be allowed to make the amendment upon the record which they propose. The conditions of course are a totally different question, and in this case I do not think it would be doing justice to the opposite party to make any other condition than that the reclaimers must pay the whole previous expenses of the cause.

No. 94.

Jan. 21, 1891. Guinness, Mahon, & Co. v. Coats Iron and Steel Co.

LORD YOUNG.—I quite understood that the defenders who make this motion offered to pay the whole expenses as the condition of the amendment being allowed, and if they had not, I should have been for allowing the amendment only upon that condition. The case is brought upon a question which is capable of being very briefly stated. The statute not only authorises but requires that any amendment shall be allowed which is in the opinion of the Court necessary in order to decide in the existing action the real question in controversy between the parties. Now, it appears from the statement made to us in support of the motion to allow an amendment, that the real question in controversy between the parties does not appear upon the record as it stands at all. Now, it is a question worthy of consideration whether the Legislature does not mean that if the Court shall think an amendment necessary in order to determine the real question in controversy between the parties as it is to be gathered from the imperfect and inaccurate record, it shall be allowed, but not a question which that record does not suggest at all. I am not disposed so to limit it. The case for a pursuer is simple enough. If he discovers that he has put his action upon a wrong ground, or if he discovers his true ground of action, which had only dawned upon him after the record was closed, his course is to abandon his action and bring another. But a defender cannot do that, where he discovers at a late stage that his only defence has not been stated at all, unless an amendment by which that only real defence may be put on the record shall be allowed. But is that the real question in controversy between the parties? I think it is, notwithstanding that the defective, imperfect, or inaccurate record did not disclose or suggest it in any way. Upon the explanation made to the Court in support of the motion for amendment, the defence proposed to be put upon record raises the only question in controversy between the parties, or raises the real question in controversy between the parties, and I think the considerations of justice upon which the provision of the statute is founded require that that amendment shall be allowed. The statute not only permits it but requires it upon terms which shall sufficiently guard the interests of the other party. The only consideration which could be urged against it would be that it was made for the purpose of delay. I am not in this case inclined to listen to that. I do not think it is meant for the purpose of delay. It may be very rapidly tried, and the satisfying of the condition as to expenses shews that the motion is made in all seriousness. I concur with your Lordship that the amendment may be made, and that it ought to be made. I think that under the statute it is imperative upon us to make it upon the conditions we think necessary.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The amendment proposed in this case is no doubt a very radical one, but I agree with your Lordships in thinking that it is of the character of those amendments which section 29 of the Act of 1868 directs. I am of opinion that the Court must allow the amendment upon the conditions proposed.

No. 94.

Jan. 21, 1891.
Guinness, Mahon, & Co. v. Coats Iron and Steel Co.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the amendments proposed by the defenders James Goodwin and others, and by the defender John Topping Goodwin, Nos. 223 and 224 of process, allow said amendments to be made by said defenders on payment by them to the pursuers of the expenses of the action hitherto incurred; remit the same to the Auditor to tax and to report; further, allow said amendments to be answered by the pursuers within eight days."

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—MACKERSY & MUNRO, W.S.—Agents.

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891.
Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

LORD ELIBANK AND OTHERS (Lord Elibank's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Murray—C. N. Johnston.

HENRY WALTER HOPE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—Dundas—Sym.

Teinds—Subvaluation—Decree of approbation.—A report of subcommissioners of teinds has no effect as a valuation until it has been approved by the High Commission or by the Court of Teinds.

Jurisdiction—Teind Court—Reduction of locality subject to qualification.—In 1888 the proprietor of the lands of B. obtained decree of approbation of a report by subcommissioners in 1630 valuing his teinds. In 1890 he brought a reduction of a locality approved final in 1868, in which a stipend in excess of the teinds as reported to be the value in the subvaluation of 1630 had been localled upon his lands. He sought to have the locality set aside as erroneous ab initio, on the ground that the teinds were valued by the subcommissioners in 1630, and that their report had been eventually approved by the Court of Teinds.

The Court of Teinds granted decree of reduction, but the decree "to have effect only from and after the date of the decree of approbation, 16th July 1888, for the second half of the crop of 1888, and in all time coming."

TEIND COURT. 1ST DIVISION. Ll. Kyllachy. Teind Clerk.

IN 1886 Lord Elibank and others, trustees acting under a trust-disposition granted by his Lordship, brought an action against Lord Wemyss, the titular, and the Rev. John Hart, minister of the parish of Aberlady, concluding for approbation of a subvaluation, dated 10th May 1630, of the teinds of the lands of Ballencreiff (with certain exceptions) and of the lands of Lochiehill, lying in the parish of Aberlady.

The pursuers averred that the teinds of these lands had been valued by the Subcommissioners for the Presbytery of Haddington in 1630, and that the existence of the subvaluation first came to their knowledge and to that of the other heritors in Aberlady in the year 1885, the teinds in question having for a long time been believed to be unvalued.

By decree of the Court of Teinds, pronounced in a process of augmentation, modification, and locality at the instance of the minister on the 13th and 20th March 1868, the whole of the augmentation had been localled on Lord Elibank's lands of Ballencreiff, with the result that there was localled upon the lands in question from and after that date a sum in excess of the teind as valued in the subvaluation.

On 16th July 1888 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords . . . ratify, allow, and approve of the report of the Subcommissioners of the Presbytery of Haddington libelled on, so far as regards the lands libelled: Find and declare accordingly in terms of the conclusions of the libel, but reserving to the minister such rights as he has acquired by prescription or otherwise to stipend in excess of the teind as valued in said report."—(See report of the case in 15 R. 927.)

On 18th January 1889 the same pursuers brought an action against the Rev. John Hart and other persons, amongst whom was Mr Hope, of Luffness, to have the decree of locality, dated 13th and 20th March 1868, reduced and declared "to have been from the beginning, to be now, and in all time coming, null and void and of no avail, force, strength, or effect in judgment or outwith the same in time coming," and to have the pursuers "reponed and restored thereagainst in integrum." The summons further concluded that the Court ought to local anew the stipend modified in 1868 to the minister and his successors in office, in the said process of augmentation, modification, and locality raised at his instance, in which the said decree was pronounced, and that upon the teinds of the lands in the parish in the order and proportions in which they respectively were liable for the same and in the same manner as if the said process were still in dependence and no final decree had been pronounced.

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891. Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

The pursuers averred that there were no free teinds of the estate of Belencrieff when the decree of locality sought to be reduced was pronounced in 1868, and that there were sufficient free teinds belonging to other heritors in the parish to pay the augmentation granted to the minister. The pursuers further reserved right to sue before the proper Court for repetition from the other heritors in the parish of all stipend paid by them and their authors in respect of the augmentation.

Of the defenders called Mr Hope and the Earl of Wemyss compeared but the question with the latter was settled. Mr Hope did not object to decree of reduction being pronounced, but pleaded;—2. In the event of any decree of reduction being pronounced, it should be so qualified as to exclude all claim by the pursuers against the present defender for repetition of stipend paid by the pursuers under the said decree of locality in respect (1) the said payments were made under a final decree of locality, (2) the pursuers were parties to the process in which the said final decree was pronounced; (3) all parties have acted, with the acquiescence of the pursuers, on the footing that the said decree of locality finally fixed the measure of their liability.

On 19th June 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the interlocutor:—"Repels the defences for the whole defenders: Reduces decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Ordains the locality now set aside to stand as an interim rule of payment to the minister until furnished with a new locality, and remits to the Clerk to prepare a locality accordingly, and report: Finds the defender Mr Hope liable to the pursuers in expenses so far as occasioned by his appearance in the action," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—In this case the only defender who now appears is Mr Hope, of Luffness. He does not object to the decree of reduction; at least no argument against the reduction was submitted on his behalf. But he contends that the decree should be qualified by a reservation to the effect that the existing locality should remain the rule of payment of stipend up to the date of decree of reduction being pronounced. His object, of course, is to obviate claims against him at the instance of the pursuer for overpayments of stipend since the locality was approved final in March 1868.

"I do not doubt that it is competent—that is to say, that it is in accordance with the practice of the Court of Teinds—to qualify a reduction of a locality in the way proposed. This appears to be settled by the case of Duncan v. Brown, 10 R. p. 332, and the report by the Clerk of Teinds, which was in that case furnished to the Court. But in the present case I do not consider that the circumstances call for such a reservation. It is here ascertained that the pursuers have during the whole period of the locality under reduction been paying stipend out of stock. In other words, the valuation on which the reduction proceeds is a valuation made so far back as 1630, although only discovered and approved by the High Court in 1888.

"The case is therefore not at all the same as if the reduction had proceeded

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891. Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

Mr Hope reclaimed, and argued;—The judgment of the Lord Ordinary, as explained in his Lordship's opinion, was a judgment to the effect that not only must the decree of reduction be unqualified, but that it would expose the defender to claims for overpayments of stipend since the locality was approved final in 1868. The defender was therefore not in safety to acquiesce in that judgment, although he admitted that the decree must be reduced. He was entitled to a qualification finding that the new locality should take effect only from and after 1888, when the decree of approbation of the sub-report of 1630 was pronounced. Until 1888 there was no valuation of the teinds, but only a report, which stood unapproved. The locality of 1868 was therefore not only unchallenged but was quite right; but nevertheless the conclusion of the summons was that it should be held null and void from the beginning. It was said by the pursuers that the Teind Court had no concern with questions between heritors as to overpayments, these being money claims to be decided in the Courts of law, and therefore that the decree must be unqualified. That view of the nature of such claims was admitted, but not the inference which the pursuers drew from it. The Court which was competent to grant an absolute reduction was competent to grant it subject to a qualification. Further, such a qualification was according to teind practice. That was shewn by the print prepared by the Clerk of Teinds for the information of the Court in Duncan v. Brown.[1] In that case, which related to overpayments, the majority of the Court read an unqualified decree of reduction as being substantially a qualified decree, and there were opinions that the decree might properly have been qualified by the Teind Court. The case of Weatherstone,[2] assuming its authority to be unimpeached by subsequent cases,[3] shewed that where overpayments had been made under an interim locality, there was an implied contract among the heritors that subsequently their rights were to be adjusted, but that did not apply to payments under a final locality. It was equitable that the qualification contended for should here be introduced, for the pursuer could have obtained his decree of valuation long before 1886. Indeed, in the judgment by which he obtained it, it was held to be proved[4] that if the pursuers had made diligent inquiry they would probably have discovered the subvaluation. But it was only in 1886 that the pursuers first moved in the matter. Meantime the other heritors had on a valuation led, say in 1888, which could have been no criterion, or at all events, no certain criterion, of the previous value of the pursuer's teinds, and particularly of their value when the locality was established in 1868.

---

"In that state of the facts it might be quite proper that, as in the case of Duncan, the decree of reduction should be qualified so as only to operate from its date, but here I have not been able to see any sufficient reason why it should not operate retro; nor was any authority quoted to me for making the suggested reservation in a case like the present, where it has been ascertained that the locality has been from the first, and all along, erroneous. I must therefore repel the whole defences, and grant decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

[1] Duncan v. Brown, Dec. 8, 1882, 10 R. 332. The print referred to will be found in the Session Papers in this case.

[2] Weatherstone v. Marquis of Tweeddale, Nov. 12, 1833, 12 S. 1, 6 Scot. Jur. 89.

[3] Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell's Trustees, et al. July 18, 1877, 4 R. 1126, revd. April 15, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 119; Earl of Fife v. Duff, Dec. 23, 1887, 15 R. 238.

[4] Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hart, July 16, 1888, 15 R. 927, per Lord Adam, 934.

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891. Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

bona fide consumed their teinds, and the principle of bona fide consumption was applicable.[1]

Argued for the pursuers;—The defender had no legitimate reason for defending the action. The only question was whether he was entitled to have the decree qualified. It was no doubt true that, until approved by the High Commission, the report of the subcommissioners had no legal effect. Once, however, it was approved, it found as a fact that the pursuers' lands had all along been valued since 1630. The decree of reduction could not injure the defender in any action in the civil Court as Duncan v. Brown shewed. The opinion of the Lord Ordinary was against him, for his Lordship held that the reduction would operate res. The Court of Teinds would only interpone authority to a sub-report ministerially. It would also reduce a locality based upon error if found to be wrong, but without intruding on the province of the civil Court to regulate money questions between heritors. Questions of overpayments were mere questions of civil debt. The defence was therefore irrelevant.

Lord President.—A good deal of the argument which we have heard depended upon what is the true character of the report of the subcommissioners which was issued by them for the valuation of the teinds of the lands of Ballencrieff. The heritor was the party to come forward and have the teinds valued, and accordingly led evidence, and the effect might be either favourable or unfavourable to him. He might have found that upon the report of the subcommissioners less stipend was due than hitherto upon the unvalued lands, and, on the other hand, he might have found, and did find, that he took no benefit by the report, but that, on the contrary, he would have been better off as a heritor with unvalued teinds, paying one-fifth part of the rent. Now, there was no obligation on the heritor to carry on the matter further unless he was desirous, and of course he would not do so if he found the report of the subcommissioners adverse to him.

There are a number of cases referred to in the books in which such reports have been acted on by all concerned, and so have come to receive the same effect as if a decree of approbation had been pronounced.

In the ordinary case, until the report has been approved of by the High Commission, it has no effect at all. No one knows anything about it beyond the subcommissioners and heritors, and, it may be, the procurator-fiscal of Court. It remains a dead letter until someone gives it vitality by getting it approved by the High Commission, and the only person who can do this is the heritor. There is no one else I am aware of who is entitled to pursue a summons of approbation of the subvaluation.

The conclusion seems, I think, necessarily to follow that the report of the subcommissioners is of no practical avail whatever until it is approved. It may be acted upon, but no one can be forced to act upon it, or be subject to liability under it. In short, it remains entirely dormant. It seems curious that the statute of Charles I. (Statute 1633, c. 19) did not limit the time within which the subvaluation was to be approved if it was to be operative. But so it is, and accord-

[1] Cuthbert v. Waldie, Jan. 24, 1840, 2 D. 447, 12 Scot. Jur. 296, and Magistrates of Montrose v. King's College of Aberdeen, Nov. 12, 1834, reported in note, p. 457 of 2 D.; Haldane v. Ogilvy, Nov. 8, 1871, 10 Macph. 62, 44 Scot. Jur. 32; Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell's Trustees, et al. supra, note 3.

[2] Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell's Trustees, supra; Earl of Fife v. Duff, supra.

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891.
Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

ingly subvaluations have sometimes been approved at a distance of centuries beyond the time at which the reports were actually made.

The conclusion I therefore come to is that the report of the subvaluation has no practical legal effect until it is approved of by the High Commission: it is really a document of no legal existence.

If that is so, when did this subvaluation come into existence and receive effect? That is easily answered,—on the 16th of July 1888. It had no existence, and could receive no effect, before that date, and therefore that is the date at which it became for the first time a valuation of the teinds in question.

Now, the ground upon which the decree of locality is sought to be set aside here is that the heritor has been made to pay more than he had to pay under the old subvaluation. But the teinds were not valued till 16th July 1888, because there was no valuation before that date. His teinds were before that unvalued, and he was just in the same position as every other heritor whose teinds were unvalued. His valuation of teinds must consequently, in my opinion, date from 1888. From all this I arrive at the conclusion that this decree of reduction must be qualified in some way in order to do justice to the parties, because as it stands now it might be read—though not necessarily—as meaning that the reduction of the final decree of locality proceeded upon the footing that this heritor had made overpayments since 1630. If the reasoning I have been endeavouring to state is conclusive, then that is just what he has not been doing. He has not overpaid anything until 1888, when the subvaluation was approved. The decree of reduction, then, must, I think, be qualified by some such words as these—"This decree shall have effect only from and after the decree of approbation of 1888 for the second half of the crop of 1888 and in all time coming."

Lord Adam.—No one disputes that the decree of locality in 1868 is to be reduced. The only question is whether the decree in the action of reduction is to be qualified by such additional words as are proposed, to the effect that it is only to receive effect from and after the 16th July 1888, the date of the decree of approbation.

The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it is competent thus to qualify the decree, for he says in his note,—"I do not doubt that it is competent—that is to say, that it is in accordance with the practice of the Court of Teinds—to qualify a reduction of a locality in the way proposed. This appears to be settled by the case of Duncan v. Brown, 10 R. 332, and the report by the Clerk of Teinds which was in that case furnished to the Court." We are at one with his Lordship on the question of competency. But then the Lord Ordinary goes on to say.—"But in the present case I do not consider that the circumstances call for such a reservation. It is here ascertained that the pursuers have during the whole period of the locality under reduction been paying stipend out of stock. In other words, the valuation on which the reduction proceeds is a valuation made so far back as 1630, although only discovered and approved by the Court in 1888." Now, these words shew wherein lies the Lord Ordinary's misapprehension. He has treated the approbation of the report of the Subcommissioners as if it had the same effect as a decree of the High Commission at the date of the report of the Subcommissioners. It is obvious that the teinds of the lands in question were never valued until 1888, because the effect of that decree of approbation of 1888 was for the first time to

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891.
Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

value those teinds, and from that date only the stock and teinds in the lands i question were separated. If that is so, then during the long period down 1888 the teinds were unvalued, and were rightly estimated as at one-fifth of t rent. There was therefore nothing wrong in the valuation of the teinds co tained in the scheme of locality of 1868, and it was only in 1888 that th scheme of locality ceased to contain a proper allocation on the teinds of L Elibank's lands.

Now, as to the competency of qualifying the decree in the manner propos as I have said, I entertain no doubt. The question, I think, depends upon wh is the fact which requires the final scheme of locality to be altered. It may such a fact as the discovery of a valuation of the High Commission of a d preceding that of the final scheme. If that is so, it may well be that you cann qualify the decree by stating a date from which it is to receive effect later th the date of augmentation granted, because where that is the state of the fact is obvious that during the whole period there has been an encroachment up the stock of the heritor's lands which there ought not to have been. Wh we deal with the particular fact here, and see that the lands were for the fir time valued in 1888, I think the inference we derive from that fact leads t this, that the decree of approbation shall not have any effect except from i own date.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and only desire to add that I think the s solution of the question is to be found in an observation which was made Lord Kinnear in the course of the argument, to the effect that the Act of t Scottish Parliament gave every landed proprietor the option of paying stipe according to the actual rental of his lands or according to a valuation to be as tained by a public commission. The Act further declared that until a perman valuation was made the annual value of the teinds should be one-fifth of the rent These considerations make it plain that the scheme of locality, which was m up prior to the valuation of the particular lands by the decree of approbation a scheme in accordance with the Act of Parliament. Payments under it legal payments, and are not liable to be altered or rectified by any author It follows that the present decree must be qualified in the way your Lords has suggested.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The summons assumes that decree of locality which it is proposed to reduce was erroneous at its date, beca it has now been ascertained by a decree of approbation in 1888 of a report Subcommissioners in 1630 that the teinds of Ballencrieff were not of the va of which they were believed to be when the locality was made final in 1868.

I agree with all your Lordships in thinking that the report of the Su commissioners was ineffectual until approved by the Teind Court. It follo that the decree of approbation did not fix the value of the teinds of Lord Elib for the past but only for the future, and therefore the decree does not ascert that the locality of 1868 was erroneous, but only that the stipend payable o of teinds of the pursuer's lands as then allocated is in excess of the amount wh he is liable to pay in the future. It follows therefore that the allocation ma by the decree of locality ought not to be altered for the period prior to that da because it was up to that time a perfectly right decree. The teind of the pursu was fixed by law at a fifth part of the rent for the time being until the consta rent should be ascertained, and the constant rent was not ascertained until the decree of approbation had been pronounced. The decree of reduction must therefore be qualified in the manner proposed.

No. 95.

Jan. 23, 1891.
Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hope.

As to the competency, I am of opinion that it is not only competent for us to determine whether the decree we are now to pronounce should be qualified in the manner proposed, but that this is a question for this Court alone. It is for the Court of Teinds to fix the respective liabilities of the heritors in a process of locality, and that is all we are asked to do. The pursuer is to substitute a new locality for that which was declared final in 1868, and we are now to determine whether the stipend should be allocated according to the new scheme or according to the old scheme during the period between the last augmentation and 1888. That is a question of locality which in my judgment is competent for the Court of Teinds alone. If our decision had been adverse to the defender, the pursuers might have raised an action for repetition of overpayments in the Court of Session, and in that action the defender might have stated the plea of bona fide consumption which has been argued before us. But we have nothing to do with any such question in this Court, nor can it arise at all in consequence of our decision. It might or might not have been available to the defender if his payment of stipend for the period in question had been below the amount for which he was legally liable, but the decision is that he paid according to his liability, and the plea is therefore unnecessary and inapposite.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Vary the interlocutor in so far as to insert in the seventh line thereof after the words 'conclusions of the libel' the words 'but this decree of reduction to have effect only from and after the date of the decree of approbation, 16th July 1888, for the second half of crop 1888, and in time coming': Recall the interlocutor in so far as it finds the said Henry Walter Hope liable in expenses occasioned by his appearance: Find him entitled to expenses in the Outer-House: Quoad ultra adhere: Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses in the Inner-House."

REID & GUILD, W.S.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—Agents.

No. 96.

Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustee.

MISS MARY COCHRANE, Appellant (Reclaimer).—Salvesen.
ROBERT C. KING (John Lamont's Trustee), Respondent.—Cosens.

Husband and Wife—Bankruptcy—Debt by husband to wife—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 21), sec. 1, subsecs. 1 and 4.—By the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. 1, it is provided that in the case of a marriage after the date of the Act the whole moveable estate of the wife shall be vested in her as her separate estate, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti. By subsec. 4 of the same section it is provided that any money of the wife lent to the husband shall be treated as assets of his estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the value of such money after, but not before, the claims of the other creditors of the husband have been satisfied.

A husband six days prior to his sequestration granted to his wife a promissory-note, payable one day after date, for £1370, as the amount of sums lent to him at various times by his wife out of her separate estate. On the same day the wife assigned the promissory-note and the sum contained therein to a relative in consideration of a payment of £50. The wife's assignee thereafter lodged a claim for £1370 in the husband's sequestration.

Held that, having regard to subsecs. 1 and 4 of sec. 1 of the Married

No. 96.
Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustee.
1st Division. Lord Low. C.

Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, the wife's assignee was only entitled to be ranked upon whatever assets might remain after the whole claims of the ordinary creditors of the bankrupt had been satisfied.

THE estates of John Lamont were sequestrated upon his own petition on 3d February 1890. A claim was lodged in the sequestration for Miss Mary Cochrane to be ranked as an ordinary creditor for the sum of £1370.

The claim arose under the following circumstances:—

Mrs Lamont, the bankrupt's wife, to whom he was married after the date of the Married Women's Property Act of 1881, had separate moveable estate, in virtue of the provisions of that Act, and out of that estate she was alleged to have lent, at various times, sums of money to her husband amounting in all to the said sum of £1370. On 28th January 1890, being the date upon which he granted a mandate to his agent to apply for sequestration, the bankrupt granted to his wife a promissory-note for that sum payable one day after date.

On the same date Mrs Lamont, with consent of the bankrupt, and in consideration of £50 paid to her by William Anderson junior, accountant, Glasgow, assigned to the latter the sum contained in and due under the promissory-note, and the promissory-note itself, which was described in the assignation as having been granted "for sums advanced by me, the said Mary Anderson or Lamont, from my separate means and estate, as a loan to the said John Lamont." On 28th May 1890 Mr Anderson executed in favour of the claimant, Miss Cochrane, an assignation of the sum of £1370 and the promissory-note, upon the narrative of the assignation in his favour, and that Miss Cochrane had purchased the debt from him for the sum of £50. Mr Anderson was a cousin of Mrs Lamont, and Miss Cochrane was her daughter by a former marriage.

The trustee in the sequestration, Mr Robert C. King, rejected Miss Cochrane's claim, as an ordinary claim, but "admitted the same to ranking on whatever assets (if any) may remain after, but not before, the whole claims of the other or ordinary creditors of the bankrupt have been satisfied." The grounds of his deliverance were that subsec. 4 of sec. of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, applied to the case.*

On 9th December 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Low) dismissed an appeal against the trustee's deliverance.†

---

* The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. 1, provided: "Where a marriage is contracted after the passing of this Act, and the husband shall, at the time of the marriage, have his domicile in Scotland, the whole moveable or personal estate of the wife, whether acquired before or during the marriage, shall, by operation of law, be vested in the wife as her separate estate, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti."

Subsection 4 provided,—"Any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted to the husband, or immixed with his funds, shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the value of such money or other estate after, but not before, the claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied."

† "Opinion.—[After narrating the circumstances in which the claim arose and referring to the trustee's deliverance]—It is argued for Miss Cochrane that the deliverance of the trustee is erroneous, on the ground that the provision in the Act applies only to the case of the wife herself claiming in bankruptcy, and does not affect an onerous assignee who has acquired right to the debt prior to sequestration. Until sequestration, it was argued, the wife was in as good a position as any other creditor, and that the disability imposed by the Act ... n

No. 96.

Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustee.

Miss Cochrane reclaimed, and argued;—(1) During the husband's solvency his wife had a good claim as a creditor for sums advanced by her to him. If she assigned her claim of debt to an onerous assignee prior to her husband's bankruptcy, such assignee was entitled to claim in the husband's sequestration as an ordinary creditor for the amount of the claim of debt. In any view the limitation imposed by the Act upon the wife's claim on her husband's sequestration was personal to herself. It could not apply to an assignee of the wife who had obtained right to the debt before the bankruptcy of the husband. (2) Miss Cochrane held the promissory-note on a good title. Section 29, subsec. 2, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882,[1] contained an exhaustive enumeration of the possible disabilities by which the holder of a bill or note could be affected. The disability of title alleged here was not contained in the enumeration, and could not affect a holder who acquired the promissory-note for value before it was over-due.

Argued for the respondent;—The maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris

---

came into existence after sequestration, and in the event of the wife herself claiming as a creditor in the sequestration.

"I am of opinion that this argument is not well founded. It seems to me to be a clear case for the application of the maxim assignatus utitur jure auctoris. By the first section of the Act, subsection 1, it is provided that the whole moveable estate of the wife shall be vested in her as her separate estate, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti. By this enactment the wife is given right to her moveable estate, which, but for the Act, would have become the property of the husband. The right so given is, however, limited by the subsequent enactments of the section. Thus, by subsection 2, it is provided that the wife shall not be entitled to assign the prospective income, or, unless with the husband's consent, to dispose of such estate; and by subsection 4, already quoted, it is provided that money lent or entrusted to the husband, or immixed with his funds, shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, subject to the right of the wife to a postponed ranking therefor. These limitations appear to me to affect the quality of the right which is given to the wife in her moveable estate, and an assignation cannot alter the quality of the right assigned. I do not think that it could be disputed that an assignation by a wife without the consent of her husband would not be effectual, because the Act which gives to the wife right to her moveable estate subjects that right to the qualification or condition that she shall not dispose of it without her husband's consent. In the same way, I think that it is a qualification or condition of the wife's right, that if her separate estate is lent or entrusted to the husband, she shall only be entitled to a postponed ranking in the event of his bankruptcy.

"The present case is a very strong one for the application of the principle to which I have referred, because it is evident that the promissory-note and assignation were granted on the very eve and in contemplation of the husband's sequestration, for the purpose of taking the case outwith the provisions of the statute. If such a device was lawful, the provision of the Act founded on would easily be, and would probably generally be, substantially defeated; because it would be open to the wife, when her husband's bankruptcy became imminent, to dispose of her claim at the best price which she could get, and the assignee would rank upon the estate as an ordinary creditor, for the full amount of the money lent or entrusted to the husband. Such a transaction would entirely defeat the intention of the Legislature in making the enactment in question, which, I take it, was to prevent the husband's creditors being prejudiced by the change which the Act made in the law in regard to the wife's right, in cases in which her moveable estate had, as matter of fact, come into the husband's possession.

"I am therefore of opinion that the deliverance of the trustee is right, and should be sustained."

[1] Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61), sec. 29, subsec. 2, sec. 89.

No. 96.

Jan. 24, 1891. Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustee.

applied.[1] The reclaimer took the wife's right to claim for the amount the debt subject to the qualifications imposed by subsec. 4 of sec. 1 the Act.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the Bills of Exchange Act has any app cation here. This is a question of ranking upon a sequestrated estate, and t provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act have reference merely to the rules whi are to regulate the relations of parties to a bill in ordinary circumstances.

The promissory-note is not worth anything at all, and must be looked up as a donation between husband and wife. Being gratuitous, it is quite witho effect as regards the present question, and it is granted without any cause wh ever, if it is granted for the same right as the wife has already under subsecti 4 of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. There is therefo no need to appeal to the Bills of Exchange Act.

As regards the construction of the Married Women's Property Act, 188 there is no difficulty at all. It is there provided by section 1, subsection that "any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted to the husb or immixed with his funds, shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate bankruptcy." That is the leading provision. If a wife lends or entrusts her husband her separate estate and he afterwards becomes bankrupt, then the money so lent or entrusted to him is to be treated as assets of his estate That is a very broad and sweeping proposition, and it is only qualified by reservation in favour of the wife in very special terms, "under reservation the wife's claims to a dividend as a creditor for the value of such money other estate after, but not before, the claims of the other creditors of the husba for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfie Now, giving effect to this latter clause it is plain that no wife could possi claim to compete with the onerous creditors of her husband for the amount her own estate which had been allowed to pass into the hands of her husb and to be immixed with his funds.

Then the only other question is whether an assignee of the wife is in a be position with regard to a claim in the husband's sequestration than the herself. I am very clearly of opinion that he cannot be. He knows q well what he is taking,—that it is a claim of debt by a wife against her husba —a claim of debt which is created by her having allowed her funds to be immixed with those of her husband, or by her having allowed them to be entrus or lent to him,—and knowing this, the assignee must of course also know (fo is bound to understand the Act of Parliament) that this claim for £1370 wh he bought at the price of £50, on the eve of the husband's bankruptcy, nothing more than a right to rank for that sum after the claims of the other creditors of her husband had been satisfied.

I think therefore the Lord Ordinary's decision is well founded.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

Mrs Lamont, the bankrupt's wife, is said to have lent her husband sums money at various dates amounting in all to £1370, and on 28th January 18 a few days before his sequestration, the husband granted her a promissory-n for that sum. If the husband were solvent, the wife, or any person in right the promissory-note, would be entitled to receive payment of it from him, hat is not the position of matters. The husband has been sequestrated, and his claim consequently is a claim in his sequestration, and the provision of the th subsection of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, must e taken into account, which is to the effect that "any money or other estate of e wife, lent or entrusted to the husband, or immixed with his funds, shall be ated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy,"—that is to say, that £1370 alleged to have been lent to the husband by the wife is to be treated assets of the husband's sequestrated estate. Now, if there had been no ervation of the wife's claim, it would have been impossible for her to recover y part of the money lent to her husband, for it would have been part of the sband's estate in bankruptcy, but then there follows a reservation in the wife's vour—and it is the only right she has—of a claim to a dividend as a creditor er the claims of the other creditors of her husband have been satisfied. That is the nature of the wife's right, and it being of that nature, I agree that e cannot give a higher right to her assignee.

[1] Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c., July 14, 1876, 3 R. 1078.

Lord M'Laren.—This is a claim by the wife's assignee against the estate of e husband in bankruptcy for money lent by the wife to the husband. The rd Ordinary has affirmed the trustee's deliverance and rejected the claim on grounds which appear to me to be clear and unanswerable. The claim is neces-rily founded on the 1st section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1881, and in considering the rights given by that section the several subsections into which it is divided must be read together as one substantive enactment. Now, the operation and effect of the Married Women's Property Act was not imply to rescind the jus mariti, leaving the wife to have the same interest in r estate as an unmarried woman, but the Act gives the wife by operation of w what is called a "separate estate," a kind of property not known to the mmon law, and which could only be constituted prior to the date of this Act y means of a trust. Now, the first section, while giving the wife a separate tate, is careful to define what is meant by that term. You have in separate bsections a definition of the separate estate by its various incidents. Her wers as to disposal and anticipation of income are limited, and there are pecial provisions with reference to diligence and bankruptcy. Therefore it is in vain to contend that the estate which is here given is the same thing as the state in moveable property taken by a man or an unmarried woman.

One incident of the separate estate thus created is that in the case of such estate being lent to the husband or immixed with his funds, the wife's claim in bank-ruptcy shall be postponed to the claims of other creditors. It appears to me, agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, that the restriction thus imposed is one affecting the estate itself, and that it would therefore affect the claim of any assignee to the rights which the wife had against her husband.

It was endeavoured to distinguish the claim here made from the case contem-plated in the statute by the circumstance that the husband had granted to his wife a promissory-note for the money lent to him, and it was said that the clause referred to in the Bills of Exchange Act contains an exhaustive enumeration of all the objections which can be maintained against the onerous assignee of a bill. I agree with your Lordship that the case contemplated by the Bills of Exchange Act is the case of a claim against a solvent debtor. The argument on that clause would really amount to a reversal of all the conditions of bankruptcy law intended to secure creditors against improper alienations, because we know very well that bills come under the bankruptcy laws, although we do not find any reference to the exceptions under these laws in the Bills of Exchange Act which is not intended to regulate every possible legal proposition that might be maintained with reference to bills of exchange, but only those points which are in immediate connection with the subject. Agreeing with the views of the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that the present claim is not well founded, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

No. 96.
Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane v. Lamont's Trustee.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the effect of subsection 4 of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act of 1881 is to put the wife in exactly the same position as regards her husband's bankrupt as any other creditor of his in so far as she has lent money to him, subject only to the condition that her claim to a dividend is after the claims of the other creditors have been satisfied.

It is provided in the Act that any money "lent by a wife to her husband shall be treated as" assets of his estate in bankruptcy. That is exactly the position of money lent to anyone else who becomes bankrupt. The money is treated as part of the whole assets of the bankrupt estate, and the lender is ranked with the rest of the creditors. The effect of this provision therefore is that the wife is not entitled to have the money separated from her husband's estate but must submit to having it treated as part of his estate in bankruptcy. But the Act proceeds to add a very material qualification, and provides that the wife shall be entitled to claim a dividend for the value of the money she has lent to her husband "after, but not before," the claims of the other creditors have been satisfied. It appears to me, then, that the wife's right is simply a personal claim to a debt, which she may assign if she please, but only subject to the qualification which attaches to it in her own person.

I agree in thinking the Bills of Exchange Act has no application whatever.

THE COURT adhered.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—F. J. ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 97.
Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane.

HON. T. H. A. E. COCHRANE, Petitioner.—Murray—Maconochie.

Parent and Child—Father's duty as administrator-in-law of pupil child—Factor loco tutoris.—A father presented a petition for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to his daughter—in respect of a sum of £9000, to which she had right—with power to prosecute an action of damages for the loss of part thereof—on the ground that the petitioner's interests might conflict with those of his daughter in the prosecution of the action. The Court refused the petition on the ground that the petitioner had failed to shew that any conflict of interest would arise.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.
M.

THE HON. THOMAS H. A. E. COCHRANE, Dankeith, Kilmarnock, presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary for the recall of the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to his pupil daughter, Miss Louisa C. M. Cochrane, and for the appointment of another factor loco tutoris, with certain powers hereafter referred to.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) reported the petition to the Second Division. The circumstances in which the petition was presented were thus described in a note to his Lordship's interlocutor reporting the petition —"In 1882 the late Earl of Glasgow borrowed under the sanction of the Court £150,000 over his entailed estates. The petitioner's daughter

No. 97.

Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane.

Miss Cochrane, was one of the heirs of entail whose consent was required. The value of her interest was fixed at £9250, but this sum was not paid or secured.

"In 1885 Lord Glasgow conveyed his whole estates to trustees for behoof of creditors. He was made notour bankrupt in 1886, but the creditors agreed that his estates should be realised by the trustees under the trust-deed.

"The entailed estates were accordingly realised by Lord Glasgow and his trustees, and the secured creditors paid in full. There remained a balance of Lord Glasgow's means, which it was estimated would be sufficient to pay to his unsecured creditors, including Miss Cochrane, a dividend of 7s. 6d. in the pound.

"The petitioner and his wife, Lady Gertrude Cochrane, Lord Glasgow's eldest daughter, settled with the unsecured creditors, with the exception of Miss Cochrane and Lady Muriel Boyle, Lord Glasgow's second daughter, to whom a similar debt is due. Mr Cochrane and Lady Gertrude Cochrane obtained assignations to the claims of the creditors, with whom they settled, and thus acquired right to the reversion of Lord Glasgow's estates, subject to the debts due to their daughter and Lady Muriel Boyle.

"Lord Glasgow's trustees were willing to pay to Miss Cochrane a dividend of 7s. 6d. in the pound in full of her claim, but as she was a pupil, having been born in 1882, they were not satisfied that they would be in safety to take a discharge from the petitioner, who, having acquired the reversion of Lord Glasgow's estate, had an interest adverse to that of his daughter.

"The petitioner accordingly applied for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris to his daughter, for the purpose of uplifting, discharging, and applying for her behoof the said debt of £9250, and Mr James Auldjo Jamieson was appointed to the office.

"Mr Jamieson after his appointment found that William Smith, LL.D., Edinburgh, had been Miss Cochrane's curator ad litem in the entail proceedings, in which she had been found entitled to £9250 as the value of her consent. He therefore raised an action against Dr Smith to compel the latter to make good any loss sustained by Miss Cochrane from his having failed to see that the sum of £9250 was paid or secured.

"The action came before Lord Kyllachy, who dismissed it on the ground that Mr Jamieson's title was limited to uplifting and discharging the debt."

The prayer of the present petition was (1) to recall Mr Jamieson's appointment; (2) to nominate another person to be factor loco tutoris to Miss Cochrane "as and in respect of the said debt of £9250 . . . and on and in respect of all claims of damages for loss arising to the pupil through the failure to pay or secure the said sum, with power to the said factor to sue for, uplift, and recover the said sum, of £9250 from such persons or estates as may be legally liable therefor, or to discharge or assign the said claim, and also to prosecute and follow forth all actions of damages competent against any person or persons who may be liable in respect of the failure aforesaid, and to apply the sums uplifted and recovered for the pupil's behoof, with the usual powers," &c.*

* The NOTE of the Lord Ordinary, after the narrative above given, proceeded thus,—"The primary, and so far as the statements in the petition go, the only object for asking that extended powers should be given to the new factor is, that he may have a title to prosecute the action against Dr Smith. I doubt if this is a sufficient reason for granting the powers craved, because I do not think

No. 97.

Jan. 24, 1891. Cochrane.

Argued for the petitioner;—It was desirable, and indeed necessary, to have a factor loco tutoris. The Court would appoint one though a pupil's father were alive and otherwise fit to act if there were strong reasons for it in the pupil's interest.[1] Here the petitioner's interest might conflict with his duty as the pupil's administrator-in-law. If he sued Dr Smith to recover damages for loss by his alleged failure to see that the £925 was paid or secured by Lord Glasgow, a defence might be stated against him as assignee of the debts, which would not be available against the factor, if appointed. Dr Smith's defence was understood to be that if the estate had been wound up in a different manner there would, or might have been no loss. But the petitioner was a party to the way it had been wound up, and had paid 7s. 6d. per pound for an assignation to claims. His interest was to shew that was a fair thing; his daughter's might be that it was not. A factor loco tutoris should therefore be appointed for the limited purpose craved in the petition.

It was stated at the bar that the petitioner had bought up the claims of unsecured creditors (except those of his daughter and Lady Muriel Boyle) at the rate of 7s. 6d. per pound, and in lieu of a dividend of 7s. 6d. per pound had, by arrangement with the trustees, got a conveyance from them of the estate of Crawford Priory at a valuation, reserving his claim for the balance of the debt if the bankrupt estate should yield more.

Lord Young.—I do not mean to say anything to the effect that the Court may not protect a pupil child in a question in which his or her father has a adverse interest. The Court in the exercise of its nobile officium may appoint an officer to protect the pupil against the father, and to see that the interest the former is duly attended to, if there is any reasonable ground to fear that might be in danger if the father were left in charge of it. But subject to this exception, the rule of law is that a father is the proper tutor of his pupil child and cannot divest himself or avoid discharging the duties attaching thereto the Court has been in use to supersede the father of a pupil, or to relieve him of the tutorial duties involved in his position, unless there is a conflict of interest between him and his child, or unless the circumstances of the father as, for example, from insolvency, are such that it is apparent that the child's interest would not be safe in his hands.

---

"As regards the claim against Dr Smith, I do not think that there is any conflict of interest between the petitioner and his daughter, and I observe that Lord Kyllachy in his judgment in the action to which I have referred takes the same view. As to the title of Mr Cochrane to make the claim as administrator-in-law to his daughter, I do not think there can be any doubt.

"It is, however, right to say that it was stated at the bar that the claim against Dr Smith is not the only matter with which the factor, if appointed, may have to deal, but that he may have to raise questions with Lord Glasgow's trustees, and with the petitioner himself. I can understand that this may be the case. If, for example, the reversion of Lord Glasgow's estate acquired by the petitioner greatly exceeds in value the amount for which he settled with the creditors, Miss Cochrane may be entitled to demand payment of her debt in full either from the trustees or from the petitioner.

"In the whole circumstances I should hesitate to refuse the petition, but it seems to me to raise a question of novelty in regard to a jurisdiction which the Court have always exercised with caution, I have thought it right to report it. I may add that I think it better not to deal with the recall of Mr Jamieson's appointment until it is settled whether a new factor with additional powers is to be appointed."

[1] Mars v. Riley, March 9, 1848, 20 Scot. Jur. 308; Mann, July 19, 1851, 14 D. 12; Robertson, July 12, 1865, 3 Macph. 1077, 37 Scot. Jur. 568; Sawers, March 9, 1850, 12 D. 905.

No. 97.

Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane.

And the law permits him to name a tutor, who is to take his place if he die during his child's pupillarity.

Now, this young lady has a father who is a wealthy and intelligent man so far as we know, and he is capable of performing to her the father's duty as tutor and guardian.

The circumstances of the case are very intelligible. A debt is due to her by the trustees of the late Lord Glasgow. It is a debt of about £9000, and is payable out of his estate so far as it will go. It represents the value of her consent as one of the heirs of entail to a disentail of certain entailed land. That value was ascertained, but the consent is said to have been given without the money having been paid or secured, and her claim is now against Lord Glasgow's trustees for the debt. Unfortunately for her, and for the other unsecured creditors, the estate of Lord Glasgow is believed only to be worth about 7s. 6d. per pound. That is the opinion of the trustees, and also of those who applied for and obtained the previous appointment of a factor loco tutoris. If so, the young lady will get no more from that source than 7s. 6d. in the pound. Her father, Mr Cochrane, on the ground that the estate was reasonably expected to be worth 7s. 6d., bargained with the unsecured creditors (excepting his daughter and Lady Muriel Boyle) to buy their debts at 7s. 6d. per pound. They did not discharge them, but assigned them to him, and he thereafter became creditor in them. He arranged with the trustees that the estate of Crawford Priory should be valued and conveyed to him as payment, to the extent of the valuation, of a dividend of 7s. 6d. on the debts which he had acquired. We were informed that he holds that as a payment to account only, and that if the estate of Lord Glasgow should yield more than 7s. 6d. per pound, his claim remains for any surplus there may be.

The fairness of that transaction there seems to be no ground to impugn. There is no idea of indirect or improper motive. Now, he, as tutor of the young lady, thought that her claim would only be worth 7s. 6d. per pound. The trustees thought that an independent tutor should be appointed. Then it was pointed out to their tutor that Dr Smith had been curator ad litem in the disentail proceedings in which Miss Cochrane's consent had been valued at £9000, and it was thought that a claim arose against him on Miss Cochrane's part because he put Lord Glasgow in the position of getting the consent without the purchase money being first secured, and therefore that the difference between the price of the consent and a dividend of 7s. 6d. per pound ought to be claimed from him. I see no reason why Miss Cochrane, and her father as her tutor, should not prosecute this claim against Dr Smith. His defence will be the same as if the action was raised by someone else, both as to the liability and as to the amount. If he thinks that more than 7s. 6d. per pound should be yielded by the estate, that is a question for him to try with the trustees, and it is Mr Cochrane's interest also to try it. Or Dr Smith might suggest that Crawford Priory had collusively been given at less than its value. The most proper action in which to try that would be one in which Mr Cochrane was a party. Is it intended to be said that Miss Cochrane has an interest to prevent that being tried? I do not think that the Court on such a suggestion will dream of interfering and appointing another officer in lieu of the father, the existing tutor.

I am of opinion that the petition should be refused.

LORD TRAYNER.—The purpose for which the appointment of a new factor loco tutoris is now sought is that he may proceed with an action for damages against

No. 97.
Jan. 24, 1891.
Cochrane.

Dr Smith. In ordinary circumstances such an action would be raised on behalf of a child at the instance of the tutor-at-law, though circumstances might emerge to make it expedient that an appointment of an officer should be made by the Court. If it appears that there are such, we are ready to grant such an application. But I agree that we should refuse this application, because such a case has not been shewn. I do not consider that the father has any conflicting interest which renders it inexpedient that he should execute his office as tutor of his child, and sue this action.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree that up to this stage nothing has been shewn to indicate that Mr Cochrane is precluded from acting as his child's tutor. Such a case may yet be shewn to us. But there is nothing at present to justify our granting the petition.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the petition.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S., Agents.

No. 98.
Jan. 27, 1891.
North of Scotland Bank, Limited.
1st DIVISION.
C.

THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND BANK, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Ure.

Diligence—Messenger-at-arms—Sheriff-officer—Nobile Officium.—The North of Scotland Bank, Limited, presented this petition stating that they had obtained decree in an action at their instance before the Court of Session against Gilbert Gavin Harrison, merchant, Lerwick, for payment of the sum sued for, with expenses, which they extracted in due course; that there was no messenger-at-arms in Shetland, and that the nearest messenger-at-arms was in Wick, a distance of 150 miles. Under the Court of Session Act, 1868, section 19, service of summonses and citations of witnesses may be made by sheriff-officers in counties or districts of counties where there is no resident messenger-at-arms, but no provision is made for the execution of diligence in similar circumstances. The petitioners therefore craved the Court for a warrant to sheriff-officers to charge, arrest, and poind in terms of the extract decree.[1]

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C., Agent.

No. 99.
Jan. 29, 1891.
Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

DANIEL JOHN CUNNINGHAM, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Balfour—W. Campbell.

RICHARD BROWN (Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—Murray—Ure.

Contract—Sale—Author and publisher—Bankruptcy.—Held (per Lord Young, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and Lord Trayner) that the contract between an author and a publisher, by which the publisher takes the risk, and the profits are halved, is a contract of sale of the right to publish the edition of the book to which the contract refers.

An author and a publisher entered into an agreement "regarding the publication" of an edition of a book. The publisher agreed to relieve the author of the expenses of publication. The author agreed to furnish the drawings for the wood-cuts. The expenses were to form a first charge against the book, the proceeds of sales to be divided equally, after these charges had been paid. Copies sold were to be accounted for "at the usual trade sale price." The publisher became bank-

[1] Kennedy, June 19, 1862, 24 D. 1131, 34 Scot. Jur. 564; Schweitzer, Oct. 27, 1868, 7 Macph. 24, 41 Scot. Jur. 18.

No. 99.

Jan. 29, 1891.
Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

rupt, and his trustee offered (1) to find another publisher to take the place of the bankrupt, or (2) to hand over the whole stock of books to the author at a valuation, or (3) to buy the author's interest at a valuation. All these offers were rejected, and the trustee sold the stock of books, after an interval of two months and a-half, to a bookseller considerably below the trade price. He tendered the whole of the price so received to the author. The author raised an action against the trustee for accounting and declarator that the defender must account to him for the books at the usual trade sale price. Action dismissed,—Lords Young, Rutherfurd Clark, and Trayner holding that the agreement constituted a sale of the right to publish the edition of the book in question, and that therefore the property in the books belonged to the trustee; the Lord Justice-Clerk holding that in the circumstances the pursuer was not entitled to require the trustee to do more than he had offered to do.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Trayner. M.

By agreement, dated 22d November 1878, Dr D. J. Cunningham, Professor of Anatomy in Trinity College, Dublin, entered into an agreement with Maclachlan & Stewart, publishers, Edinburgh, regarding the publication of a "Guide to the Dissecting-Room," to be published in parts.

The agreement bore:—"(1) We," the publishers, "agree to relieve you of all risk attending the expense of paper, printing, engraving woodcuts, and advertising, the drawings for the woodcuts to be furnished by you free of all expense. (2) The preceding expenses being paid by us, they are to be charged against the book, and the proceeds of sales in the first instance are to be placed to the credit of the aforesaid charges until liquidated, the surplus thereafter to be divided between the author and the publisher in equal proportions. (3) Paper, printing, and engraving are to be charged at the invoiced prices. (4) Statements of sales to be made up annually, and all copies sold are to be accounted for at the usual trade sale price, twenty-five copies to be reckoned as twenty-four. (5) The edition to consist of one thousand copies."

The book appeared in three parts. The first edition of the first part was sold out, and an agreement in substantially the same terms was entered into for a second edition. This agreement was dated 1st October 1888.

In November 1889 the estates of Maclachlan & Stewart were sequestrated.

A correspondence took place between the author's agent and the trustee in bankruptcy as regarded the disposal of the stock of books.

On 26th March 1890 the trustee wrote to the author's agent,—"I duly received your letter of 24th inst., with reference to the books published by this firm under agreements with Professor Cunningham, and regret that no proposal which I can make appears to meet with the approval of your client. I am unable to formulate any further proposal consistent with the equitable rights of parties; and, in order to obviate any possible misunderstanding in the future, I here repeat the various proposals I have made with a view to settlement, and intimate that I shall found upon these in any future proceedings which may take place. (1st) I offer Mr James Thin, bookseller and publisher, to take the place of Maclachlan & Stewart under the said agreements, leaving Professor Cunningham precisely in the same position with him as he was with Maclachlan & Stewart. If required, Mr Thin will find security; and, if Dr Cunningham has any reasonable objection to Mr Thin, I shall endeavour to find another publisher to suit him. (2d) I offer to hand over the whole stock of books to Dr Cunningham on receiving payment from him of the value which may be placed, by any practical valuator or valuators mutually chosen, upon the publishers' interest therein, as defined by the agreements and the course of dealing. (3d) I offer by the hands of Mr Thin to purchase Dr

No. 99.

Jan. 29, 1891. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

Cunningham's interest at a similar valuation, the only condition I attach to this offer being that Dr Cunningham shall not, in consequence of his interest in the future sale of the book being bought up, be thereby left free to bring out any subsequent edition or any work calculated to damage the sale of any of the parts of the book published by Maclachlan & Stewart until the copies of that part have been sold, or the sale thereof in the ordinary course of trade has practically ceased."

These offers were declined, and counter proposals by Dr Cunningham to purchase, under certain conditions, the stock of books were declined by the trustee.

On 10th June the trustee intimated that he had sold the remaining copies of the book to Mr Thin, a bookseller and publisher of the same character as Maclachlan & Stewart. Subsequently a statement of account between Dr Cunningham and the bankrupts was sent by the trustee bringing out a balance, after debiting Dr Cunningham with certain books sold to him, of £17, 10s. The trustee sent a cheque for this sum in full in place of ranking Cunningham on the estate.

From the statement it appeared that of Part ii. of the book 147 copies had been sold at 1s. 7d. to Mr Thin in place of 4s. 6d., the trade sale price; of Part iii. 264 copies at 2s. 2d., in place of 5s. 8d., and of the second edition of Part i., 1135 copies at 2s. 6d. in place of 6s. 5d.

Dr Cunningham then raised an action against the trustee for an account and reckoning of the sale of the books, and for declarator "that the defender is not entitled to take credit for expenses in connection with the said books which have not been paid by the said Maclachlan & Stewart or the defender."

He pleaded the agreements, and further (3) The said books sold by the defender being the property of the pursuer, or otherwise of the pursuer and the bankrupts jointly, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded to.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support his pleas. (2) The right of publication of the book in question having been sold by the pursuer to the bankrupts, his claims ought to be remitted to be adjudicated on in the sequestration. (3) The right of publication of the book in question having been sold by the pursuer to the bankrupts under the agreements libelled, and the pursuer having been paid the remuneration therein stipulated for, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Lord Trayner (Ordinary), on 25th November 1890, sustained the defender's first and second pleas in law, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is, Whether the agreements entered into between the pursuer and Messrs Maclachlan & Stewart are contracts of sale or contracts of joint adventure? As the two agreements are practically the same in their terms, I take the one earliest in date as shewing what was agreed on between the parties. That agreement bears to be one 'regarding the publication of a "Guide to the Dissecting-Room"' (of which the pursuer is the author), and its import may be shortly stated. The pursuer undertook to provide the work and drawings for the woodcuts by which it was to be illustrated. This is his only obligation. On the other hand, the publishers agreed to relieve the pursuer of all risk attending the expense of paper, printing, engraving woodcuts, and advertising, the expense connected with which was to be charged against the book and discharged out of the proceeds of sales in the first instance; the balance or surplus of such proceeds, after payment of expenses, was to be divided equally between the author and publishers: the edition was to consist of 1000 copies. In a sentence, the contract was a familiar one, by which the publishers took all the risk of the publication, paying the author half the profits if the publication was successful.

"The parties are at one in saying that the agreement does not involve a

No. 99.

Jan. 29, 1891. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—This contract was not a sale. There was no note or mark of sale about the transaction, or if it was a sale it was a sale under specific conditions. If the bankrupt's trustee could not fulfil those conditions he must give up his contract. In answer to the reasons given by the Lord Ordinary for holding this not to be a contract of sale, it was contended (1) that the pursuer did contribute capital to the joint adventure, viz., the use of his manuscript and the woodcuts; (2) that the fact that a price was not fixed was a consideration rather on the side of joint adventure than on the side of sale, although if a sale was assumed—the point at issue—it was no doubt consistent with sale; (3) that the publishers' rights were not uncontrolled; before the agreement could have been arrived at it must have been settled what the size and shape of the book were to be, who was to print it, &c., and on all those points it question about the copyright of the work; that right remains with the author. But as regards the particular edition, the pursuer maintains that the contract was one of joint adventure, while the defender (the trustee on the publishers' sequestrated estates) contends that it was a sale. The question thus raised appears to me to be one of considerable nicety. Looked at from one point of view, the agreement in question presents many of the features of a joint adventure. The author contributes his work in manuscript, and the publisher contributes the necessary cash for paper, printing, binding, &c., so as to put that work upon the market. The whole expense incurred by the publisher is charged against the proceeds of the joint adventure; the profits of the joint adventure, after all expenses have been paid, are divided between the two contracting parties. Both parties, in the event of the joint adventure being successful, are equal gainers. They each get back their contributed capital, and each get half of the profits earned. On the other hand, the agreement is quite as suggestive of sale as joint adventure. The author sells one edition of his work, or the privilege of publishing one edition of his work, for a certain, or at all events an ascertainable price. He makes no contribution of capital to a partnership; he incurs no outlay or liability for outlay in connection with the publication; he bears no share of the loss if loss is incurred. The publisher has the uncontrolled power of determining the kind of paper, printing, binding, &c., which are to be adopted; he fixes the price at which the book is to be sold. The author's only obligation is to furnish the MS. and drawings for woodcuts; his only right is to payment of one-half of the profits, if profits ensue from the publication, as the price of the privilege he has granted.

---

"I have come to be of opinion that the contract was one of sale—(1) The pursuer cannot be said to contribute any capital as to a joint adventure. He lends his MS., but the work itself—the copyright—is not contributed. Whether the publication is successful or not, he loses no capital—he has adventured none. (2) If the author, instead of accepting what are called 'half-profits' for the privilege of publication, had stipulated for payment of a fixed sum—say £100—the character of the transaction would have been, I think, clearly a sale. But a sum that is ascertainable by a fixed or agreed on standard is not less a price than a fixed sum. (3) It strengthens the view that the publisher purchased the right to publish, that he is left with the uncontrolled right to determine the character and size of the book, so far as these are affected by paper, printing, binding, &c., and to fix the price at which the book shall be offered for sale.

"In Venables & Co. v. Wood (March 8, 1839, 1 D. 659, 11 Scot. Jur. 399), a contract in no material respect distinguishable from the agreement in the present case was held to be a contract of sale, and not a contract of joint adventure. It is said that the soundness of that decision has been doubted by Mr Ross—Leading Cases on Commercial Law, vol. iii. 531. But that fact does not entitle me to disregard the decision as an authority. The doubt, however, I think is balanced by the 'query' of Mr Justice Lindley (Lindley on Partnership (4th ed.), i. 21, footnote), who appears to me to approve of the decision—See also Coppinger on Copyright (2d ed.), 605. . . ."

No. 99.

Jan. 29, 1891. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

was clear that the author must have a voice. The contract then was a joint adventure, or a contract of agency, inferring liability by both partners for the cost of the production of the book. Independently of all right of property, if the trustee took up the contract, he must take it up with its conditions, and one of these was sale at the trade sale price and liability for half the profits. If the trustee took up the contract he became debtor under the contract, and his liability must be looked for within its four corners. In the case of Venables,[1] there were no doubt obiter dicta to the effect that the contract, admittedly the same as the present, was a sale, but the Judges said the result would have been the same if it had been joint adventure; it was not therefore necessary for that case to hold it to be a sale. In England it had been thought that the contract was a joint adventure.[2] Mr Ross,[3] too, doubted Venables' case, and suggested that the decision might be rested on the consideration that the author's credit was not pledged.

The defender argued;—The result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived was just, whatever view might be taken as to the proper category of law in which to place the contract. The offers made by the trustee were entirely reasonable, and after rejecting them the pursuer could not expect the trustee to do anything but what he had done. But the contract was a contract of sale. The Court could not hold otherwise without overturning Venables' case, in which the contract was the same. No doubt the Judges intimated that the result would have been the same even if the contract was held to be joint adventure. But looking to the shape in which the case came up on a bill of exceptions, the point presented to the Court was whether the direction[4] that the contract was one of sale was right or wrong, and that question was fixed and decided. The decision was thought to be sound by Lindley,[5] and there was no decision the other way, for in the two English cases cited the alternative of a sale was not presented. Indeed, in Stevens' case[6] there was a dictum on which the defender here might found, for it was said that in bankruptcy the publisher's trustee might realise reasonably, which was all he had done here. In Warren v. Routledge[7] it was held that a bargain like this did not prevent the author from bringing out a second edition before the first was sold out. The inference from that was, that in such contracts there was no such continuing permanent interest in the publisher as would necessarily be found if the contract was a joint adventure. But let the contract be joint adventure. That did not imply a joint right of property in the assets of the joint adventure. There might be a joint adventure in the performances of a race-horse that belonged to one of the adventurers, or in the horsing of a coach where the relays of horses belonged to different persons.[8] The property of this edition belonged to the publisher. He was now bankrupt, and the book, i.e., this edition of it, was a mere asset of the bankruptcy. It must be realised, for the trustee could not take up the contract without becoming a bookseller. The pursuer's demand was not for a half of what had been got, but for a half of what would have been

[1] Venables & Co. v. Wood, March 8, 1839, 1 D. 659, 11 Scot. Jur. 399.

[2] Stevens v. Benning, 1854, 1 K. and J. 168, on appeal, 1855, 6 De G. M. & G. 223; Reade v. Bentley, 1857, 3 K. and J. 271, and 1858, 4 K. and J. 656.

[3] Leading Cases, Comm. Law, iii. 531.

[4] See Macfarlane's Reports, pp. 44 and 50, for precise direction.

[5] See Lord Ordinary's note.

[6] 1 K. and J. at p. 177.

[7] 1874, L. R., 18 Eq. 497.

[8] See Cases in Lindley, p. 14.

No. 99.

Jan. 29, 1891.
Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

got under the prices agreed on. It was a claim of damages, and at the most could only give a ranking. It shewed the moderation of the views which the trustee held that he tendered full payment of the £17, 10s. in place of a ranking for that amount. To that offer he still adhered.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The arrangement between Cunningham and Maclachlan & Stewart, which has led to this complication, is not of an unusual description. But the transaction, though common, may be difficult to bring into an exact legal category. Lord Trayner was of opinion that it is a contract of sale. Although I do not express any dissent from that view, I am not clear at present that it must fall into that category.

But it is not necessary, in the view I take of it, to consider under what category it falls.

Maclachlan & Stewart, being bankrupt, could not fulfil any part of their contract. Their whole estate passed to their trustee. There were only three things that could possibly be done in that state of circumstances; first, the trustee might have taken the place of the bankrupts, i.e., their place as regards their business, and, being in possession of the copies of the book, might have proceeded to carry on the sale of them. That could only be done by the trustee taking up the business as a bookseller, for with such a book as this, it will necessarily take a considerable tract of time to exhaust the edition. That course he was not only not bound to take, but, I think, he ought not to have taken it. His business was to realise the estate with reasonable speed, and not to go on with this speculation of the sale of this book.

The second thing he could have done was to come to an arrangement with Dr Cunningham, by which Dr Cunningham should relieve him of this book on such reasonable terms as might be best both for the creditors and the author. It is plain that the trustee made most reasonable and strenuous efforts to carry out such arrangements; but his proposals were rejected.

There remained then only one possible course for him to take, viz., to sell the book for what price he could get. And so he goes to Thin and sells the book, and he could not, I should think, have gone to a better man for his purpose. Then having got a price, he says to Dr Cunningham, "I am not going to raise any question as to whether the price is to be dealt with as falling within the sequestration or not." And accordingly he tenders him a cheque for £17, 10s., —as far as I am aware there is no dispute as to the accuracy of the accounts by which that is brought out. But that was rejected.

In disposing of the case now without further deliberation, I am not clear that the contract falls under the category of sale, but I am confident that the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is the right result.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a question of importance and requires the best consideration we can give it. The question is as to the legal character of an agreement of very common occurrence between authors and publishers. It is implied in the contract that the publisher undertakes to produce the book in reasonable time, and that the author undertakes to give leave and licence to no others to do so. Now, to carry out his part of the contract the publisher must do a variety of things; he must buy paper, and that he does on a contract of his own, and so are the contracts for printing and binding. But before he incurs any of those expenses, he must get the author's leave to publish the book and to expose it for sale.

What then is the nature of the contract which he necessarily makes as a condition of the thing being accomplished at all, the contract with the author I see no objection to calling it a sale. It is quite clearly implied however that the publisher is under an obligation to produce the book, and he is not entitled to do with the manuscript what he pleases. That is a lawful condition, and I may sell under any lawful condition. But this condition does not interfere with the contract as a contract of sale. The price is one-half of the profits.

No. 99.

Jan. 29, 1891. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

In that view, if this is a sale, the book, i.e., the physical thing, becomes the property of the publisher, but I should arrive at the same conclusion even if the contract were called by another name.

Therefore, if Maclachlan & Stewart remained solvent, there could be no doubt as to the obligations of parties. On the occasion of the bankruptcy the trustee took the right tantum et tale which was in the bankrupts. If the whole edition had been sold out in a few days I do not doubt that the author would have been entitled to half of the clear profits, the condition on which alone the bankrupt had the book. That is my opinion.

But the edition could not be sold in a few days. What then were the rights of the trustee? What was he bound to do? Exactly what he proposed to do, to substitute another publisher in place of the bankrupts. That offer was made in March, but it was rejected, and after waiting some months the trustee sold the whole stock of books. The pursuer has been offered his share of the profits I think the action should be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think I am bound to follow the case of Venables which I take to be a very clear authority that a contract of this kind is a contract of sale, and therefore I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is sound.

LORD TRAYNER.—It is, I think, a point of importance to determine, as the question has been raised, what is the legal category to which a contract such as this belongs, what is the true nature of the contract between an author and publisher conceived in the terms of the contract before us.

In the Outer-House it was represented in argument that it must be one or other of two contracts. There was no attempt to put it under any other category than that of sale on the one hand, or joint adventure on the other. It was recognised that the law would determine all the incidents of the contract whichever of these two categories it was pronounced to belong.

I think that this was a contract of sale, carrying with it these results as incidental to it, viz., the property passes to the buyer, leaving him debtor in the price, and, in the event of the buyer's bankruptcy, the seller's right is confined to a personal right for the price, or for the balance of the price that may be unpaid.

But, if the contract is a joint adventure, then, as an incident of that contract the book would not fall into the sequestration at all; all that would fall into the sequestration is the buyer's interest in the joint adventure. The result in the case would be that Cunningham would have retained at least half of the assets of the joint adventure as his own property.

It was suggested that the assets of the joint adventure were vested solely in one of the joint adventurers, and that the joint right was limited to the profits of the adventure. That might be so; there is no legal impossibility in that, but I do not think it is the state of the case here. I agree with the view of Lord Justice Lindley that this is a contract of sale, and I am supported by a decided judgment of this Court in Venables in that view.

All I desire to say is that this is a contract of sale, carrying with it all the incidents of that contract. No. 99.

THE COURT adhered.

LINDSAY MACKERSY, W.S.—JAMIESON & DONALDSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

Jan. 29, 1891. Cunningham v. Maclachlan & Stewart's Trustee.

JOHN NORRIE ANDERSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—A. Davidson. No. 100.

ROBERT HUNTER, Defender (Appellant).—J. Wilson.

Jan. 30, 1891. Anderson v. Hunter.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Malice—Statement regarding candidate for county council by one not a voter in the district.—Where a parish was divided into two electoral divisions for county council purposes, and a voter in one division was sued by a candidate for the other for damages for falsely and calumniously stating that it would be useless to elect the pursuer as he would soon be bankrupt, held that the defender was not privileged, and that malice should not be put in the issue.

Issue—Slander.—Form of issue where slander is said to have been uttered in public.

JOHN NORRIE ANDERSON, coal-merchant in Stornoway, brought an action of damages for slander in the Sheriff Court at Stornoway against Robert Hunter, ground-officer and postmaster at Barvas.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland. C.

The pursuer averred that in December 1889 he agreed, upon the requisition of a number of the electors of the Ness Division of Lewis, to stand as a candidate for the county council for that division (that being one of the two divisions into which the parish of Barvas is divided); that shortly after he had so agreed he found that it was currently reported that he was about to become bankrupt; that on inquiry he found that the defender had on various occasions, during the month of January 1890, stated to different persons in the parish of Barvas that it was of no use to elect the pursuer as county councillor, as he would be bankrupt soon, or used words substantially to that effect. The words in question were spoken in Gaelic, and were quoted in that language on record.

After setting forth that the defender had on four different specified occasions made the above statement, the pursuer averred that it was false and calumnious, and made by the defender maliciously and without probable cause, with the object of injuring the pursuer and destroying his credit and ruining him; and that he had been seriously injured thereby.

The defender averred that he was a ratepayer in the parish of Barvas, and that he was also a member of the school board; "that in his capacity as ground-officer he frequently comes in contact with crofters, and the ratepayers of the district generally; that he is often applied to by them for information and advice regarding school board, county council, and other matters in the district; that on or about the dates mentioned in the condescendence the defender was applied to by several ratepayers for information and advice as to the then pending county council election; that upon these occasions it is possible that the defender may have referred to the current reports mentioned by the pursuer; that if the defender did so, it was without malice, with probable cause, and solely in the interests of the ratepayers; that the statements (if any) made by the defender on these occasions referred to, were not intended to convey, and did not convey, any imputation on the pursuer's character or financial position; that no such meaning was attached to them by those who heard them; and that the reference (if any) by the defender to the current reports concerning the pursuer's bankruptcy on the occasions referred to, were privileged in the circumstances."

No. 100.

Jan. 30, 1891. Anderson v. Hunter.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Any reference made by the defender to the rumours concerning pursuer's bankruptcy having been made (a) without malice, (b) with probable cause, and (c) in privileged circumstances, he is not liable in reparation.

On 28th October 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) allowed parties a proof.

The defender appealed for jury trial.

The pursuer proposed certain issues. The second issue was in the following terms:—"2. Whether in or about the month of January 1890, in or near the subpost-office of Barvas, the defender, in presence and hearing of Kenneth Murray, post-runner, Ness, did falsely and calumniously say in the Gaelic language, of and concerning the pursuer, 'Co tha sibh,' &c., which words being translated into English bear the following or similar meaning:—'Who are you going to put into the county council for you? If it be Mr Anderson, he will not be long with you, for it is not legal, as he will be bankrupt in a short time,' or did use words of the like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?" The first, third, and fourth issues were in similar terms with reference to other occasions. The fifth issue was as follows:—"5. Whether in or about the month of January 1890, in various places in or about the parish of Barvas, the defender, in presence and hearing of John Gunn Macdonald, merchant, Stornoway, Kenneth Murray, post-runner, Ness, John Mackenzie, mason, Borve, and Donald Morison, blacksmith, Lionel, Barvas, or of one or more of them, did repeatedly falsely and calumniously say, in Gaelic or English, of and concerning the pursuer, that he was about to become bankrupt, or did use words of the like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?"

At the discussion upon the issues, it was admitted at the bar that the defender, although a ratepayer in Barvas parish, was not an elector in the Ness Division.

Argued for the defender;—As a ratepayer in the parish he was entitled to discuss the qualifications of the pursuer, who was a candidate for the public post of county councillor in one of the divisions of the parish.[1] Bankruptcy disqualified a man for the position of county councillor, hence the defender's object in making the statements. He was clearly privileged, and malice and want of probable cause must therefore be inserted in the issue. The fifth issue was too vague, and should be disallowed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender was not an elector in the Ness Division. He was therefore in the position of any ordinary member of the public, and no duty lay upon him to make the statements complained of. It was, then, unnecessary to insert malice and want of probable cause in the issue.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Court is of opinion that the 5th issue is too vague, and cannot be allowed.

With regard to the matter of privilege, it appears that the defender is not an elector in the division of the county where the pursuer proposed to seek election as a county councillor. There are two divisions in the parish of Barvas. The defender is an elector in one of these, but the pursuer was seeking election in the other. We are all, I think, of opinion that there is no case of privilege, the defender not being a voter in the election with reference to which

[1] Brims v. Reid & Sons, March 28, 1885, 12 R. 1016, per Lord President, 1021; Coghill v. Docherty, Oct. 18, 1881, 19 S. L. R., 96; Croucher v. Inglis, June 14, 1889, 16 R. 774.

No. 100.
Jan. 30, 1891.
Anderson v. Hunter.

he is said to have made the statements complained of. We therefore refuse to insert the word "maliciously" in the issues. The only observation we have to make in regard to the other issues is to put it to counsel whether it is necessary to have the Gaelic words in the issues.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Counsel agreed that the Gaelic words should be taken out of the issues.

THE COURT approved of the following issues:—"(1) Whether in or about the beginning of January 1890, at or near the Barvas Inn, the defender, in presence and hearing of John Gunn Macdonald, merchant, Stornoway, did falsely and calumniously say of and concerning the pursuer 'that it would be of no use to take the pursuer as county councillor, for he would be bankrupt soon,' or did use words of the like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage? (2) Whether in or about the month of January 1890, in or near the subpost-office of Barvas, the defender, in presence and hearing of Kenneth Murray, post-runner, Ness, did falsely and calumniously say, in Gaelic, of and concerning the pursuer,—'Who are you going to put into the county council for you? If it be Mr Anderson, he will not be long with you, for it is not legal, as he will be bankrupt in a short time,' or did use words of the like import and effect, of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?" The third and fourth issues were in similar terms,—the locus being different and the phraseology slightly altered.

CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.—JOHN ELDER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 101.
Jan. 31, 1891.
Whyte v. Whyte.

MRS MARY PHILIPS OR WHYTE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Younger.
GEORGE WHYTE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Party.

Process—Reponing—Decree in absence—Husband and Wife.—In an action of separation and aliment by a wife against her husband, the summons was served personally on the defender, and notice of the diet of proof was sent to him by registered letter. He did not lodge defences nor appear at the diet of proof, but decree having been pronounced against him, he lodged a reclaiming note. The pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note and pleaded that the only competent course for the defender was to bring a reduction of the decree. The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to repone the defender upon such terms as to his Lordship should seem fit.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Trayner. C.

MRS MARY PHILIPS OR WHYTE raised an action of separation and aliment against her husband, George Whyte, Leslie Terrace, Aberdeen. The summons was served upon the defender personally. He did not enter appearance. After a proof, notice of which was sent by registered letter to the defender, who did not attend and was not represented at the diet of proof, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced decree of separation and decerned for a sum in name of aliment. The defender reclaimed, and tendered defences. The pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note.

Argued for the pursuer;—The reclaiming note was incompetent, for this was a decree in absence.[1] The defender's only course was to bring a reduction of the decree,[2] in which he would stand pursuer, whereas if this reclaiming note, which was virtually a reponing note, were allowed, the effect would be that the pursuer would have to begin all the proceed-

[1] Stewart v. Stewart, Feb. 27, 1863, 1 Macph. 449, 35 Scot. Jur. 272.
[2] Fraser, Husband and Wife, ii. p. 1238.

No. 101.
Jan. 31, 1891.
Whyte v. Whyte.

ings de novo. That was a hardship to her and none to the defender, who, had been perfectly aware of all the proceedings, and had chosen to lie by. The defender was heard personally, and stated that he was unable to instruct counsel for the proof, and had not attended personally, being out of Scotland at the date of the proof.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary to repone the defender upon such terms as to his Lordship should seem fit.

A. LAURIE KENNAWAY, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 102.
Jan. 31, 1891.
MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

JAMES MACROBBIE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Comrie Thomson—Dewar.
LEWIS M'LELLAN AND OTHERS (M'Lellan's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Salvesen.
FORBES, BRYSON, & CARRICK, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Salvesen.

Reparation—Wrongous use of diligence—Law-Agent—Malice—Issues.—In an action of maills and duties by heritable creditors against the proprietor and tenants of the subjects in which there was a conclusion for expenses only in the event of the defenders appearing and offering opposition thereto, appearance was entered for A, the proprietor, who wished to be kept informed of the proceedings. A took no further step. Decree was afterwards taken by the pursuers' agent against A for expenses without intimation being made to him. A charge was given upon the extract decree, and a petition for cessio threatened. A having taken objection to the proceedings as irregular, the chargers agreed to a suspension of the charge.

A then brought an action of damages against the chargers and their agent for wrongous use of diligence, but subsequently asked an issue against the agent only. Held (1) that the alleged use of diligence was wrongous, and (2) that the agent was liable in damages therefor, and that it was not necessary to prove malice and want of probable cause.

Issues—Wrongous use of diligence.—Form of issue adjusted for the trial of a case of wrongous use of diligence against an agent of the person in whose interest it was used.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

JAMES MACROBBIE, accountant, Glasgow, brought an action of damages against Lewis M'Lellan and others, trustees of the late Peter M'Lellan, iron merchant, Glasgow, and Messrs Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick, writers there, the agents in the trust, for illegally taking decree against him and doing diligence thereon in the following circumstances, as set forth by the pursuer.

On 17th February 1890, M'Lellan's trustees, who were bondholders over certain subjects in Glasgow, presented in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow a petition of maills and duties against MacRobbie, as trustee under the trust-deed granted by William Barrie, the proprietor of the subjects, and also against the tenants, the prayer of the petition concluding,—"And in the event of any of the defenders appearing and offering opposition hereto to find such appearing and opposing defenders liable jointly and severally in expenses."

The inducice expired on 24th February without appearance having been entered for the defenders, but in order to keep himself informed of the procedure in the action, although he had no interest to oppose the prayer MacRobbie upon that day posted an intimation to the Sheriff-clerk, written on a sheet of notepaper, in the following terms:—"23 Scott Street, Glasgow, 24 Feb. 1890.—Notice of appearance for James MacRobbie, accountant, Glasgow, in the action of maills and duties, at the instance of the trustees of the late Peter M'Lellan. JAMES MACROBBIE." This notice

No. 102.
Jan. 31, 1891.
MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

was not received by the Sheriff-clerk until the 25th, when the Clerk of Court called the attention of the petitioners' agent to the intimation, which had been received from MacRobbie, and the agent moved that it be received as a notice of appearance, and subsequently wrote upon it, "Glasgow, 24th February 1890.—I consent to the above being received. Signed for SAMUEL CARRICK, pursuers' agent, WM. GEMMELL, pror."

MacRobbie then averred in his condescendence as follows;—(Cond. 8) " . . . The consent on the intimation was not put on until after the 25th February 1890. The date on the same is untrue, and this consent was an attempt to validate an informal document so as to give it the effect of the statutory notice of appearance lodged within the proper time. No authority was given by the pursuer for this or for any of the subsequent procedure, and he did not authorise any motion to be made for or on his behalf, and the pursuers (the defenders in this action), so acting in writing this consent, and in making the motion, acted illegally and unwarrantably. These actings were approved of by the defenders, and were specially sanctioned and authorised by the defenders, Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick." (Cond. 9) "On 27th February 1890, the Sheriff-substitute (Murray) pronounced the following interlocutor:—' . . . The Sheriff-substitute, on the pursuer's motion, and of consent, allows the notice of appearance for James MacRobbie to be received, and in respect that he has failed to lodge defences, and the other defenders to lodge a notice of appearance, holds them all as confessed: Decerns in the maills and duties as craved: Finds the said James MacRobbie liable in expenses, allows an account thereof to be given in,' &c. This interlocutor was ultra vires of the Sheriff-substitute. The Sheriff-substitute had no power to receive such intimation as notice of appearance, even with consent. The intimation was not in the statutory form of a notice of appearance, nor lodged timeously, and was not intended as a notice of appearance for the purpose of opposing the action. . . . The writing of the consent on the intimation did not validate the irregularity, as all these consents are now abolished by the Sheriff Court Act of 1876."

MacRobbie then set forth that decree for the taxed amount of expenses, £14, 14s. 1d., was afterwards pronounced without intimation to him. (Cond. 11) "These decrees were duly extracted by the defenders, but, before the same were extracted, and while the process was still in the extractor's department, intimation was made to Messrs Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick, or Mr Samuel M Carrick, that the decrees appeared to have been taken in an irregular manner against the pursuer, and that the same might be suspended if decree were extracted and attempted to be enforced. . . . When the defenders obtained extracts the said defenders, Messrs Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick, wrote the pursuer on the 14th and 24th April 1890, demanding payment of the sums and threatening to charge unless payment made. The letter of the 14th April was the first intimation the pursuer received of the decrees against him. Immediately on receipt of this letter he called upon the law-agent of the trust, Mr John B. Aiken, of Messrs Burns, Aiken, & Company, who stated that, in his opinion, no further proceedings would follow, as obviously the decrees had been obtained in an irregular and illegal manner, and that the defenders would not attempt to enforce the same." (Cond. 12) "Payment of the sums was not made, and no steps were taken to suspend the decrees, as the pursuer and his law-agent believed that the defenders would not attempt to enforce decrees which had been irregularly and illegally obtained against the pursuer. On the 26th day of May 1890 the pursuer, however, was charged at the instance of the defenders. . . . This charge was instructed by the defenders or the said Samuel M Carrick, for whom they are responsible." (Cond. 13) "On the same date (26th May 1890) a notice was served upon the pursuer, 'that, failing payment of the sums mentioned in the foregoing charge of payment, a petition for cessio will be presented in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, at the instance of the within designed pursuers, against you on the 4th day of June 1890 years.' . . . The service of this notice was also instructed by the defenders or the said Samuel M Carrick, for whom they are responsible." (Cond. 14) "The pursuer, on receiving said charge and notice of cessio, at once put the matter in the hands of the law-agent of the trust, and Mr Aiken at once waited upon the defenders, Messrs Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick, and saw Mr Samuel M Carrick, and pointed out to him the illegality and irregularity of the whole proceedings in obtaining the decrees and seeking to enforce them. This defender however, insisted upon payment of the sums in the decree. The pursuer, seeing that the defenders intended to enforce their diligence, at once instructed his Edinburgh agent, who presented a note of suspension of said charge and notice of cessio in the Bill-Chamber, on the 3d day of June 1890. The said note of suspension was duly served upon the defenders, the said trustees, and answers lodged on their behalf, and the Lord Ordinary on the Bills passed said note. But on the 1st day of July 1890, the said defenders, through their Edinburgh agents, lodged a note before the Lord Ordinary, agreeing to the said charge being suspended and to pay pursuer's judicial expenses in connection with said note of suspension. The charge was accordingly suspended by the Lord Ordinary on the 2d day of July 1890, and the pursuer's judicial expenses have since been paid." (Cond. 15) "By and through the above wrongous proceedings the pursuer has suffered in his credit and feelings, having been rendered notour bankrupt by said charge having been served upon him. He is a well-known accountant in Glasgow, and is well known to different members of the legal and mercantile professions, several of whom knew that decrees had been obtained against him, but not the circumstances under which they had been obtained. This has had the effect of considerably damaging his credit, because it is mainly through the recommendation of professional gentlemen the pursuer obtains employment as trustee, factor, &c., and these wrongous proceedings on behalf of the defenders have become extensively known in the circle in which he moves, and have had the effect of considerably damaging the pursuer's reputation. The pursuer, moreover, believes and avers that the said proceedings were taken against him by the defenders, Messrs Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick, or at least by Samuel M Carrick, who is a partner of said firm, recklessly and maliciously, and without probable cause, with the view of rendering him notour bankrupt, and so embarrassing him in his negotiations for the future arrangement of the management of the property belonging to the trust-estate of the said William Barrie. At all events the defenders, Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick well knew, or ought to have known, that the proceedings which they were taking against the pursuer were not only irregular but also illegal."

No. 102.

Jan. 31, 1891.
MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders, having wrongfully obtained decrees against the pursuer and charged him on same, rendering him notour bankrupt, and served a notice of cessio upon him, all as condescended on, are liable to him in the amount of damages claimed, with expenses. (2) Separatim, The defenders, the said Forbes, Bryson, Carrick, and Samuel M Carrick, having obtained said decrees, and instructed said charge and notice of cessio wrongfully and maliciously

No. 102.

Jan. 31, 1891.
MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

and without probable cause, all as above narrated, are liable to him in the amount of damages sued for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 2d December 1890, approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, the defenders, Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick, and Samuel M Carrick, on or about 7th day of March 1890, wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause, obtained decree against James MacRobbie for payment of £14, 14s. 1d., and on or about 26th day of May 1890 they charged him, or caused him to be charged on said decree; and on or about 26th day of May 1890 served notice of cessio upon him, or caused such notice to be served, all to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £250." His Lordship refused to allow an issue against M'Lellan's trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed, and moved the First Division to vary the terms of the issue by the deletion of the words "maliciously and without probable cause." He did not insist for an issue against M'Lellan's trustees.

Argued for him;—The words in question ought to be omitted from the issue. The word "wrongfully" was the appropriate word in an issue of the kind. It implied the existence of a legal wrong—such as the wrongous use of diligence—from which malice would be presumed.[1] This was not one of the class of cases where the diligence used had been incidental to legal proceedings. There had here been a manipulation of the forms of process. In the first place, a wholly informal document had been converted into a notice of appearance, and had been treated as such. The forms of process had been further tampered with, and an illegal decree had been taken, followed by a charge, and the threat of an application for cessio. A distinction was always drawn between a wrong done to a defender by a pursuer in the course of a litigation, and a case where diligence had been put in force. In the latter case, it was not necessary to aver malice. Want of probable cause was manifestly inappropriate in a case of the kind, as it properly was confined to cases of criminal prosecutions or judicial slanders. It was said that the pursuer ought to have suspended the decree, but that course was not taken because the agent for the defenders, Carrick, knew, and had been apprised, that he was proceeding irregularly, and it was not to be supposed that he would carry matters further.

Argued for the respondents;—The real objection was to the decree, and not to the diligence. The former was always obtained in open Court, but the latter was taken at a person's own hand. In the former case, malice and want of probable cause must be put into the issue.[1] When a defender entered appearance, it was presumed, by section 16 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), that he intended "to state a defence," and it was not the fault of the present respondents that appearance was not entered in the statutory form. As the defender had not appeared, he was not entitled to sue an action of damages for the alleged wrong done to him by the decree having been taken unless he put malice in issue. The case of Bell[2] illustrated the difference between an action founded upon an irregular decree, and one founded upon the illegal use of diligence.

[1] Davies & Co. v. Brown and Lyell, June 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 842, 39 Scot. Jur. 471; Ormiston v. Redpath, Brown, & Co., Feb. 24, 1866, 4 Macph. 488, 38 Scot. Jur. 225.

[2] Bell v. Gunn, June 21, 1889, 21 D. 1008, 31 Scot. Jur. 556.

No. 102. At advising,—

Jan. 31, 1891. MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The trustees of the deceased Peter M'Lellan raised an action of maills and duties in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, which was directed against various tenants in certain heritable subjects, and also against the present pursuer as proprietor of these tenements, the prayer of the petition concluding,—"And in the event of any of the defenders appearing and offering opposition hereto, to find such appearing and opposing defenders liable jointly and severally in expenses."

There was certainly no occasion for anyone to enter appearance in the action unless with the view of stating defences. At the same time, there was no irregularity or impropriety if the proprietor chose to enter appearance for the purpose of seeing what was being done in the process. Accordingly notice of appearance was entered for him in these terms:—"23 Scott Street, Glasgow 24 Feb. 1890.—Notice of appearance for James MacRobbie, accountant, Glasgow, in the action of maills and duties at the instance of the trustees of the late Peter M'Lellan. JAMES MACROBBIE." But it was not received by the clerk until after the expiration of the inducice, and no effect would therefore have been given to it if the agent for the pursuers had not, by minute on the interlocutor sheet, consented to the intimation being received. Having done so, the pursuers' agent then craved decree against the defender, and asked that the defender should be found liable in expenses, and decree was so pronounced.

There cannot be a doubt that that was a very wrongful and improper proceeding, because the pursuers' agent had asked for something which was beyond the prayer of the petition, and which the present pursuer had no reason to apprehend would be asked for. The prayer of the petition, so far as regarded expenses was only directed against those who might appear and offer opposition, which MacRobbie had not done, and accordingly a wrongful act was committed by the defender Carrick as agent for Peter M'Lellan's trustees.

But this action is not brought to recover damages for that wrong, for which indeed no action would lie, but for the wrongful use of diligence. The complaint is that diligence was used upon the decree which was thus improperly obtained. The allegation is that a charge was made upon the decree, and that notice of an application for cessio was served upon the pursuer, and these proceedings are complained of as amounting to a wrongous use of diligence. Upon the pursuer's averments upon record, I am of opinion that there was a wrongous use of diligence. Whether any great damage has been suffered by the pursuer is another matter.

The question now is, what is to be the form of issue? I think it must be for wrongous use of diligence, and it is not necessary that there should be any averment of malice to make such an action relevant. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the introduction of the words "maliciously and without probable cause" would be quite out of place. But, as I have said, I am not disposed to approve of the insertion in the issue, as a substantial ground of action, of the fact of the decree having been wrongfully obtained. The ground of the action is the wrongful use of diligence, and accordingly the issue which I think we should approve would run as follows:—[His Lordship read the issue as printed below.]

LORD ADAM concurred.

No. 102.

Jan. 31, 1891.
MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is plain enough that there can be no action of damages at the instance of a person against whom a decree has been regularly obtained, on the ground that the decree was wrongful, or that the debt was not due, because no such decree can be obtained against a defender who has knowledge of the action and takes the proper steps to contest it. But there may be a claim of damages where a pursuer has entered into a contract not to take a decree in unqualified terms, or to delay taking the decree with a view to allow the defender an opportunity of making an extrajudicial settlement. In such cases, if the contract or undertaking is violated, the question between the parties is merely one of breach of contract, and there would be no propriety in holding that the person who sued for damages for the breach must prove that the defender acted maliciously. The present case affords an instance of such a case. The defender in the action of maills and duties in the Sheriff Court was not called upon to defend the action for the purpose of saving himself from liability, because decree was only sought against him for expenses in the event of his appearing and offering opposition. But what the pursuers of the inferior Court action did was to make MacRobbie a party to the action, and to take decree against him for expenses. This was clearly a breach of the conditions under which the process was instituted, and accordingly it appears to me that no question of malice enters into the case. If damage can be shewn to have resulted from the pursuers' un authorised act, the person who suffered must be entitled to compensation.

But I am not sure that we should have been able to send the case to a jury, if the proceedings to which I have referred had not been followed by the use of diligence. A very different question is thereby raised. In this case the present pursuer (the person against whom the decree was obtained) took care as soon as he saw it was to be enforced to have the diligence suspended. But in the meantime a legal wrong had been done by the use of diligence, and if the pursuer can satisfy a jury that he has suffered damage thereby, he will be entitled to compensation.

As regards the circumstances in which it may be necessary to give a defender the protection of putting malice and want of probable cause in the issue, it appears to me to be difficult, in view of the decisions, to lay down any precise rule. I should be very much disposed to reconsider the whole subject in a case fairly raising the question, for I agree with what fell from your Lordship in the chair in the course of the argument to the effect that probable cause is a defence which properly belongs to a person who is acting in the discharge of a public duty, e.g., the Crown Agent or the Procurator-fiscal. Where the diligence or warrant is obtained not in the performance of a public duty, but in the exercise of a private right, the proper and sufficient protection to the defender is that he should not be responsible in damages unless he is proved to have acted maliciously. But, for the reasons which have been given, I do not think that in this case the defender was in the exercise of a right of any kind, and I agree with your Lordship as to the form of issue which you have suggested for the trial of the cause.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow the defenders Forbes, Bryson, & Carrick and Samuel M. Carrick, on or about the

No. 102.

Jan. 31, 1891. MacRobbie v. M'Lellan's Trustees.

7th day of March 1890, having obtained decree against Jam MacRobbie for payment of £14, 14s. 1d. sterling, did, on or abo 26th day of May 1890, wrongfully charge him or cause him to charged on said decree; and on or about 26th May 1890, d wrongfully serve notice of cessio upon him, or cause such noti to be served, all to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid £250."

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.* Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Asher—C. K. Mackenzie.

MARY E. PATTISON OR CUNNINGHAM CRAIG AND OTHERS (Pattison's Trustees) AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Murray—Dickson.

HENRY CHRISTIE AND OTHERS (Robertson's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Comrie Thomson—Rhind.

Bank—Cash-credit bond—Bank's claim in question with co-obligant—Accumulation of interest.—In December 1877 a limited company and five pers granted a cash-credit bond to a bank for £1500 in security of a cash account be operated on by the company. The obligants bound themselves to pa interest from the times of the respective advances at bank rates till repaym and it was provided that a stated account made out from the bank's boo should be a sufficient charge against the obligants. Subsequently the ba agreed to extend the credit by £1000 on receiving an additional obligation fr two of the obligants.

At the annual bank balance on 31st October in each year the bank debit the account with the amount of interest accrued during the year, and carri forward the total balance. At 31st October 1878 the balance due by the co pany was £2468. After October 1878 the account was not operated on by company, but at the balance in each year the bank continued to charge year's interest to the debit of the account, and to carry forward the balance. November 1881 the company resolved to go into voluntary liquidation. appointed a liquidator, but the business was carried on as before. In Octo 1884 the bank sent to the company a statement of the account shewing balance due of £3164, and the liquidator on behalf of the guarantors wrote the bank, on 15th October 1884, that they had some prospect of the compan properties being sold at a price which would be almost sufficient to meet liabilities, and that they "would desire that your bank should allow this acco to remain in the position it is at present" until the matter was settl adding,—"If the sale is not carried out, then the property would require to sold at the earliest opportunity, and the guarantors would require to make any deficiency in the price." The bank in reply wrote agreeing to take no st for payment in the meantime.

In 1888 the bank raised an action against the personal obligants in the ca account bond and the supplementary obligation for payment of principal su of £1500 and £968 respectively advanced to the company, with compe interest thereon from 31st October 1878, or, alternatively, from 31st Oct 1881, the last balance before the liquidation, or otherwise for simple inte from one or other of these dates.

After setting forth the deeds founded on the pursuers alleged that in 1 prior to the liquidation, they had requested payment of the interest accumula and that in 1884 an arrangement was made in writing between the liqui on behalf of the obligants and the bank by which the latter agreed to de enforcing payment on condition that the obligants acknowledged liability accumulations of interest as shewn in the account, and also for future accumu tions calculated in the same manner, and that the liquidator on behalf of

* Decided Jan. 30, 1891.

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.

Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

whole obligants agreed to this. The pursuers further alleged that at the date of the liquidation the company was insolvent. The only evidence of the alleged agreement produced was the letter by the liquidator of 15th October 1884.

Held (1) (following Reddie v. Williamson, 1 Macph. 228) that the bank by debiting the account with the year's interest in each year extinguished the claim for that interest, and converted it into an advance of principal; and therefore (2) that the personal obligants were only liable under the cash-credit obligations for the £1500 and £1000 of principal, with interest thereon from 31st October 1887, the date of the last balance; (3) that the obligations were not extended by the letter of 15th October 1884; and (4) that the voluntary liquidation had not the effect of closing the account.

1st Division. Lord Trayner. B.

On 27th December 1877 the Moel Tryfan Crown Slate Company, Limited, which was formed for the purpose of working certain slate quarries in Wales, and George Handasyde Pattison, Thomas Field, James Somerville, Henry Christie, and Daniel Robertson, granted a cash-credit bond to the Commercial Bank of Scotland, binding each as full debtor, and all conjunctly and severally, to make payment to the bank at any time when the same should be demanded after three months from the last date thereof, of the sum of £1500 sterling, or such part or parts thereof as should at any time be due to the bank upon a cash-credit account to be kept in the books of the bank in name of the company, and to be operated upon by the company. The clause stipulating for interest was,—"Together also with interest of the said sum or sums which may be due on said account from the time or times of the respective advances till the same be repaid, and that at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, or at such other higher rates as may be charged by the bank on cash-credit accounts for the time, the bank having at all times power to fix and alter the rates of interest to be charged on said account without notice given to us, the parties hereto, or any of us, or our foresaids." There was further this clause,—"And it is hereby specially provided and declared that a stated account made out from the books of the said bank, and signed by its accountant, shall be sufficient to constitute a charge or balance against us, and each of us, and our foresaids, whereof no suspension shall at any time pass or be presented at the instance of us, or any of us, except on consignation only of the sum appearing to be due thereon; and further, declaring that all communications regarding the said account, or the management thereof, shall, or may, be made to us, the other parties hereto, through the chairman or secretary of the said company for the time being, until the bank shall consider it necessary to demand a final settlement of the balance due."

By letter of obligation, dated 9th and 10th May 1878, Mr Pattison and Mr Somerville, in consideration of the bank having agreed to allow the company an additional credit of £1000 by way of overdraft on the cash-credit account kept in name of the company with the bank, bound not only the company but themselves as directors, and as individuals, to pay the bank the sum of £1000, or whatever smaller sum might be overdrawn on the account.

An account was opened under the cash-credit, which was operated on by the company.

At the bank's annual balance on 31st October in each year the amount of interest accrued during the past year was entered on the debit side of the account, and the total balance carried forward to the next account.

On 31st October 1878 the balance due to the bank was £2468, 14s. 7d. Subsequent to that date there were no operations by the company, but in each year down to October 1887 the bank at the annual balance debited the account with the year's interest, and carried forward the balance.

On 8th March 1881, Mr Somerville wrote to the bank;—"I have yours

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

of the 3d. On behalf of the directors and other obligants, I have to acknowledge the kindly forbearance of your bank in regard to our account to which, I presume, more special attention has been called through the present position of Mr Field's affairs. . . . Until the end of March the property of the company is under offer for sale. It was valued in 1879 by the Surveyor of Crown Property in North Wales at upwards of £60,800. If no sale is effected by private contract under the offer referred to, measures are to be immediately taken to realise the whole property, and the directors expect to be in a position to pay off our debt to the bank by the ensuing term of Martinmas. . . ."

On 15th October 1881, the bank wrote to Mr Somerville;—"Our annual balance takes place on the 31st inst., and we are very anxious before then of having the accounts of the Moel Tryfan Crown Slate Co put upon a regular footing. We shall therefore feel obliged by your arranging before that date to pay us the interest which has accumulated to the extent of £215, 9s. 10d., and we shall also be glad to hear what prospect there is now of the principal being shortly paid up."

On 10th November 1881, the company resolved to wind up voluntarily and appointed Mr Thomas Bennet Clark liquidator.

On 9th October 1884, the bank wrote to Mr Clark;—"Referring to your call to-day, we enclose a statement of the account for the three years to 31st October last, shewing the sum then due to be £3164, 9s. 2d. and another year's interest will soon be due."

On 15th October 1884, Mr Clark wrote to the bank;—"With reference to your letter to me of 9th instant, and to my interview with you yesterday, I now write to explain the present position of the affairs of this company, and the wishes of the guarantors of the account with the Commercial Bank. . . . After the company went into voluntary liquidation, various efforts were made to reconstruct the company on lines which would save the shareholders the total loss of their capital but these efforts were not attended with success. Thereafter the properties were attempted to be sold, both publicly and privately; but although substantial offers were received, a disposal of the properties on the terms offered would have involved the guarantors in a certain amount of loss. They have accordingly entered into an agreement of lease for three years from 1st March last with Messrs Leeming & Wilson, with an option to these gentlemen to purchase the whole properties at the end of any one year, at the prices named in this agreement. I enclose an excerpt from this document narrating the terms. The quarries are being energetically worked, and Mr Leeming, the senior lessee, is a man of considerable means and influence. He has already laid out a large sum in working the place, and is arranging a joint stock company to take over the properties. If this be eventually carried out, the price received will be almost if not quite sufficient to meet all liabilities. The guarantors have every hope that it will be carried out, looking to the money that has already been spent by the lessees on the place, and they accordingly would desire that your bank should allow this account to remain in the position it is at present until the result of this agreement of lease and sale is settled. If the sale be not carried out, then the property would require to be sold at the earliest opportunity, and the guarantors would require to make up any deficiency in the price."

On 16th October 1884 the bank wrote to Mr Clark in reply,—"Dear Sir,—We are favoured with your letter of yesterday. The position of the account is not such as we care about, but as we regard ourselves as fully secured, the various obligants for the debt to us may hold, unless anything shall emerge rendering in our opinion the adoption of a different

No. 103.
Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

course necessary, that we will accede to their request to take no steps for payment in the meantime, nor until the result of the agreement of lease and sale to Messrs Leeming & Wilson is seen. This should be not later than 30 Sep. 1886. Of course it is understood that if nothing comes out of that agreement we are not to be bound to wait until a sale is effected before getting payment of the amount due to us. We presume the representatives of the late Mr Daniel Robertson are fully cognisant of their liability in this matter, and that they and all the others are agreeable to the proposed delay. . . ."

At 31st October 1887 the bank account stood thus:—

1886.	Nov. 1. To balance, . .	£3666	18 5
1887.	Oct. 31. Interest, . . .	189	13 4
		£3856	11 9

The company's property having subsequently been realised at a price insufficient to pay certain mortgages over it, the bank brought an action against the co-obligants under the cash-credit bond and the supplementary obligation for recovery of that sum, of which they alleged that £2343, 5s. 3d.—viz., £1500 of principal and £843, 5s. 3d. of interest—was secured by the cash-credit bond, and £1513, 6s. 6d.—viz., £968, 14s. 7d. of principal and £544, 11s. 11d. of interest—by the letter of obligation. The summons concluded against the obligants in the cash-credit bond for payment "of £1500 of principal, together with (1) the sum of £843, 5s. 3d., being compound interest upon said sum of principal from 31st October 1878 until 31st October 1887; or (2) the sum of £598, 6s. 8d., being simple interest at cash-account rates upon the said sum of principal from 31st October 1878 until 31st October 1887; or (3) the sum of £419, 11s. 7d., being compound interest at cash-account rates upon the said sum of principal from 31st October 1881 until 31st October 1887; or (4) the sum of £379, 4s. 4d., being simple interest at cash-account rates on the said sum of principal from 31st October 1881 until 31st October 1887; together with interest at cash-account rates upon such sum of principal and interest as may be found due from 31st October 1887 until paid." There was a further conclusion against Mr Pattison's executors and the trustee upon Mr Somerville's trust-estate for payment of the principal sum of £968, 14s. 7d., with the same alternative demand for interest as under the cash-credit bond, subject to deduction of two sums of £500 and £134, 18s. 5d., already paid by the two parties respectively.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) "In 1881, prior to the liquidation, the attention of Mr Somerville, who represented the whole co-obligants, was called to the state of the cash-credit account, and a request was then made for payment of the interest which had accumulated, which, however, was not complied with. After the company went into liquidation, endeavours were made by the liquidator to realise the property of the company to the best advantage in order, if possible, to save the obligants for the cash-credit account from loss; and accordingly, in 1883, the liquidator entered into an agreement with certain parties to let to them the company's slate quarries in Wales, with an option to the lessees to purchase at any time up to 31st December 1886. In order to facilitate these negotiations, and at the request of Mr Bennet Clark, the liquidator of the company, who acted with the authority and on behalf of the whole obligants for the cash-credit account, the bank did not proceed at once to enforce payment of the sums due upon said account. A copy of the account, shewing the accumulations of interest as at 31st October 1883, was sent to Mr Bennet Clark in October 1884. Thereafter an arrangement was made in writing between the bank and Mr Bennet Clark, by which the former consented to delay making an immediate demand for payment on condition that the obligants acknowledged liability for the accumulations of interest, as shewn on the said account, upon the sums of principal for which they were respectively liable, and also for the interest calculated in the same manner, which would thereafter become due during the extended period for which the bank consented to delay enforcing payment. To this condition Mr Bennet Clark, who throughout acted with the authority and on behalf of the whole parties liable for the cash credit account, assented. The bank only granted the very exceptional delay asked for in reliance on the knowledge which the obligants had of the state of the account, and of their liability for the interest accumulated and accumulating thereon, admitted or undertaken as above mentioned. Subsequently to October 1884 the bank have each year sent to Mr Bennet Clark, at his written request, a copy of the account, shewing the accumulations of interest upon it. It was resolved, in November 1887, that the Moel Tryfan Company should be voluntarily wound up. At the date the company had not available assets for the payment of its debts, and was insolvent. It is averred that, according to the law of England, the effect of a resolution to wind up voluntarily, when the company is insolvent, is to stop the running of interest against the company, as at the date of the winding up, upon all debts due by the company. In December 1887 Mr Bennet Clark intimated to the bank that he had sold the company's property at a price insufficient to meet even the first mortgage, and that the guarantors would therefore have to pay the debt due to the bank."*

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

It was averred that the liability under the letter of obligation was joint and several, and not pro rata.

There were separate defences for Mr Pattison's executors and the trustee on Mr Somerville's sequestrated estate, and for Mr Robertson's trustee—Mr Robertson having died prior to the date of the agreement founded on. The other parties called did not appear to defend the action.

Pattison's executors admitted liability for the £1500, with interest at 5 per cent from 31st October 1887, and for £17, 10s., being interest on the £500 from the same date to the date of payment on 26th July 1888.

Robertson's trustees admitted liability for the £1500, with interest from October 1887, which they had accordingly consigned.

They both denied further liability.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers are entitled, in terms of the said cash-credit bond, and in virtue of the agreement condescended upon, to decree for the principal sum of £1500, with interest as concluded for, in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions in the summons. (There was a similar plea against the estates of Mr Somerville and Mr Field.) (3) The pursuers are entitled, in terms of the said obligation, dated 9th and 10th May 1878, and in virtue of the agreement condescended on, to decree against the representatives of the deceased Mr Pattison for the principal sum of £968, 14s. 7d., with interest as concluded for, in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions in the summons, under deduction, as at 26th July 1888, of the sum of £500 mentioned in the summons. (There was a similar plea against the estate of Mr Somerville.)

Pattison's executors and Somerville's trustee pleaded;—(3) The pursuers' averments can only be proved by writ or oath. (5) The pursuers having accumulated principal and interest from year to year, they are not entitled to reopen the account in order to separate the amount as finally stated into principal and interest. (8) The defenders having tendered

* The italicised portions of the article were added in the Inner-House.

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.

Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

payment and made consignation of the principal sum of £1500, and interest thereon from the date of the bank's immediately preceding balance, are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions relative to the sums due under the bond of cash-credit. (9) The defenders Pattison's trustees having paid or consigned the sum of £500, and having tendered interest thereon from the date of the bank's last balance to date of payment or consignation, and the defender Mr Bennet Clark (Somerville's trustee) having ranked the pursuers upon the trust-estate under his charge for £500, and interest thereon from 31st October 1886, the present defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Robertson's trustees stated the same pleas so far as applicable to the cash-credit bond.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 13th March 1889, found that the defenders, obligants or representatives of obligants under the cash-credit bond, were bound to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1500, with interest at 5 per cent from 31st October 1887, and that the defenders Pattison's executors and Somerville's trustee were jointly and severally liable to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1000, with interest from 31st October 1887.*

---

* "OPINION.—So far as concerns the defenders' obligations under the cash-credit bond, I cannot distinguish this case from Reddie v. Williamson (1 Macph. 228). Applying the principle laid down in that case, I think the defenders are only liable (under the cash-credit bond) for £1500, with interest from 31st October 1887.

"The pursuers do not distinguish this case from Reddie v. Williamson, but they maintain that the obligants in the bond are liable for accumulated interest as well as principal, in respect they agreed through their agent to pay it, as averred in cond. 4. Such an averment (if remitted to probation at all) could only be proved by the writ or oath of the obligants, as it amounts to this, that the obligants, whose obligation was defined in writing, had agreed to an extension of or addition to the obligation so defined. But I have not allowed any proof of that averment, because I think it is not sufficiently specific. It is said that the pursuers delayed enforcing payment of their claim because the obligants, through their authorised agent, 'assented' to the condition proposed by the pursuers, that in respect of such delay they (the obligants) should acknowledge liability 'for the accumulation of interest upon the sums of principal for which they were respectively liable.' Assuming that the obligants assented to a proposal so expressed, it does not follow that they consented to enlarge their existing obligation. They acknowledged liability for accumulations of interest no doubt, but they were already liable for these as principal, if the pursuers, according to the custom of bankers, accumulated principal and interest each year. It was not an express undertaking that notwithstanding of such accumulation the obligants would be bound for £1500 of principal and interest, although accumulated as well. I allowed the pursuers an opportunity of amending their record, to the effect of averring such an express undertaking, but they declined to avail themselves of this opportunity, I presume because they cannot make such an averment, or cannot prove it.

"I have fixed the date from which interest is to run as from 31st October 1887, because that was the last balance of the account in which interest and principal were accumulated before the action was raised. I was referred to the case of Gilmour (7 R. 734) as an authority for holding that interest should be allowed from 31st October 1881, being the balance immediately preceding the date when the Moel Tryfan Company went into liquidation. In Gilmour's case interest was allowed from the balance preceding the date of the principal debtor's insolvency, because on the occurrence of that event 'the account became inoperative.' The same reason does not apply here. There was no insolvency or bankruptcy, or anything else to render the account in question inoperative.

No. 103.
Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

On 19th March following the Lord Ordinary pronounced another interlocutor with findings, bringing out the specific pecuniary results in each case.

The pursuers reclaimed, and after counsel had been heard in January 1890, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was recalled hoc statu, the amendment on article 4 of the condescendence (as noted above in italics) was allowed, and a proof of the averments contained in that article (except the amendment as to the law of England) allowed.

The letters above quoted were produced at the proof.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The two conclusions they pressed were the first and fourth. (1) From the terms of the letter quoted above, it was evident that the liquidator as at its date admitted a balance of £3164, and that the inducement which led the bank to delay enforcing their obligation was to give the guarantors a chance of selling the property. It amounted to an express arrangement which ought to receive effect. (2) Assuming that this arrangement was not proved, the effect of the voluntary winding-up of the company, coupled with the fact which must now be admitted that it was insolvent at the time, was to stop the account, and the bank was entitled to interest from 31st October 1881, being the date of the immediately preceding balance. The bank was not bound to accumulate the interest, or make any new balance after that date. The account stopped then, and subsequent accumulations, although they appeared in the accounts stated by the bank, fell to be treated as mere book entries. No doubt in Reddie's case it was the death of the holder of the credit which operated the stoppage, and in Gilmour's case it was the granting of a trust-deed for creditors.[1] But although the facts of the present case were not the same, the legal consequences of a voluntary winding-up were the same, and the duty of the liquidator was to attend to the realisation and distribution of the company property.[2] He could not have touched any unexhausted balance of the cash-credit. There could not be pari passu distribution consistently with a continued drawing on the cash-credit account, which would increase the liability of the cautioners. If the company had been solvent,—which events had established it was not,—no question of the present kind could have arisen.

The company went into liquidation, not because it was insolvent (it is not, as far as I know, insolvent now), but because it was not successful. The liquidation was merely a winding up of a business, and there was nothing in that fact such as is afforded by bankruptcy, to prevent further operations on the account. The appointment of a liquidator was the act of the company itself, who might have appointed one of their own number to wind up the business if they had pleased. It was not a liquidation under the authority or supervision of the Court.

"As regards the additional obligation for £1000 granted by Messrs Pattison and Somerville, I am of opinion that it imposes a joint and several, and not merely a pro rata liability. It is a cautionary obligation, and each cautioner is directly liable for the whole debt guaranteed. Further, the obligants in the cautionary obligation are liable, in my opinion, for interest. The obligation was granted (as it bears) to enable the principal debtor to obtain money advances, and on such advances interest is due and exigible without special stipulation. This obligation was really an addendum to the cash-credit bond, binding the granters of it to make payment of the debt under that bond to the extent of £1000. One account was kept for the advances made both on the bond and obligation, and I treat them as practically one, and therefore allow interest on this £1000 from 31st October 1887."

[1] Gilmour v. Bank of Scotland, March 19, 1880, 7 R. 734; Reddie v. Williamson, Jan. 9, 1863, 1 Macph. 228, 35 Scot. Jur. 170.

[2] Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), secs. 131 and 133.

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

(3) The point specially urged by Robertson's Trustees was that by giving time to the principal debtor the bank had relieved them. But the bank had not undertaken any such obligation as would prejudice the cautioners' rights, and had not tied their hands in any way.[1]

Argued for the respondents Pattison's Trustees and others;—It was conceded that the company must now be held to have been insolvent as at 31st October 1881, but under this reservation that insolvency was not in view of the parties to the cash-credit transaction at that date. Such an agreement as the pursuers averred was constituted by the letters founded on must be express, and was not to be spelt out of a correspondence. Further, no authority to the liquidator to conclude it was proved, and even although he may have had a general authority to represent the company, that would not entitle him to alter the terms of the cash-credit. The fact was that the bank resolved to take its chance of the company being able to effect a sale, and to pay the whole debt. In a voluntary liquidation, such as the present, the running of interest did not stop. A compulsory liquidation, which was a statutory proceeding, was different.[2] The circumstances in the cases of Reddie and Gilmour, so far as regarded the stopping of the running of interest, were not in point here, although the principle of these cases applied.

Argued for Robertson's Trustees;—They adopted the argument for Pattison's Trustees. As Mr Robertson had died prior to the date of the alleged agreement, they could not be affected by it. Further, the bank had given time to the principal debtor, and had thus relieved them.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The only question submitted for our consideration under this claiming note was the amount of interest which should be charged upon a principal sum of £1500, for which all the defenders are liable, conjunctly and severally, and upon a principal sum of £1000, for which the representatives of the late George Handasyde Pattison and James Somerville are alone liable.

The facts which raise the question are these. On 27th December 1877 the Moel Tryfan Crown Slate Company, Limited, George Handasyde Pattison, Thomas Field, James Somerville, Henry Christie, and Daniel Robertson, granted a cash-credit bond to the pursuers, the Commercial Bank, by which, on the narrative that the bank had allowed them a standing credit to the extent of £1500 sterling upon a cash-credit account to be kept in the books of the bank, in the name of the Moel Tryfan Company, and to be operated upon by that company, or by any person having their written authority, they bound themselves and their successors, each as full debtors, and conjunctly and severally, to pay to the bank the said sum of £1500, or such part thereof as should at any time be resting to the bank on said cash-credit account, with interest at 5 per cent or at such rates. It was further stipulated in the usual way that a stated account made out from the books of the bank should be sufficient to constitute a charge of balance against the granters.

Further, by a letter of obligation, dated 9th and 10th May 1878, Mr Pattison and Mr Somerville, in consideration of the bank having agreed to allow the Moel Tryfan Company an additional credit of £1000 by way of overdraft on the cash-credit account kept in name of the company with the bank, bound not only the company, but themselves, as directors and as individuals, to pay the

[1] Muir v. Crawford, May 4, 1875, 2 R. (H. of L.) 148.
[2] Bell's Comm. i. 695 (7th edn.), p. 651 (5th edn.); Ex parte Coulbourn, L. R., Equity, 478.

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

bank the said sum of £1000, or whatever smaller sum might be overdrawn on said cash-credit account.

A cash-credit account was opened in the books of the bank in name of the Moel Tryfan Company, and was operated upon by that company. A copy of that account as appearing in the books of the bank has been produced, and, so far as I can see, it has been kept in the usual way. It is balanced on the 31st October of each year. The interest is periodically added to the principal, and the accumulated sum appears as the balance due on next year's account, with the result that it discloses a balance of £3856, 11s. 9d. of principal due by the Moel Tryfan Company at its close on 31st October 1887.

Applying the principles recognised in the case of Reddie v. Williamson, as the Lord Ordinary has done, the result is that those defenders who represent obligants under the cash-credit bond are liable for £1500 of that sum, and the defenders who represent the granters of the letter of obligation are liable for £1000, with interest on these sums respectively from the date of closing the account.

The pursuers do not dispute that the Lord Ordinary is right, if the case of Reddie v. Williamson applies, but they aver a special agreement, which, they say, renders that case inapplicable. When the case was before the Lord Ordinary, he refused to allow a proof of this alleged agreement, thinking that the pursuers' averments were not sufficiently specific; but when the case was before the Inner-House the pursuers were allowed to amend the record in this respect. A proof was allowed, and the case is now to be disposed of on the conclusion proof.

It appears from the cash-credit account that the balance due thereon at 31st October 1878 was £2468, 14s. 7d., and that the account was not further operated on, except that there was annually added by the bank the accruing interest. Upon the 10th November 1881 the company went into voluntary liquidation, and Mr Bennet Clark was appointed liquidator.

On 9th October 1884 the bank sent to Mr Bennet Clark, at his request, a statement of the account to 31st October 1883, shewing the sum then due by the company to be £3164, 9s. 2d. "Thereafter," it is said (and this is the special agreement averred), "an arrangement was made in writing between the bank and Mr Bennet Clark, by which the former consented to delay making an immediate demand for payment, on condition that the obligants acknowledged liability for the accumulations of interest, as shewn on the said account, upon the sums of principal for which they were respectively liable, and also for the interest calculated in the same manner, which would thereafter become due, during the extended period for which the bank consented to delay enforcing payment. On this condition Mr Bennet Clark, who throughout acted with the authority and on behalf of the whole parties liable for the cash-credit account, assented."

The "writing" by which this agreement is said to have been made consists of a letter by Mr Bennet Clark to the bank, of date 15th October 1884, and the bank's answer, of date 16th October 1884.

In his letter Mr Bennet Clark says that he writes to explain the present position of the affairs of the company, and the wishes of the guarantors of the account with the bank. He then states that efforts had been made to reconstruct the company and to sell the properties, and that the company had entered into an agreement of lease for three years, from 1st March last, with Messrs Leeming and Wilson, with an option to these gentlemen to purchase the whole properties

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

ne end of any one year, at the price named in the agreement, a copy of which e sends; that the quarries were being energetically worked, that a large sum money had been laid out in working the place, and that a joint stock company as being arranged to take over the properties.

Then he writes as follows,—"If this be eventually carried out, the price re- ived will be almost, if not quite, sufficient to meet all liabilities. The guarantors ve every hope that it will be carried out, looking to the money that has already en spent by the lessees on the place, and they accordingly would desire that ur bank should allow this account to remain in the position it is at present til the result of this agreement of lease and sale is settled. If the sale is not ried out, then the property would require to be sold at the earliest opportunity, d the guarantors would require to make up any deficiency in the price."

Now, this letter appears to me to express nothing more than a request that the nk would allow the account to remain in the position in which it then was at is, that they should not enforce payment of it), and to set forth the reasons y that request was made. It sets forth no terms or conditions on which the arantors were willing to purchase the delay requested. It says nothing about ir agreeing to become liable for accumulations of interest, for which up to t time they were not liable. No doubt it says, but only narrative, and as a son for requesting delay, that if the sale to the lessees was not carried out, the perties would require to be sold, and the guarantors would require to make any deficiency in the price. But it does not say that in the event of the delay ired being granted they would bind themselves to make up any deficiency the price beyond the amount of their existing liabilities, and this no doubt uld have been said if any such obligation had been intended.

I think, therefore, that this letter simply contained a request, unaccompanied th any conditions, that the bank would allow the account to remain in the ition in which it then was.

It seems to me that the letter of the bank carries the matter no further. What bank says is this,—"We are favoured with your letter of yesterday. The ition of the account is not such as we care about, but, as we regard ourselves fully secured, the various obligants for the debt to us may hold, unless any- ng shall emerge rendering, in our opinion, the adoption of a different course essary, that we will accede to their request to take no steps for payment in meantime, nor until the result of the agreement of lease and sale to Messrs eming & Wilson is seen."

I think that the bank thereby simply granted Mr Bennet Clark's request for ay. They couple their consent with no conditions, except that they reserve ver to act if circumstances should change.

I am therefore clearly of opinion that the pursuers have failed to prove the cial agreement libelled.

Assuming that Mr Bennet Clark had entered into the agreement libelled, the fenders deny that he was authorised by them to do so. In the view I take of case it is unnecessary to determine that question. I have only to say that an find no evidence that the guarantors gave Mr Bennet Clark any authority commit them to any further liability than they were already under.

The pursuers have further amended their record by averring that it was olved in November 1881 that the company should be voluntarily wound-up, at at this date the company had not available assets for the payment of its bts, and was insolvent, that the effect of the winding-up, coupled with

No. 103.
Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

insolvency, was to stop the running of interest against the company, as at the date of the winding-up, upon all debts due by the company. From this they argue that the cash-credit account became, at that date, a closed account, and that consequently they are entitled to interest on the principal sums due, from the date of the immediately preceding balance, 31st October 1881, till payment.

I do not think that the liquidation, seeing that it was a voluntary liquidation for the purpose of winding-up and reconstruction, would have any effect per se in closing the cash-credit account. As regards the alleged insolvency, the company was in this position, that it had difficulty in meeting its current expenses and that if it had been called upon at once to realise all its properties by forced sale, and to pay all its debts, its funds might possibly have proved insufficient for the purpose. But it continued for years afterwards to be a going company, and nobody appears to have then thought that its assets, if realised, would be insufficient to pay its debts. In that state of matters it does not occur to me that there was anything necessarily to close the cash-credit account.

In any view, I think the bank would have great difficulty in successfully maintaining this plea. They did not in point of fact close the account at the date of the liquidation. They continued to treat it as an open account down to 31st October 1887, and periodically accumulated interest thereon, as it was to their advantage to do in the event of the company having a surplus of assets, as they are in this action claiming payment of such interest from the defenders.

I do not think, accordingly, that this contention of the bank is well founded, and on the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. I think the cautioners are liable for the amount of the principal sum standing at the debit of the cash-credit account as shewn by the books of the bank at the date of the last balance on 31st October 1887, and for interest from that date, and not, as the bank contends, from November 1881, when the company went into liquidation.

The material consideration appears to me to be that it was matter of agreement between the parties that there was to be a single account as against the co-obligants, for which they were all to be jointly and severally liable, and there is a special provision in the agreement that "a stated account made out from the books of the bank, and signed by its accountant, shall be sufficient to constitute a charge or balance against us and each of us, and our foresaids whereof no suspension shall at any time pass or be presented at the instance of us or any of us, except on consignation only of the sum appearing to be due thereon." Of course, that does not mean that the account may be kept in any way that the bank may think fit. It must be kept in the ordinary way, and if there were any doubt as to what that was before the case of Reddie v. Williamson, there can be none since that decision. The account must be kept by the bank in the usual way in which a cash-credit account is kept, the interest upon the debit balance being always added at the close of each year, and so converted into principal. That is a mode of stating the account which may be in favour of the bank if the principal debtor remains solvent. If he becomes insolvent, it will be in favour of the bank only so long as the whole amount of the debit balance is within the limit of the cash-credit

No. 103.

Jan. 31, 1891.
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Pattison's Trustees.

here is a difference of liability only in this respect that the obligant who operates on the account will be liable to the whole extent of his operations, the obligants who do not operate only to the extent of their obligation under the ish-credit bond. But within the limits of the stipulated credit they are all able jointly and severally, and there can be only one account stated in one way ainst all.

The result in this case would thus be perfectly clear, if it were not for the leged agreement between the bank and the liquidator of the company, by hich it is said to have been arranged in October 1884 that the accounts should fter that date be otherwise stated. I agree with Lord Adam, for the reasons e has given, that there is no evidence of such an agreement. It is material, in eading the correspondence, to keep in view that the agreement alleged by the ank is a contract restricting their claims against the principal debtors, so that fter the date of the agreement interest could no longer be accumulated as gainst them for however long a time the debt might remain unpaid. Now, in tating the account against them the bank still continued to accumulate interest n the ordinary way, and if the company had remained solvent, it would have een for the interest of the bank to maintain that this was the proper way of tating the account. If that had happened, and the company had been charged or payment of the principal and accumulation, they could not, in my opinion, have resisted the demand. I see no ground for maintaining that the bank had given up their right to accumulate interest with principal. They had agreed to nothing, except that they would delay making an immediate demand for payment, and leave the account in the meantime in its actual position as an open account. The account was accordingly treated as an open account down to October 1887.

For the reasons already given, I think it clear that if the bank were entitled o state the account in this way against the company, they are bound to state it n the same way against the defenders.

On all the other points I agree with Lord Adam, and have nothing to add.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the reclaimers have failed to establish the agreement between themselves and Mr Bennet Clark alleged upon the record as amended: Therefore find and decern in terms of the interlocutors of 13th and 19th March 1889: Find the defenders and respondents entitled to expenses, except in so far as the same have been already disposed of," &c.

MELVILLE & LINDESAY, W.S.—MACANDREW, WRIGHT, & MURRAY, W.S.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 104.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Inglis' Trustees v. Breen.

J. S. NAPIER AND OTHERS (Inglis' Trustees), Pursuers and Nominal Raisers.

JOHN INGLIS Junior, Claimant (Respondent).—Murray—Ure.

MRS MARGARET INGLIS OR BREEN AND HUSBAND, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Asher—C. J. Guthrie—Salvesen.

Interest—Succession—Legacy.—Where the payment of a legacy was postponed for several years owing to the delay of the beneficiary to elect between her legal rights and the provisions under the trust-settlement, held that the legatee could not claim a higher rate of interest than had been actually received by the trustees down to the date of her election.

No. 104.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Inglis' Trustees v. Breen.

Per the Lord President and Lord M'Laren, that there is no general rule that the rate of interest payable on legacies is 5 per cent where the trustees are not in mora.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
C.

(Vide ante, May 31, 1887, 14 R. 740.)

This case raised several questions in the multiplepoinding relating to the distribution of the estate of the late Mr Anthony Inglis, previously reported, 14 R. 740, 17 R. (H. L.) 76.

The only point which now calls for notice was in regard to the interest due upon the legacy of £20,000 which the truster had directed to be paid to his daughter, Mrs Breen, "on the lapse of three months" after his death. The legacy would therefore have been payable on 10th April 1884, Mr Inglis having died on 10th January 1884, had Mrs Breen been then prepared to accept the provisions of her father's settlement. But on 28th January 1885 Mrs Breen's agent wrote to the trustees that he was instructed by her to claim legitim. On 5th February 1885 this election was recalled, and on 9th February 1886 her agents wrote intimating that Mrs Breen claimed her provisions under her father's settlement. On 31st May 1887 the Court held that Mrs Breen had not made her election. On 15th June 1887 she declared her election to take the settlement provisions by lodging a minute to that effect in the process of multiplepoinding.

Mrs Breen now claimed interest at 5 per cent on the legacy from 10th April 1884.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 25th June 1890, found, inter alia, that Mrs Breen was entitled "to payment as at 10th April 1884 of the sum of £20,000 sterling, free from legacy duty, together with interest thereon at such rate per cent per annum as may have been received by the trustees, from the said 10th day of April 1884 until 15th June 1887, and at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from that date, and until paid."*

---

* "Opinion.—The late Mr Inglis by his settlement directed his trustees inter alia, to make payment to his daughter, the claimant Mrs Breen, of the sum of £20,000, 'on the lapse of three months' after his death. Mr Inglis died on 10th January 1884, and the foresaid legacy would have been payable on 10th April 1884, provided Mrs Breen had been then prepared to accept the provisions of her father's settlement, instead of claiming her legal rights as one of his children. She was not then prepared to do so; and in fact did not elect to accept the provisions of her father's settlement until 15th June 1887, when she declared her election by a minute lodged in this process. It is maintained for her now that she had made this election by a letter dated 9th February 1885, addressed by her agents to the agents of her father's trustees; but I think Mrs Breen is barred from saying that her election was made or intimated by that letter, because she afterwards, in this process, maintained, and maintained successfully, that she had not made any election, but was still entitled to insist, as she did, in a claim in which she claimed alternatively her legal rights or the provisions under her father's settlement.

"The effect of Mrs Breen's election when made was to entitle her to the provisions which her father had made in her favour. She was therefore entitled to £20,000 as at 10th April 1884, being three months after her father's death. But she now claims interest on that sum at five per cent from 10th April 1884, and to this I think she is not entitled. The trustees of the late Mr Inglis could not pay Mrs Breen her legacy until her election was declared, and required to hold the funds in their hands until that was done. Accordingly, in my view, the full extent of Mrs Breen's right under this branch of her claim is to £20,000 as at 10th April 1884, with such interest thereon from that date till 15th June 1887 as the trustees had received on it, and five per cent from 15th June 1887 till paid, as on a specific legacy then due. . . ."

No. 104.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Inglis' Trustees v. Breen.

een reclaimed, and argued that she was entitled to interest at five from 10th April 1884 to 9th September 1884, her brother and e having received five per cent on his legacy up to that date. From ember 1884 to 9th February 1886, when Mrs Breen's agents ad- letter to the agents of her father's trustees making her election, it tted that she could not claim a higher rate of interest than the as yielding. But she contended that from that date, when she d payment under the settlement, she was entitled to five per o the date of payment.

l for Mr John Inglis junior, as a residuary legatee;—In allowing pon legacies the Court was always guided as to the rate by the nces of the case. There was no inflexible rule. In the pre- the trustees could not be held to have done wrong in not paying th June 1887. The blot in the argument of the reclaimer was ssumed that the trustees were guilty of the delay which had It was Mrs Breen who had prevented the earlier distribution tate, and she could not therefore claim a higher rate of interest been earned.[1]

ising,—

KINNEAR.—The first question in this case is, whether Mrs Breen is a certain amount of interest which she claims upon a legacy. By 's will she was to receive a legacy of £20,000, and she now claims entitled to have that legacy paid to her, with interest at five per cent 0th of April 1884. The Lord Ordinary has found that she is entitled terest as may have been received by the trustees between the 10th of 4 and the 15th of June 1887, and to five per cent from that last date There is no objection to his Lordship's finding, in so far as it gives nt five per cent from 15th June 1887, but she says that she ought to est at the same rate during the period between 1884 and 1887. In hat point is concerned, I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary, for that his Lordship has assigned. The delay of payment between these was occasioned entirely by Mrs Breen's own delay in making up her whether she should claim or whether she should insist upon one or wo alternative claims, and I can see no principle in law, as there is no ground in equity, to entitle her to insist upon a larger amount of han was actually earned by her money in the hands of the trustees e period when they were compelled to retain it in consequence of her on upon that question.

ADAM concurred.

M'LAREN.—I entirely concur in the opinion delivered by Lord Kinnear. sh to add a word upon the subject of the rate of interest. I do not question could have arisen with regard to interest but for a decision a misunderstanding of the meaning of a decision—in the House of the case of Sharpe's Trustees, where in the circumstances of that case ent was held to be due to the general legatees as distinguished from were participant in the residue.

---

pe's Trustees v. Kirkpatrick, Dec. 20, 1877, 5 R. 380, affd. 6 R. (H. L.) Trustees v. Society of Scripture Readers, Feb. 19, 1862, 24 D. 552, Jur. 250; Bell's Principles, sec. 1885; M'Innes v. M'Allister, June 29, . 362.

No. 104.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Inglis' Trustees. v. Breen.

Now, the judgment in that case was delivered by Lord Cairns, and on th matter of interest his Lordship merely said that it was conceded at the bar th the rate payable to legatees in Scotland was five per cent, and his Lordsh adds that the rule in that respect differs from the rule in England. If Lo Cairns had expressed any opinion upon that subject I should have hesitat even to entertain, much less to express, a doubt regarding the conclusion whi had been arrived at by a Judge so eminent as Lord Cairns, but I do not unde stand that his Lordship had applied his mind at all to this question, nor wou we expect that an English Chancellor, however successful in his dealing wi the principles of our law, should have that minute acquaintance with the rul of practice which is only to be found amongst those who are engaged in t practice of the profession at home. And it is also to be observed that th opinion was given upon the concession of members of the English bar—t doubt highly qualified to assist the House in argument, but who on this poi had not contributed anything in the shape of argument, but merely had made concession, probably upon the instructions which they may have received fro the parties interested.

The Lord Ordinary, in coming to consider the question of interest here, ha I think, taken a very just distinction between the rate of interest payable b trustees or representatives who are in mora,—who are withholding from legatee a fund which they have the means to pay, and which it is their du to pay,—and the right which arises to every beneficiary in a settlement to recei such share of the produce of the estate as the trustees have been able to obta by investment; and I understand that all your Lordships are agreed in suppor ing that distinction.

I cannot help adding that to give any wider extension of the rule, or th supposed rule, that interest is payable at five per cent on legacies, might i many cases operate with great hardship, because it may very well happen tha on the death of a testator his means turned out to be much smaller than h supposed, and that the addition of five per cent on legacies would of cour still further reduce the share going to the residuary legatees. That will especially be the case where the testator had been engaged in commerce, i might be abroad, where his affairs could not be wound up and his mone realised for a considerable period after his death. I must say that the rule—t which Lord Cairns referred as the rule of the Court of Chancery—was what had always supposed to be the rule of the law of Scotland, and I do not unde stand that any absolute opinion contrary to that rule has yet been expresse by higher authority. But no doubt, if this case goes further, the question wi be fully considered, and I should not wish it to be thought that in my vie there is any general rule in the law of Scotland that interest is payable at fiv per cent on legacies where the trustees are not in mora, and where they hav not in their own hands the funds to pay at an early period.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Kinnear, and also in th observations Lord M'Laren has made upon the dictum of Lord Cairns in th case of Sharpe's Trustees.

THE COURT adhered.

MACONOCHIE & HARE, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

XANDER WALKINSHAW AND OTHERS (M'Donald's Trustees), Applicants.—W. C. Smith.
ELSIE STEWART, Respondent.—Rhind.

No. 105.
Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Donald's Trustees v. Stewart.

-Mandatary.—Circumstances in which a defender, appellant, who broad, was not required to sist a mandatary in hoc statu.

TEWART, a farm servant, obtained decree of filiation and aliment d, against a farmer named M'Donald. On her proceeding to r decree by poinding, trustees for creditors acting under a deed by M'Donald obtained interdict in the Sheriff Court against so.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Banff. C.

pealed, and the case was sent to the Summar Roll on 30th 891. The respondents in the appeal then presented a note to President craving the Court to ordain the appellant to sist a r.

stated at the bar in support of the application that the respon- left this country on 12th December for America, and had no of returning, and that she had no residence or property in this The applicants founded on Taylor v. Kerr.[1] stated for the respondent that she had left this country on the uest of a sister, who was lying ill in America, and that she urn so soon as the sister could spare her.

RESIDENT.—I am for refusing this motion in hoc statu. We know about the matter. What we shall eventually do depends a good deal his woman does in the way of returning, or what we hear of her .

DAM.—If this motion is renewed, and no further information is given, repared to say what the result will be.

'LAREN.—If this woman has merely gone to America to nurse a sister it is probable that she will be home again before the case comes on, herefore premature to sist a mandatary now. I think it will be proper ther information before the case comes out for hearing.

INNEAR.—I agree that this motion should be refused, but I also agree l be the duty of the woman's representatives to make a more specific than they have been able to make to-day if the motion is renewed.

MOTION refused in hoc statu.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

DAVID PEDDIE, First Party.—Kennedy.
WILLIAMINA GIBB OR PEDDIE, Second Party.—Kennedy.
LIAMINA GIBB OR PEDDIE AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Peddie's Trustees), Third Parties.—John Wilson.

No. 106.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Peddie v. Peddie's Trustees.

ge-contract—Postnuptial contract—Revocation.—A husband and wife few weeks after their marriage executed a postnuptial marriage- n which the husband conveyed to the trustees under the contract estate which should belong to him at his death, directing them g to the wife, if she survived, £50 for mournings and his furniture,

[1] Dec. 1, 1829, 8 S. 151, 2 Scot. Jur. 52.

No. 106.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Peddie v. Peddie's Trustees.

to hold the residue for her in liferent (but with power, if they should consid the income insufficient, to pay to her the whole or part of the capital), and t the children of the marriage in fee. In the event of the dissolution of the m riage by his predecease without issue the trustees were to convey the resid absolutely to the wife.

The wife on her part conveyed to the trustees the estate then belonging her, being an interest in her deceased father's estate, and all estate which m come to belong to her during the subsistence of the marriage. The purpo were that the trustees should hold the estate for behoof of herself in lifer and for her children in fee. She reserved, however, full power at any time dispose of the whole or any part of the trust-funds by any mortis c deed.

The trustees under the deed received payment of the funds belonging to t wife at the date of the marriage. Within six months after the marriage t husband and wife became desirous to revoke the postnuptial contract, and call upon the trustees to reconvey the trust-estate in their hands to the wife.

Held (1) that the husband's conveyance being a reasonable provision for t wife and children could not be revoked by him or surrendered by his wife; (2 that the wife's conveyance being part of a contract whereby reasonable pro sions were made for behoof of herself and the children, if any, she was n entitled to revoke it.

2D DIVISION. I.

DAVID PEDDIE, a commercial traveller, Dundee, and Williamina Gibb Peddie were married in December 1889. On 4th and 5th Febru 1890 they entered into a postnuptial contract of marriage. By th contract the husband conveyed to trustees the whole heritable and mov able estate which should belong to him at the time of his decease, for th following purposes, inter alia;—(2) That the trustees should pay to th wife, if the survivor, £50 for mournings; (3) should convey to her abso utely all his household furniture and plenishing; and (4) should hold th residue of his estates and pay over the whole free income to the wi from and after his death, with the fullest discretionary powers to t trustees should they consider the annual income insufficient for her mai tenance, to encroach upon the capital and pay the whole or any pa thereof to her, but declaring that she should be bound to educate an maintain the children of the marriage out of the income. In the fir place the trustees were directed to hold the residue after the wife death till the youngest child should attain majority, and on that event t divide it equally among the children. In the event of the dissolution o the marriage by the husband's death without issue, the trustees were t convey the residue absolutely to the wife.

On the other part the wife conveyed to the trustees her whole interes under the settlement of her deceased father, George Gibb, and the whol estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging or which should belong t her during the marriage.

The purposes of her conveyance were that the trustees should pay t her, exclusive of the jus mariti, the income of the trust-funds,—"(2) An in the event of a dissolution of the said marriage by the death of the sai David Peddie, and of there being a child or children, or the issue of a child or children of the marriage, as after mentioned, that the sai trustees shall account for and pay over to the said Williamina Gardine Gibb, during the remaining days of her life, the free interest or annua proceeds aforesaid; but if there be no such child or children or issue, the the said trustees or their foresaids shall, immediately after the death o the said David Peddie, account for and pay over the whole capital or principal of the said trust-funds to the said Williamina Gardiner Gibb her heirs, executors, or assignees: (3) And in the event of the dissolu tion of the said marriage by the death of the said Williamina Gardiner

No. 106.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Peddie v. Peddie's Trustees.

ng issue, the said trustees shall pay to the said David Peddie the days of his life, under restriction as after mentioned, the st or annual proceeds of the whole property and estate hereby . . . Further, declaring that in the event of there being he said marriage who shall attain majority, such child or hall, unless otherwise directed by any mortis causa deed which anted by the said Williamina Gardiner Gibb, be entitled to be alf of his or her share of the capital funds, according to the hereof to be made by the trustees, and which they are hereby d to make in such an event; and the liferent interest of the d Peddie shall be restricted accordingly to the funds which ill intact in the hands of the trustees: Declaring always, as it pecially provided and declared, that the foresaid provisions in he said children of the said marriage shall be divisible among en thereof in such shares or portions as shall be appointed by or mortis causa deed under the hand of the said Williamina Gibb, and in case of her death without making such division, avid Peddie, if he shall survive her, shall have the same power emains unmarried, and until the child or any of the children of arriage shall attain majority; and failing of any such division rovisions shall belong to and be divided among the said children . . . (4) and in the event of the dissolution of the said mar- he death of the said Williamina Gardiner Gibb without leaving estate hereby conveyed shall be divided into two equal halves, f which shall be subject to the directions by any mortis causa h the said Williamina Gardiner Gibb shall grant, and the other id trustees shall pay to the said David Peddie absolutely, at rm of Whitsunday or Martinmas after her death." She reserved full power to herself at any time alone to dispose of the whole he trust funds and estate hereby conveyed by her by any mortis she may execute."

stees under the contract received and invested a sum of £1317, eing Mrs Peddie's share of her father's estate. They had no e in their hands.

1890, a special case was presented to the Court by the husband), the wife (second party), and the trustees under the post- ntract (third parties), for decision of a question which had arisen her the spouses could revoke the postnuptial contract. The second parties maintained that it was revocable and had been y them, and that the third parties were bound to convey the e in their hands to the second party.

stees maintained that the contract was not revocable, and that not bound to denude and reconvey.

questions were stated for the opinion of the Court:—"(1) the said first and second parties can validly revoke the said th and 5th February 1890? (2) Whether the third parties l or in safety, on a deed of revocation as aforesaid being uted, to reconvey the trust-estate absolutely to the second for the first and second parties;—The provisions of the contract, for children, were only testamentary. The deed could not be as irrevocable, for, if so, the husband would be deprived of ny of his means on the children of a second marriage. Quoad the result of the contract was a voluntary interdiction. There was g person for whose benefit the trustees were to hold the fee of estate and none might ever exist. She was therefore not denuded of it.[1] Such cases as Torry Anderson and Menzies were therefo not in point.[2]

No. 106. Feb. 6, 1891. Peddie v. Peddie's Trustees.

Argued for the third parties;—The husband's conveyance was not revo able. It was not more than a reasonable provision for the wife a children, and the wife could not surrender that provision which was ma for her protection.[3] As to the wife's provisions, it did not matter, t question not being with creditors, that the conveyance was postnupti It was still an onerous contract of a reasonable nature and to secure t truster herself and her children. The wife did not remain unlimit fiar. The children, if any, had an interest, and the wife only reserved right of testing.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether the spouses can w joint consent revoke a postnuptial marriage-contract into which they entered February 1890. But it presents itself in two aspects—first as it relates to t husband, and second as it relates to the wife.

By this marriage-contract the husband conveyed to trustees the whole est which should belong to him at his death. The purposes of the trust were th the trustees should pay £50 to the wife for mournings; that they should hand over to her the furniture and plenishing of the truster; that they should hold th residue for her in liferent, but with a discretionary power, should they consid the annual income insufficient for her maintenance, of paying to her the whol or any part of the capital; and lastly, that they should hold the residue for t children of the marriage.

It is plain that by this trust the husband was making a provision for his wi and for the children of the marriage. It is not said that the provisions are n fair and reasonable provisions, nor is there any ground for thinking that they not possess that character. In these circumstances, the case of Low, 5 R. 1 seems to me to be directly in point. There it was held that a trust created b a husband with the view of making a suitable provision for his wife and childr could not be revoked by the joint consent of the spouses, even though the d did not take the form of a postnuptial marriage-contract, and although th had been no children born of the marriage. The Court held that the wife must protected against herself; that she could not surrender provisions made by h husband in her favour; and that the trust must continue to subsist in ord secure for such children as might be born the benefits thereby conferred them. I think we must follow the rule of this case, and hold that the husba cannot revoke the trust which he has created, even with the consent of h wife.

By the same marriage-contract, the wife conveyed to trustees her interest und her father's trust-settlement. The purposes are that the trustees shall hold th trust-estate for the liferent of the truster, and for her children in fee, but un the reservation and declaration that she shall have the full power of disposa of the trust-estate by any mortis causa deed which she may execute. It is clea that a full fee is not reserved to the truster, and that the children of the marri age will take the fee if she does not exercise the reserved power.

[1] Melville v. Melville's Trustees, July 15, 1879, 6 R. 1286.

[2] Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073, 9 Scot. Jur. 509; Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 R. 507.

[3] Low v. Low's Trustees, Nov. 20, 1877, 5 R. 185.

No. 106.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Peddie v. Peddie's Trustees.

had been children alive at the date of the trust, it is, I think, plain st could not have been revoked. The difficulty arises from the fact date there were no persons in existence for whose benefit the trustees the eventual fee, and it is possible that no such persons may ever re is room therefore for the plea that the truster has not been denuded e, inasmuch as the fee was not devolved even conditionally on any n.

est case to the present is that of Murison, 16 D. 529, where it was trust by which a lady conveyed her whole estate for the issue of a d marriage, into which she afterwards entered, might be revoked by Lord Ordinary decided the case on the ground that there were no , and therefore that the truster was not denuded of her estate. s view was adopted by the Court is not certain. It would seem f the Judges were of opinion that it was not a deliberate deed, and evocable on that ground.

however, here dealing with a deed of a different class—not with a ed—but with a marriage-contract. If it had been antenuptial, there doubt that it could not have been revoked. But though postnuptial, less a contract intended to subserve the interests of the spouses and of an existing marriage. In a question with creditors a postnuptial ntract may not have the same power as an antenuptial marriage-contract. miliam I think that it has. This, as I think, was the opinion of ale and Lord Gifford in the case of Low. Marriage-contracts, whether or postnuptial, are entered into for the same purposes and ends, and ink, have the same legal effect, when the interest of third parties ved.

act with which we are dealing was entered into on the part of the e purpose of securing her own estate to herself and her children. ons of it are natural and reasonable. It was thereby intended to wife against herself, and to ensure that her estate, if she so willed it, end to her children. If she had remained absolute fiar of her estate, ght have fallen under the rule of Ramsay, 10 R. 120, on the ground annot be controlled in the use or possession of what is absolutely her it has been seen that in this case the wife has not a fee, but only a wer of testamentary disposition. She cannot, I am inclined to think, rriage-contract into which she entered for her own protection. But could, she cannot withdraw the benefit which she thereby conferred lren of the marriage if any should be born. It is true that none are at xistence. But however important this consideration may be as applic- ilateral deed, I think, for the reasons which I have already assigned, material in the case of a contract of marriage, even though postnuptial. olding, I am only following the authority of the case of Low.

Justice-Clerk and Lord Young concurred.

interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the first and second ties cannot revoke the deed of 4th and 5th July 1890: Therefore answer the first question in the negative; find it unnecessary answer the second question."

Macpherson & Mackay, W.S., Agents.

No. 107.

Feb. 6, 1891.

Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller.

ADAM DAVIDSON SMITH (Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation), Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Asher—Lorimer.

THOMAS L. M. MILLER, Defender (Respondent).—Murray—A. S. D. Thomson.

Company—Winding-up—Expenses of endeavour to form new company—Liquidator—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 161.—By special resolutions of 10th June 1889 a limited company resolved to wind up voluntarily, and appointed a liquidator, with full powers under section 161 of the Companies Act 1862,* to accept shares or other like interests in any other joint stock company in payment or part payment for the company's assets, and appointed a committee to confer with him as to a proposed reconstruction or amalgamation scheme. The liquidator incurred considerable outlay in endeavouring to form a new company to take over the company's business. These endeavours proved unsuccessful. The funds of the company proved insufficient to pay all its debts, and on 15th March 1890 a creditor obtained an order placing the liquidation under the supervision of the Court, removing the liquidator, and appointing another in his place. The sanction of the Court to the resolution of 10th June was not applied for.

Held that the liquidator who had been removed was not entitled in accounting for his intromissions to credit for his outlay in endeavouring to form a new company.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that the outlay could not have been allowed even if it had fallen within the section, because the liquidation had been placed under supervision in less than a year after the resolution, and the sanction of the Court had not been obtained to the resolution.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. I.

ADAM DAVIDSON SMITH, C.A., liquidator in a voluntary liquidation under supervision of the Court of the Scottish Assurance Corporation Limited, raised an action against Thomas Leander Moyaart Miller, who had been voluntary liquidator of that company prior to the supervision order, for an accounting for his intromissions with the funds of the company.

The action was raised in the following circumstances. On 10th June 1889 the Scottish Assurance Corporation resolved to wind up voluntarily, and the defender, who had for a short time been manager, was appointed liquidator. He continued liquidator until 15th March 1890, when

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 161, enacts—"Where any company is proposed to be, or is in course of being, wound up altogether voluntarily, and the whole or a portion of its business or property is proposed to be transferred or sold to another company, the liquidators of the first-mentioned company may, with the sanction of the special resolution of the company by whom they were appointed, conferring either a general authority on the liquidators or an authority in respect of any particular arrangement, receive in compensation or part compensation for such transfer or sale, shares, policies, or other like interests in such other company, for the purpose of distribution amongst the members of the company being wound up, or may enter into any other arrangement whereby the members of the company being wound up may in lieu of receiving cash, shares, policies, or other like interests, or in addition thereto, participate in the profits of or receive any other benefit from the purchasing company, and any sale made or arrangement entered into by the liquidators in pursuance of this section shall be binding on the members of the company being wound up. . . . No special resolution shall be deemed invalid for the purposes of this section by reason that it is passed antecedently to or concurrently with any resolution for winding up the company or for appointing liquidators; but if an order be made within a year for winding up the company by or subject to the supervision of the Court, such resolution shall not be of any validity unless it is sanctioned by the Court."

No. 107.

Feb. 6, 1891.

Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller.

a petition by a creditor, pronounced an order continuing the liquidation under supervision of the Court, removing the de- om being voluntary liquidator, and appointing the pursuer volun- idator in his place.

efender on being called upon to account by the pursuer furnished inary statement" of his accounts as liquidator from 10th June 15th March 1890. The pursuer objected thereto. It was ulti- dmitted by minute that the question between the parties related cular item of £280, 19s. 7d. With regard to this sum it appeared minutes of the company that on 10th June 1889, when voluntary on was resolved upon, the defender was appointed voluntary r, with full powers under section 161 of the Companies Act, o accept shares or other like interests in any other joint stock , in payment or part payment of the business assets or property rporation, and that the remuneration of said liquidator for his e fixed at the rate per annum of his present salary, in addition t-of-pocket expenses." It was also resolved that if possible a f reconstruction or amalgamation should be carried through, and tee was appointed to confer with the liquidator in carrying out heme.

fender, with a view to carrying out the scheme, went to London, endeavoured to form a new company, to which the current f the company should be transferred. A meeting of the com- liquidation was held upon 16th September 1889, when the de- ought before the shareholders the question of guaranteeing some f the preliminary expenses to be incurred in floating the new The shareholders were unwilling to do this as a body, but some lers subscribed for the purpose. The defender requested the o empower him to return to London to resume his efforts to get company started. No further minute was passed, but the minute ng bore that it was the opinion of the meeting that the powers onferred covered this object. The negotiations for forming a new proved unsuccessful.

m of £280, 19s. 7d. was thus entered in the defender's account:— in London for eight months, with railway fares, connected with ing of new company, liquidator's out-of-pocket expenses, £265, Printing for above scheme, £15, 17s. 6d.

ursuer stated that "an examination of the company's affairs at losed to the defender and others that the liquidation was a credi- idation, and that the defender had no right to incur expenses in another company without the authority or concurrence of the "

rsuer pleaded;—(3) The defender is not entitled to credit for the in London incurred in endeavouring to float a new company, in he same are not legitimate expenses in the liquidation.

efender stated that in going to London and taking the measures ing a new company which were necessary there, he necessarily the expenses charged.

ord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 14th November 1890, repelled the third plea in law, and appointed parties to be heard quoad d granted leave to reclaim.*

INION.— . . . I was asked by the parties to decide the question by this [the pursuer's third] plea, and that on the assumption (1) that utions of 10th June 1889 are not challenged on the ground of infor- ut are to be taken as special resolutions of the corporation such as are

No. 107.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The proceedings for which the defender sought to charge the expense against the company were not required to sanction procedure under the 161st section of the statute; (2) that the creditors of the corporation have not been paid in full; and (3) that the sum in question was wholly expended by the defender in an endeavour to carry out the above resolutions of the company, by floating or constituting a new company in order to make over to it the interests of the old.*

"I rather think that the question thus raised may be decided now, and that the parties may probably be able to avoid the expense of a proof.

"The sum claimed was an outlay made by the defender on behalf of the corporation, and it would, it must be admitted, be a very hard case if he were required to pay it himself.

"The argument of the pursuer was that the sum should be disallowed because section 161 was applicable only to the case of a liquidation where all the creditors had been paid, and not applicable to this case where the creditors had not been paid. The argument, therefore, was that the resolution to proceed under section 161 was ultra vires, and that, therefore, outlay by the liquidator in endeavouring to carry out that invalid resolution could not be allowed. It was pointed out that the section contained provisions to secure the interests of dissentient members, but none in reference to the interests of dissentient creditors.

"I am of opinion that this contention is ill founded. The section is expressed as applicable to all cases of voluntary winding up, and I find no warrant for restricting it to that very limited number of cases where all the debts of the company are paid. The powers in the section have apparently been frequently put into operation in England in liquidations where the debts had not been paid. Several such cases are referred to in Mr Buckley's note on section 161, and mention may be made in particular of the case of the City and County Investment Company, 19th November 1879, 13 Ch. Div. 47, where the point was, I think, decided, and where it was said that the remedy of a dissentient creditor was to take advantage of the provision in the last clause of the section, and by obtaining an order for winding up by the Court or a supervision order to make the validity of the resolution dependent on the sanction of the Court.

"The case of the Wreck Recovery Company, 15 Ch. Div. 363, referred to by the pursuer, raised a question under section 95, not section 161, and does not, in my opinion, support the pursuer's contention. I think, therefore, that the resolution in question was not ultra vires, on the ground that the debts of the company were unpaid.

"It was further contended that the 161st section contemplated the transfer of the assets to an existing company, and not a transfer to a company to be brought into existence for the purpose of taking over the assets. No authority for that proposition was quoted, and the section has not been so understood in the English Courts.

"In the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, 1871, 12 Equity, 504, it was decided that the 161st section applied to a liquidation under supervision, and a resolution to transfer to a company to be formed for the purpose of taking the assets was supported.

"In the Irrigation Company of France, 1872, 6 Ch. 176, a resolution authorising a transfer to a French company, to be formed, was regarded as not ultra vires, and, although in that case irregular, capable of confirmation.

"In Bird v. Bird's Patent Deodorising and Utilising Sewage Company, 7th March 1874, 9 Ch. 358, an agreement to sell the assets of the company to an individual on certain special terms was held to be ultra vires, and not sanctioned by the 161st section.

"But in the case of Hester & Company, Limited, 4th August 1875, 44 L

* The parties subsequently admitted these points by joint minute.

No. 107.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller.

within section 161, and even if they were, they had not been sanctioned by the Court. A new company could not be promoted with the creditors' money, where the liquidation was a creditors' liquidation, without their consent. The creditors were said not to have interfered. But they were not bound to do so. They were entitled to suppose that the liquidation was being properly carried through, and were not bound to know that their money was being used to benefit the shareholders of the old company. Apart from that, the attempt had been unsuccessful. The principle upon which such expenses were allowed in any case was that the benefit derived from the formation of the new company could not be taken without taking also the detriment in the shape of the expense of promoting it. That principle did not apply to an abortive attempt. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary shewed only what was not disputed—that the effects of the company in liquidation could be transferred either to a new company or to an already existing company. But they did not give any countenance to the defender's contention. Even if the defender's proceedings could be brought under section 161, they had not been sanctioned by the Court. In the case of the Callao Bis. Company[1] it was held that a resolution under the 161st section was binding on shareholders, but that the rights of creditors were reserved. The liquidation having within a year been put under the supervision of the Court, it was incumbent on the defender to shew that the resolution he appealed to had been sanctioned by the Court. But this had not been done.

Argued for the defender;—The expense claimed was incurred in a legitimate and bona fide endeavour to get the assets and business of the old company taken over by a new one. The creditors must have known that this attempt was being made, and that they would be bound by it if they took steps to prevent it. They would have got the benefit if the attempt had succeeded. The principle of implied mandate was applicable. The English cases shewed that it was quite consistent with section 161 that the company which took over the assets should be one formed for that very purpose. The creditors, if they disapproved of the defender's proceedings, 1757, James, L. J., pointed out that in the case of Bird the sale was to individual, but that in the case of Hester the sale was to an agent for the pany to be formed, and was 'therefore within the terms of the section.' is an opinion of great weight, expressly opposed to the contention of the ner.

---

"I see no reason to question the correctness of the view taken in the English rts of this section, and therefore I think that the resolution in question ld not be regarded as ultra vires, on the ground that it may have contemted the formation of a new company, and that the defender, in endeavouring float a new company, was engaged in an attempt by which, had he sucded in it, the resolution of the company might have been validly carried effect.

"If, then, there be no other reason for disallowing this outlay, I think the on that it was an outlay expended in the endeavour to float a new company ot a sufficient reason for disallowing it. It was an outlay made in a legitite attempt to carry out the resolutions of the company.

"No other reasons were offered in support of the contention of the pursuer. was not suggested that the outlay should be disallowed because the defender's tempt had failed, nor that the resolutions were ultra vires for any other reasons an those which have been mentioned.

"I think, therefore, that the pursuer's third plea in law has not been supported, and is bad in law. I therefore repel it, and will hear the parties further, they wish it, on the effect of that judgment."

[1] In re Callao Bis. Co., 1889, L. R., 42 Ch. Div. 169.

No. 107.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller.

should have earlier applied for a supervision order.[1] It was unfair to wait to see whether the defender's efforts in the interest of all should succeed. It was said that the resolution that the defender should endeavour to form a new company required the sanction of the Court. But that could be obtained even now that the question had been raised. It was an established doctrine that the Court would sanction an act done, though without authority, if, had such authority been applied for before the act was done, the authority would have been given.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Scottish Assurance Corporation, which was incorporated in 1888, seems not long thereafter to have got into financial difficulties. The defender, Mr Miller, was appointed voluntary liquidator. After the liquidation had proceeded to some extent an application was made for Mr Miller's removal, and eventually he was removed and another liquidator was appointed.

The question which is now before us is raised in an action by the new liquidator, Mr Smith, against Mr Miller for the purpose of having an accounting with him and obtaining decree for payment of the balance, if any, arising on his accounts. The point we have to decide is whether the expenses which Mr Miller incurred in endeavouring, in London, to form a new company to take over the business and the assets of the Scottish Assurance Corporation form a charge for which he is entitled to take credit in his accounting with Mr Smith. Both parties are agreed that that point falls to be determined according to the sound construction of the Companies Act, 1862, and that the only section which bears upon it is the 161st section.

It is important therefore to consider the exact terms of that section. It provides—(His Lordship here quoted the section, quoted supra, p. 496, note). It is plain from that clause that power is given to shareholders to carry out negotiations for the sale of assets of a company in liquidation and for the transference of its business to a new company. As to that, indeed, the parties are not in dispute. I do not think that it is important whether the company to which the property and assets are conveyed is an existing company or one which is then formed for the first time. The Lord Ordinary remarks that the resolution of the shareholders could not be ultra vires merely because it contemplated the formation of a new company, and that the fact that the outlay in question was expended in endeavouring to float a new company is not a reason for disallowing it. Now, while I think it immaterial whether the company which is to take over the assets of the company which is in voluntary liquidation is a new one or not, I think that that in no way settles the question whether the voluntary liquidator is entitled to spend funds in the promotion of and making efforts to form such new company. The cases cited in his Lordship's note are to the effect that it is quite competent to transfer the property and assets to a new company as much as to an existing one, but they do not at all establish or imply that it is legitimate for the liquidator to use the funds of the company in liquidation in endeavouring to form a new company. And I think there is nothing in section 161 to justify such an idea. It gives no hint that the shareholders are entitled to spend the remaining funds of their company—which

[1] In re City and County Investment Co., 1880, L. R., 13 Ch. Div. 475; In re Imperial Land Co. of Marseilles (Vining's case), 1870, L. R., 6 Ch. Ap. 96.

[2] Andrews v. Ewart's Trustees, May 27, 1885, 12 R. 1001, rev. June 29, 1885, 13 R. (H. L.) 69.

No. 107.

Feb. 6, 1891.

Liquidator of Scottish Assurance Corporation v. Miller.

are the funds for meeting the claims of creditors—in getting up a new one to take over their business and assets.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has erred, and that this claim by the defender to charge against the new liquidator, Mr Smith, the expense incurred in endeavouring to form a new company ought to be disallowed. I therefore move your Lordships to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and sustain the pursuer's third plea in law.

LORD YOUNG.—I am sorry to say that I feel constrained to concur in the judgment proposed. I could willingly have come to the same result as the Lord Ordinary. I hope that those whose instructions the defender appears to have followed in good faith, and for the benefit of all concerned, will not suffer him to lose thereby. However that may be, I am constrained to conclude that the expense of an ineffectual attempt to establish a new company is not a legitimate charge in this liquidation. If it had been successful there is provision made for the expense attending it. But there was here only an ineffectual attempt to promote a new company, and I think that those who made it must provide the expense of it, and that it cannot be charged in the liquidation. I concur in thinking that the pursuer's third plea must be sustained.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. I think that there is an additional ground for holding as your Lordships propose to do that these expenses cannot be sustained as a charge in the defender's accounts. I think that if they were chargeable at all it could only be because of the resolution of the shareholders in the course of the voluntary liquidation. But that resolution fell and became of no effect in respect that the company went into liquidation under supervision within twelve months of its date, and that the Court was never asked to sanction or confirm it. We must therefore deal with the case as if without any resolution at all the liquidator in the voluntary liquidation had simply been requested to undertake the work for which he wishes to charge, and to incur the expenses which he incurred in performing it.

It was suggested in the defender's argument that if the incurring of these expenses is a thing which the Court, if asked, would have sanctioned, our sanction, if we now approved, might be held as having been formerly given. But I doubt whether such a principle is applicable to the case, or if by any post facto approval of ours we could validate the charge which the defender seeks to make.

Apart from that I am not prepared to say that the Court, if asked at the proper time, would have given its sanction to the resolution as it stands.

I therefore agree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be recalled, and that the pursuer's third plea in law must be sustained.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustained the pursuer's third plea in law, and gave decree for the sum of £280, 19s. 7d.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—A. B. CARTWRIGHT WOOD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 108.

Feb. 6, 1891. M'Donald v. Mackenzie.

JAMES M'DONALD (Inspector of Dumbarton), Pursuer (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—W. Campbell.

WILLIAM FRASER MACKENZIE (Inspector of Old Kilpatrick), Defender (Appellant).—Cheyne—J. A. Reid.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Proof of irregular marriage incidental to civil action.—In an ordinary civil action it is competent for a Sheriff to decide incidentally, for the purposes of the action, whether two persons, not parties to the action, have been irregularly married.

Poor—Settlement—Deserted wife of person having no settlement in Scotland.—A widow, who had at one time acquired by her marriage a derivative residential settlement in the parish of D. and had not lost it by absence, obtained parochial relief in that parish. In an action of relief raised by D. against K., the parish of her birth, the pursuer averred that the pauper had lost her derivative settlement in D. by an irregular marriage per verba de presenti with an Englishman who had no settlement in Scotland, that she had been deserted by him, and that she was therefore chargeable to K. as her parish of birth. It was proved that she had gone through an irregular marriage per verba de presenti with a person having no settlement in Scotland, and that subsequently she had left him owing to his carrying on improper intercourse with another woman, and further that he denied that he had ever married her. Held (1) that it was competent for the Sheriff to decide, for the purposes of the action, the question as to the constitution of the irregular marriage; (2) that that marriage being proved, the derivative settlement in D. was lost; (3) that the circumstances of the separation and the denial by the husband that the irregular marriage had been constituted were equivalent to desertion by him; and therefore (4) that the pauper, as the deserted wife of a person having no settlement in Scotland was chargeable to K., as the parish of her birth.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirling and Dumbarton. I.

ON 10th September 1889 Elizabeth M'Phedran or Jenkins or White was found destitute in Dumbuck Wood, in the parish of Old Kilpatrick. She was conveyed by the police to Dumbarton Poorhouse, in the parish of Dumbarton, as the nearest place of succour, and was admitted there. She was then, and continued to be, a proper object of parochial relief.

In May 1890 the inspector of Dumbarton raised against the inspector of Old Kilpatrick an action for payment of advances made and relief of all advances to be made on the pauper's behalf.

The grounds of the alleged liability of Old Kilpatrick were (1) that the pauper was born in Old Kilpatrick, and had no other settlement than that of birth; (2) that she had been found destitute in Old Kilpatrick.

The inspector of Old Kilpatrick admitted that the pauper was born in that parish, but alleged that she had a settlement in Dumbarton at the date of chargeability, and, at all events, had not retained her birth settlement in the circumstances of the case.

It was admitted that the pauper was married to the late Joseph Jenkins who was chief-constable of Dumbarton, and that for many years she resided in that parish with him. Jenkins died in December 1885 at Coldingham, Berwickshire, to which he had removed (after resigning his office) in the same year.

The pursuer stated that the pauper contracted at Flemington Toll Berwickshire, on 24th January 1887, an irregular marriage per verba de presenti with William White, a travelling basketmaker, or otherwise that she and White were habit and repute married, and resided as husband and wife at Coldingham and at Chirnside for several months after that date; that White was born in England, had no fixed residence, and had acquired no settlement in Scotland, and "has deserted" the pauper "who was born

No. 108.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Donald v. Mackenzie.

rish of Old Kilpatrick, and her settlement is accordingly in that eing the parish of her birth."

efender admitted that White was born in England. He denied ed marriage between White and the pauper.

ted this preliminary plea, which the Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie)

"The present action being in effect a declarator of marriage is the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court."

e merits he pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The applications for relief by or on behalf of pauper having been first made to pur- was the proper officer to grant relief, and has no special recourse defender apart from establishing the pauper's settlement in 's parish. (2) The pauper having a derivative residential settle- pursuer's parish, the pursuer has no recourse against defender. ursuer's statements of the pauper contracting an irregular mar- h William White, and of habit and repute marriage, and cohabita- g unfounded in fact, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvi- expenses.

was led. It appeared that after the death of Jenkins in 1885 er, his widow, fell into drunken habits. White was at that ng in the neighbourhood, and an illicit intercourse took place him and the pauper about the end of 1886 and the beginning of On 24th January 1887 they went to Berwick in company with a nd sister of White. At Berwick they sent for a man named , who was in the custom of performing irregular marriages on ish side of the Border, and with him and another man the party an inn at Flemington Toll in Berwickshire, where Ferguson d an irregular marriage by reading over part of the marriage rom the Church of England Prayer Book, and White and the accepted each other as husband and wife. The defender's the proof was that there was no serious intention to marry, the proceedings of the 24th January were simply a mock , which a party of drunken people had joined in as a jest. w was supported by the evidence of White, who being called ness for the defender deponed that he was never married, and as well as the rest of the party, was drunk on the occasion in the 24th January White and the pauper lived together for some But within a very short time after 24th January White into the house a cousin of his, a woman named Kennedy, with e continued thereafter to carry on improper intercourse. Most oney which had belonged to the pauper was expended by White. October 1887, apparently in consequence of the continued relations between White and Kennedy, the pauper left White in return to Dumbarton. She left him with his knowledge and Thereafter, and up till the date of the action, he continued to with Kennedy. The pauper lodged in Dumbarton for about two She failed to get employment, and the remainder of her money exhausted, so that she fell into great poverty. Eventually she by the woman with whom she lodged that she must leave, and ortly after that she was, on 10th September 1889, found lying buck Wood, which, though in Old Kilpatrick, is close to the Dumbarton. She had taken poison with the object of killing e was not a party to the action. He was discovered to be living hire with the woman Kennedy, and was called by the defender ness as already stated.

No. 108.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Donald v. Mackenzie.

On 18th October 1890 the Sheriff (Gebbie) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact to the effect before stated):—"Finds that after the death of Jenkins the pauper, about 24th January 1887, entered into an irregular marriage per verba de presenti with William White, a travelling basketmaker, at Flemington Inn, in the county of Berwick, in Scotland; that William White was born in England, and has not, so far as shewn, acquired any settlement in Scotland, and that the pauper and White continued to cohabit as husband and wife down to the end of September or beginning of October 1887, when she left him and returned to Dumbarton, where she resided until she was discovered in Dumbuck Wood—at least it is not proved she had abandoned her residence in Dumbarton prior thereto; and that the pauper was born in Old Kilpatrick, the defender's parish: Finds in law that the pauper falls to be maintained by the parish of her birth: Therefore decerns against the defender as prayed for."

Old Kilpatrick appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) The alleged marriage could not competently be proved. White was no party to the action, and it was an action in a Sheriff Court. It was incompetent for the Sheriff to determine such a question. Assuming the competency of the inquiry, marriage was not proved. The conduct of the parties before and at the time of the alleged ceremony, and the conduct of White ever since, shewed that there was no real intention to marry. If then there was no marriage, the pauper was chargeable to Dumbarton, in which, through her husband Jenkins, she had a derivative settlement. But even if there was a marriage there was no desertion. The conduct of White (apart from the supposed adultery with Kennedy) was not cruel to the pauper. Nor did he leave her. She left him voluntarily. (3) Old Kilpatrick could not be liable as the settlement of birth, if there was no desertion and merely because White had no Scottish settlement. In this view, Dumbarton as the parish which in fact gave relief had no recourse on another parish.[1] The parish which gave relief was entitled under sec. 71 of the Poor-Law Act, 1845,* to recover the sum expended "from any parish . . . . . to which he may be ultimately found to belong, or from his parents or other persons who may be legally bound to maintain him," but it was its duty to discover such parish or such person. If then Dumbarton was right in maintaining that a marriage was proved, it lay on Dumbarton to oblige White to maintain his wife.

Argued for Dumbarton;—(1) The marriage could competently be proved incidentally.[2] Any other rule would be very inconvenient. On the evidence the marriage was proved. (2) The desertion was also proved. It was shewn that White refused to maintain the pauper, because he denied that she was his wife. The pauper could not live with him in consequence of his conduct with another woman. (3) It was not the duty of Dumbarton to oblige White to support his wife. It need only go to the parish of settlement, whose agent it was in giving relief,[3] and fix the liability there, leaving that parish to work out its claim against any individual who might be legally liable. If there was a marriage and the wife was deserted, the wife's birth parish was the parish of settlement.

---

[1] M'Crorie v. Cowan, March 7, 1862, 24 D. 723, 34 Scot. Jur. 365; Murray March 20, 1867, 9 P. L. M. 401.

* 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83.

[2] Wright v. Sharp, Jan. 16, 1880, 7 R. 460.

[3] Wallace v. Turnbull, 10 Macph. 675, 44 Scot. Jur. 373; Austin v. Shenn Oct. 30, 1874, 2 R. 68.

dvising,—

No. 108.

Feb. 6, 1891. M'Donald v. Mackenzie.

YOUNG.—This question relates to the settlement of a pauper—a woman now said to be somewhat imbecile. She was once the wife of a Mr the chief-constable of Dumbartonshire. She lived with him in Dumill 1885 when he retired, and they went to live in Berwickshire. In e year he died. She was, or became, of dissipated habits, and she intimate with a travelling basketmaker named White. After living n for a short time in illicit intercourse, apparently, she is said to have him. Their cohabitation subsequently was very short, and in 1887 arated, he having formed illicit relations with another woman. After arated she went to Dumbarton, where she had spent her former married he was then impecunious, and indeed it appears that White's object in g her, if he did so, was to get his hands upon her money, and that, having it, he did not desire to cohabit with her any more. She returned poverty to Dumbarton. In the autumn of 1889, about two years after rn, she was unable to pay the rent of her lodging, and the landlady to let her remain. She seems to have sought to get employment, but dissipated habits she did not obtain employment, and in the month of er 1889 she was found lying helpless in a plantation near Dumbarton, ies in the adjacent parish of Old Kilpatrick, which parish happens at in which she was born. She had attempted to commit suicide by oison. Those who found her very properly took her to Dumbarton to ed and attended to. As she was destitute, and it was necessary that ld live by alms, the question arose, What is her settlement? Prima d assuming her to be still the widow of the chief-constable of Dumand not to have married again, Dumbarton was her settlement, a ve settlement. Admittedly, if her settlement, it had not been lost nce, for the period of absence from Dumbarton was only from 1885 he parochial authorities of Dumbarton considered that this derivative nt derived through her marriage to the chief-constable had been lost by quent marriage to White, and therefore that another parish must be or to which she was chargeable. Looking for such a parish they ascerhat Old Kilpatrick was her parish of birth, and on that ground this vas raised against Old Kilpatrick. That parish disputes the alleged with White, by which the prima facie derivative settlement in Dums said to be destroyed. That has led to the issue being raised whether s any real marriage with White. On that issue proof has been led, and riff has held that the marriage is established, and therefore that the ve settlement in Dumbarton is destroyed. White, the alleged husband, disappeared, but before the proof it was discovered that he was residing carrying on his trade as a basketmaker. He was examined as a witHe denied the marriage, and says he never married the woman, and that lations were illicit. The parish of Old Kilpatrick maintains that if rton has proved that White was the pauper's husband, it is for Dumthe relieving parish, to proceed against White to force him to maintain ile Dumbarton maintains that it is not the parish of settlement, and if ried White (who has no settlement in Scotland), she must be supported birth parish, because he has deserted her,—that is, in my view, because he is refusing to maintain her, but in any view of desertion, because he has in fact deserted her.

No. 108.
Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Donald v. Mackenzie.

Now, upon the evidence, I am of opinion that the marriage is proved. I cannot find any good reason for differing upon that point from the Sheriff. I have felt some misgiving as to whether the evidence to establish such a marriage ought to have been taken in an action to which White is not a party, and in which therefore the marriage cannot be found proved against him, or for any purpose but that of this individual case. But these scruples have disappeared in consequence of the consideration that for the purposes of this case the evidence may be taken as between those parties alone who are interested in this case. I have illustrated the matter to myself by considering the case of an admission by Old Kilpatrick. If that parish admitted that the pauper was married to White that would be sufficient, and would be conclusive between the parishes although the marriage would not be established against White, and so the parishes having joined issue on the matter, and having led proof as to it, we must decide upon it for the purposes of the case.

I am prepared to affirm that there was a marriage with White, and also that White has no settlement in Scotland and has deserted the pauper. I think that a man who has married a woman, and who then denies that the woman is his wife, and says that the relation between them was one of illicit intercourse, and that he has nothing to do with her maintenance, is in desertion.

I am therefore for affirming the desertion as well as the marriage, and the result is that the parish of Dumbarton is not, and that the parish of Old Kilpatrick is, the parish of settlement.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. The primary question is whether there was a marriage between the pauper and White, and I think the evidence establishes that such a marriage took place.

It is quite true that our finding that such a marriage is established would have no effect in a question with White, who is not a party to this action. The evidence of marriage was led in this case as incidental to the question of the defender's liability, and it was so led in accordance with the practice of this Court. I do not doubt the competency or propriety of leading such evidence for such a purpose, and in questions like the present the balance of convenience is in favour of such a course, rather than in saying that a separate declarator of marriage should be brought against the alleged husband.

I have also come to the conclusion, although with difficulty, that the pauper has been deserted by her husband. Taking the pauper therefore as a deserted wife whose husband has no settlement in Scotland, the liability for her support falls upon the parish of her own birth, as the Sheriff-substitute has found.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Find that the pauper, after the death of her first husband, Joseph Jenkins, was married to William White, a travelling basketmaker, at Flemington Inn Berwickshire, on or about 24th January 1887: Find that the said William White is a native of England, and has no settlement in Scotland: Find that he deserted his wife, and that she, having fallen into destitution, became a proper object of parochial relief and has been maintained by the parish of Dumbarton: Find that the pauper has no settlement in the parish of Dumbarton, but that she has a settlement in the parish of Old Kilpatrick, where she was born: . . . Find in law that the pauper falls to be maintained by the parish of Old Kilpatrick: Therefore decern against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the petition: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 108.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Donald v. Mackenzie.

W. S. HARRIS, L.A.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

MARY M'DADE OR M'COLL AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—J. Wilson.
BLACK & EADIE, Defenders (Respondents).—Ure—Salvesen.

No. 109.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Coll v. Black & Eadie.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), sec. 1.—In an action of damages against a firm of contractors by the representatives of a labourer who had been killed in the course of his employment, the pursuers averred that the deceased had, along with other labourers, and "under instructions and superintendence of one of the defenders' foremen," been engaged in working in or about a large drain, that the said foreman was a person whose orders the deceased was bound to obey, and for whom the defenders were responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880; that the drain was from 7 to 10 feet in depth, and that while the deceased was working at the foot of it, ten feet of the side fell in, and injured him so that he died; that the accident was due to the fault of the defenders or of their foreman in causing the deceased to work in the drain without first sufficiently propping its sides with wood; that the duty of seeing that the sides of the drain were sufficiently propped lay with the defenders or their foreman and not with the deceased or his fellow-workmen, and that the deceased relied, and was entitled to rely, on the defenders or their foreman attending to this duty. The pursuer pleaded the common law and sec. 1, subsecs. 1, 2, and 3 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880.*

Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue,—Lord Young diss. holding (1) that the pursuer had not set forth a relevant case at common law, the foreman being a fellow-workman of the deceased; (2) that there was no relevant case under sec. 1, subsec. 2 of the Act, as it was not stated that the foreman had the superintendence of the work; and (3) that there was no relevant case under subsec. 3, as it was not stated that the deceased was executing any particular order of the foreman when he met with the accident.

---

* The Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), sec. 1, enacts,—"Where after the commencement of this Act personal injury is caused to a workman (1) by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer, or (2) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence entrusted to him † whilst in the exercise of such superintendence, or (3) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed . . . the workman, or in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman and any persons entitled in case of death shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer nor engaged in his work."

† By section 8 the expression "'person who has superintendence entrusted to him' means a person whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour."

No. 109.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Coll v. Black & Eadie.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

I.

MARY M'DADE OR M'COLL AND OTHERS, the widow and children of James M'Coll, labourer, Paisley, raised in the Sheriff Court at Paisley an action against Black & Eadie, contractors there, to recover damages for the death of M'Coll through the alleged fault of the defenders.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 3) "That on 7th October 1890 the deceased, along with a number of other labourers, and under instruction and superintendence of one of the defenders' foremen named Philip Molloy, was engaged working in or about a large drain which was being made for the purpose of taking away the water from the cemetery. The said Philip Molloy was a person whose orders the deceased was bound to obey, and for whom the defenders are responsible under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880." (Cond. 4) "Said drain would be about 60 to 100 yards in length, and would vary from 7 to 10 feet in depth. The breadth of the top of the drain would be about 2 or 3 feet, and of the bottom about 1 foot, there being scarcely room to turn at the bottom." (Cond. 5) "Shortly after three o'clock on the afternoon of said date, while the said James M'Coll was working at the foot of the drain laying 9 inch fire-clay pipes, part of the sides of the drain, extending to about 10 feet in length, suddenly gave way, falling in upon him and almost burying him. . . ." (Cond. 6) " . . . . The part of the drain at which he was working in at the time would be about 10 feet in depth." (Cond. 7) "Drains of the same description should be propped all along the sides with wood, unless where the earth is very firm, and then it may be sufficient to prop the sides every 2 or 3 feet, and it is absolutely necessary that they should be propped all along, or at all events, every 2 or 3 feet, in order to make them safe and secure for anyone to work in." (Cond. 8) "The drain in which the said James M'Coll was working was insufficiently propped, being only done here and there. Notwithstanding that the bit that gave way was about 10 feet in length, yet there was none of it propped, and there was no propping even within a few feet of either side of the bit that gave way. The earth which the sides of the drain were composed of was not very firm, and consequently should have been propped all along the sides, or at all events, spaces of not more than a foot or two should have been left unpropped. Had this been done, the sides of the drain never would have fallen in, and consequently the accident never would have occurred. . . ." (Cond. 12) "The accident, which resulted in the death of the said James M'Coll, was caused through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of their foreman, for whom they are responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in causing the deceased to work in said drain without first sufficiently propping the sides of the drain with wood, so as to make it safe and secure for anyone to work in. To omit doing this was an unskilful and unworkmanlike proceeding, and exhibited gross and culpable negligence on the part of the defenders, or of their foreman, for whom they are responsible as aforesaid."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having suffered loss, injury and damage through the fault and negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, are entitled to reparation therefor. Or otherwise, the death of the said James M'Coll having resulted from injuries sustained by him when in the employment of the defenders as a workman through the fault and negligence of the defenders, or of their foreman, for whom they are responsible, the pursuers are entitled to reparation therefor under section 1, subsections 1, 2, and 3, of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' statements are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) Esto that the drain was not shored up, or not sufficiently shored up, the deceased having

No. 109.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Coll v. Black & Eadie.

wledge thereof, worked in the said drain, the defenders are not the action should be dismissed.

eriff-substitute (Cowan) having allowed a proof, the pursuers or jury trial, and proposed an issue.

for the defenders;—The action was irrelevant. It was not he deceased did not know of the alleged lack of propping, or d asked for further props.[1] The case was in contrast to Pollock[2] where it appeared that the employer had not provided skilled attend to a dangerous piece of work in sloping an embankment.

for the pursuers;—It was not necessary to state on record that ed was unaware of the danger.[3] The deceased had no duty to e drain was propped. It was, as they averred, a large and deep required that persons of skill should see it rightly sloped and A labourer such as the deceased had no such duty. The case was in point. At all events, the pursuers had a relevant case Employers Liability Act, sec. 1. The deceased was under the foreman, whose business it was to see that the work was safe, e foreman was careless in that matter the statute made the responsible.

rgument the pursuers obtained leave to add to the condescen- 12) the following statement, viz.:—"The duty of seeing that f the drain were sufficiently propped lay with the defenders or foreman, and not with the deceased or his fellow-workmen, and sed relied, and was entitled to rely, on the defenders or their an attending to his safety by sufficiently propping the sides of rain."

sing,—

STICE-CLERK.—The circumstances in which this question of relevancy r as set forth in the record, are these: The deceased man M'Coll was th certain others upon a piece of work—digging a drain in a cemetery. was of considerable depth,—seven to ten feet,—and the allegation is doing his work of laying pipes in the bottom of this deep drain the n and buried him. Now, it is also alleged that the drain was of such on that it required to be propped, and that though it was propped to xtent it was not sufficiently propped, and that through the fault of ers or of their foreman.

stion arises in such a case, whether the workmen in such a drain are eld to know what they are about, and should look after themselves. commends itself to common sense, but there is a difficulty in holding scendence irrelevant, seeing that it presents to my mind an exact circumstances in which the Court has held in past years that an issue llowed. These cases refer to drains, embankments, and numerous nat sort giving way and falling in. It has been held in the past that must go to a jury, and I am not prepared to depart from that course ther, when we get to a drain of the depth of the one here, different nay arise from those in the case of a drain two or three feet deep, erious injury could happen, and where there is no likelihood of the rnan v. White & Bee, Jan. 25, 1890, 17 R. 368.

---

1s v. London and St Katherine's Docks Co., 1884, L. R., 13 Q. B. D.
x v. Cassidy, Feb. 26, 1870, 8 Macph. 615, 42 Scot. Jur. 303; cf. King, Oct. 27, 1886, 14 R. 8.
d v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 31, 1885, 23 S. L. R. 68.

No. 109.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Coll v.
Black & Eadie.

sides falling in. When you come to a drain of seven to ten feet you at on come to circumstances where a certain amount of skill is necessary—for exampl skill to determine the proper width at the top, and how such high sides are t be supported. I think the question relating to such matters is one for a jur The pursuer can only make general averments. It will depend upon the speci circumstances appearing at the trial whether the danger is to be regarded as o observable by any ordinary workman as well as by anyone else, and in guardin against which the workman should have relied upon his own skill, or wheth it was such that he was entitled to rely upon the care of the master or his fo man, the question as regards the latter most probably turning upon the appli ability of the Employers Liability Act.

Here the averment is that there was propping, but not at sufficiently sho intervals, and that depends upon the exact circumstances of the case and upo the evidence as to the skill required in the particular case. In this case we a dealing with a set of averments such as have often been made the basis of a issue in the past. I am not for altering the practice, and accordingly I think we should approve of the issue proposed.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of a different opinion. I do not think the case w argued as relevant at common law, nor indeed arguable, for if any proposition in law is well established it is this—that no master is at common law liable t one servant for the fault of another servant, whosoever that other servant may be

It was held in this Court and in the House of Lords in the case of Wilson v. Merry & Cuninghame that a master is not liable to an employee for the fau of another in his employment, even if that other be of a different and very hig class. The general rule is that by the contract of service the servant takes upo himself the risk of the negligence of his fellow-servants, and that the master i only responsible for his own fault. Now, is there any fault imputed here t the master? None whatever. It is said there was fault on the part of the fo man, but it is not said that the master did not appoint a proper foreman, and master is not responsible at common law for his foreman not doing somethi which he ought to have done.

But under the statute a question may arise, and that is the question whi was really argued to us. Now, there are two subdivisions of the first clause the Act of 1880 which may here be referred to—the second and the third The second provides for injury done to workmen "by reason of the negligen of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence entrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence," and the expr sion "person who has superintendence entrusted to him" is defined in the inte pretation clause. Is there any averment in this record to bring the case under th subsection. None whatever. There is no case here of superintendence—n suggestion of there being any person entrusted with such a duty. Therefo the case cannot be held as relevant under that clause. But the third subsec tion deals with injuries sustained "by reason of the negligence of any perso in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at th time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed." Is there any averment here to bring the case within that category? Again I say none whatever. The nearest approach to it—though it stops a long way off—is the third article of the condescendence. There it is stated that the deceased was working under the instruc superintendence of one of the defenders' foremen, and that the said was a person whose orders the deceased was bound to obey. I suppose ractors have got a foreman, and in the sense of the language used here orkmen of such contractors work under a foreman. According to the n of the pursuer, as that contention strikes me, wherever there is a fore- there is liability on the part of the master. That view is extravagant. ot the case provided for by the statute, which contemplates a particular en by a foreman, and injury resulting from a workman's having con- o such particular order. It is not said here that there was any par- der given. It is only said that the deceased was working in a drain had dug down to a certain depth, and that he and all the others in that work were acting under a foreman. No order is said to have en. To whose order did the pursuer conform and in conforming was It would be altogether a misapplication of ingenuity to try to argue, words of the statute before one, the case of workmen working under a in a drain to the safe state of which they should prima facie have them- ended. Even supposing the foreman had directly superintended this —which is not said—I think that the case would not have been relevant e Act unless it had been alleged that a special order was given. I am f opinion that the case is irrelevant at common law—I did not think disputed—and also that it is as irrelevant a case under the statute as could igured. There have been previous cases of embankments coming down commonly, no doubt, upon strangers—but I know of no case which has tained as relevant where it was alleged that the embankment came down the fault of the foreman.

No. 109.

Feb. 6, 1891. M'Coll v. Black & Eadie.

RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think the pursuers should be allowed an issue. I y they have any case at common law, but they may prevail under the Act.

TRAYNER, not having heard the argument, gave no opinion.

E COURT approved the following issue:—"Whether, on or about 7th October 1890, James M'Coll, while working in the employ- ment of the defenders at or near Hawkhead Cemetery, Paisley, was so seriously injured that he died in the Paisley Infirmary on the 30th of October from the effect of the injuries sustained on the before-mentioned date, which injuries were caused through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"

. B. CARTWRIGHT WOOD, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 110.

ND POTTER & COMPANY, Complainers (Respondents).—Murray—Dickson.

E BRAÇO DE PRATA PRINTING COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie—Sir Ludovic Grant.

Feb. 6, 1891. Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

right—Copyright of design—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 6 and 47 Vict. c. 57)—Extraterritorial effect—Infringement.—Held that yright of design, which is protected under the Patents, Designs, and Marks Act, 1883, has no extraterritorial effect, and that the manufacture by British subjects in a foreign country of goods, the design of which cted under the statute, is not an infringement of that copyright.

action for infringement of a copyright of design the complainer alleged goods—to which the design in question had been applied—had been for sale in Portugal and elsewhere abroad, but it was not stated on

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy. C.

record that the design had been applied to the goods in this country, or that the goods had been sold here. Held that there was no relevant averment of infringement, and action dismissed accordingly.

Messrs Edmund Potter & Company, calico printers, Manchester, were proprietors of certain designs, which they had registered under the Patents Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, as applicable to articles in class 13.

As such proprietors they presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Braço de Prata Printing Company, Limited, having its registered office in Glasgow, and also carrying on the business of calico printing and dyeing near Lisbon, and prayed the Court to interdict the respondents from infringing their rights in sixteen such designs, which they enumerated, and further "from applying or causing to be applied the said registered designs, or any of them, or any fraudulent or obvious imitation of them, or any of them, to goods in the foresaid class 13 for the purposes of sale, and from selling, publishing, or exposing for sale any article in the foresaid class to which such designs, or any one or more of them, or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof, shall have been applied, other than goods manufactured by the complainers, and that during the existence of the complainers' copyright of said designs."

They averred;—(Stat. 3) "The complainers have recently ascertained, and they aver, that . . . the respondents have applied, or caused to be applied, to goods in the said class 13, the said registered designs, or fraudulent or colourable imitations thereof, and have manufactured such goods bearing said designs, and have exposed for sale and sold in Lisbon and other markets in Portugal, Brazil, and elsewhere goods in the said class 13, to which the said registered designs, or fraudulent or obvious imitations thereof, have been applied, knowing that the same have been applied without the consent of the complainers. The complainers produce herewith a sheet containing a specimen of each of the said sixteen registered designs and sixteen specimens of the goods which the respondents have printed, or caused to be printed, and sold, in infringement of the complainers' rights as proprietors of these designs. The said goods, bearing the complainers' said designs so wrongfully and illegally applied, have been publicly offered for sale, and sold, and are now being sold by the respondents by themselves directly, and through William Graham junior & Company (who were merchants in Glasgow carrying on business at the same address as the registered office of the respondents) in Portugal, Brazil, and elsewhere; and the respondents have also carried on a considerable trade in this country for the sale and disposal of goods to which the complainers' said designs have been illegally and wrongfully applied as aforesaid. In this way the respondents undersell the complainers, so that there has been an almost total stoppage of orders from the Portuguese market, and from other markets supplied therefrom, for the complainers' goods, printed with their said sixteen registered designs, which, prior to the infringement thereof by the respondents, sold well in Portugal, Brazil, and other markets supplied from Portugal. In so using the said designs both the respondents and Messrs William Graham junior & Company well knew that they were using the complainers' designs and that the same were registered. The respondents, in order to enable them to copy the complainers' goods, ordered, either by themselves or through Messrs William Graham junior & Company, or through Messrs William Graham & Company, the grey cloth required, and had the same manufactured and bleached in this country, and also had the necessary rollers engraved with the complainers' designs in this country, this being also ordered either by the respondents themselves or through one or other of said firms of the Grahams for the respondents, in breach of the complainers' rights in said designs, the said rollers being used by the respondents

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

the purpose of printing the said cloth with the complainers' said spondents admitted that they had printed what were in fact the complainers' designs, although they did not know that they ies, but stated that they had done so only in their works on, and in no place or country subject to the operation of the Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883. They further stated,— ents deny the right of the complainers to seek the present inter-reserve their whole pleas. But as they wish to avoid litigation complainers in a matter of this nature, the respondents hereby, ut prejudice to any of their pleas, undertake that neither they, s William Graham junior & Company will print, or in any way e designs complained of."
nplainers pleaded;—The respondents having infringed the com-registered designs as condescended on, the complainers are interdict as craved, with expenses.
pondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The complainers' averments ant, and insufficient to support the prayer of the note. (2) The t to be dismissed, in view of the undertaking not to print nor ay utilise the designs complained of. (3) In respect that the ns are printed and applied to the goods only in Portugal, and themselves sold only in Portugal, the respondents are entitled or.
te was passed on caution, interim interdict was granted, and a record having been made up, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) proof.
pondents reclaimed, and argued that, in respect of their second w, no proof ought to have been allowed, and the action ought to dismissed.
he case had been argued and taken to avizandum, the Court that they desired to hear argument upon the respondents' first for the respondents;—(1) The Patents, Designs, and Trade-t of 1883 did not extend to acts done in Portugal, and it was d that it so extended. There was a presumption that Acts of h Parliament had only a territorial effect. As regarded patents, ecially provided in the Act (sec. 16) that they should have he United Kingdom and in the Isle of Man, their further opera-g therefore impliedly excluded. This exclusion was intelm the consideration that in foreign countries there would be no ascertaining what the rights of a patentee in this country were.

consideration applied to the case of designs. If the provisions these extended to foreign countries, the result would be that aders in these countries would labour under disabilities as com-h the traders of other nationalities. It was said that but for age of the 3d section of the Copyright of Designs Act, 1842 (5
t. c. 100), restricting the right of the proprietor of designs to the ingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, that statute would have extraterritorial effect, and that these restrictive words were by the later Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 73). But the on was that in the earlier Act of 1842 the piracy which was was "the doing or causing to be done" certain acts. The words to be done or applied" were omitted in the Act of 1883, but serted under the 7th section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-ct, 1888, the reason being that they were appropriate to the gy of a penal enactment. It was clear that there was no intention to deal differently with foreigners and with subjects. The legal wrong and the remedy for it were dealt with in the 58th section of the Act of 1883. A "Court of competent jurisdiction" could only refer to a Court in the United Kingdom. There was nothing in the Act to distinguish the case of a British subject from that of a foreigner, and the inference was that the Legislature intended to put both on the same footing. In regard therefore to anything done outside of British territory which was the case here, there was nothing to indicate that the foreigner and the British subject were to be treated differently. Further, provision was made by the 103d section of the Act of 1883 for giving the Act an extraterritorial effect through an international arrangement for the purpose being made by the Government.[1] (2) But at the same time, in order to entitle to the remedy for an act done elsewhere, the act must be a wrong both in the country where it was done and in the country where the action was brought. There must be a concurrence of illegality both according to the lex fori and according to the lex loci delicti commissi. This design was not protected by the law of Portugal, and it was not alleged that any offence had been committed by the law of Portugal. The cases of M'Larty and Scott[3] which had been cited on the other side really illustrated this doctrine, because there what was complained of was a wrong in both countries,—but there was a difference as to the remedy in the one country and in the other. In the case of Witherington[4] there was nothing in the judgment of the Court against the view now contended for,—because it was admitted here that the application of the designs to the goods had not taken place in this country. No relevant case has been set out on record, and the action ought therefore to be dismissed. (3) Interdict should be refused, as the respondents offered on record not to repeat the acts complained of.

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891. Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

Argued for the complainers;—(1) The rights given to the proprietor of a registered design by the Act of 1883 were expressed in absolute terms and any infringement would be prevented by the Court,—where two of Her Majesty's subjects were concerned. The infringement here was committed in Great Britain. Had it not been for the restrictive provision contained in the 3d section of the Act, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 100, that Act would have been of universal application. The phraseology of the 1st section of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 73, where there was no such limitation, led to that result. Sections 47-61 of the Act of 1883 dealt with the copyright of designs. It was admitted that in regard to patents which were dealt with in a previous portion of that Act, the Act had extraterritorial operation. If it had been intended that the same rule should apply to designs, the Act would have said so, but there was no such provision. The question was made more clear when the provision of the 7th section of the Act of 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. 50), reading into the 58th section of the Act of 1883 the words "or cause to be applied" were taken into consideration. The infringement really took place upon this side of the Channel, although the actual application of the design to the cloth was carried out in Portugal. It was the obvious intention of

[1] See Gillespie's Bar's International Law, 363; Maxwell on Statutes (2d ed.) 168 and 169.

[2] Westlake's Private International Law (3d edn.), 236; Philipps v. Eyre, Oct. 29, 1869, L. R., 4 Q. B. 225; Goodman v. London and North-Western Railway Co., March 6, 1877, 14 S. L. R. 449; The "Halley," 1868, L. R., 2 P. C. App. Ca. 193.

[3] M'Larty v. Steele, Jan. 22, 1881, 8 R. 435; Scott v. Lord Seymour, July 28, 1862, 1 Hurl. and Colt. 219.

[4] H. M. Advocate v. Witherington, June 17, 1881, 8 R. (Just. Ca.) 41.

alteration made by the Act of 1888 to strike at an operation of the nature here alleged, so soon as it was completed in the foreign country. It was sufficient if the complainers were able to shew that the action of the pirating firm in this country was the causa causans of the alleged infringement. It was not the less an offence which was struck at by the Acts in question that it was a crimen continuum, i.e., an offence committed partly here and partly in Portugal.[1] The Lord Ordinary had therefore done rightly in allowing a proof, and the interim interdict ought to be continued.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The complainers, Messrs Edmund Potter & Company, have secured rights in certain designs which they have registered in pursuance of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883, and the object of the present suspension and interdict is to prevent an infringement by the respondents of the rights thus secured to them for five years.

The prayer of the note of suspension and interdict is twofold. In the first place, interdict is sought against the respondents infringing the complainers' rights in certain designs, which are specified and described by their registered numbers; and there is a further prayer to this effect—"to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents, by themselves or others acting for them, without the licence or written consent of the complainers, from applying or causing to be applied the said registered designs or any of them, or any fraudulent or obvious imitation of them or any of them, to goods in the foresaid class 13 for the purposes of sale, and from selling, publishing, or exposing for sale any article in the foresaid class to which such designs, or any one or more of them, or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof, shall have been applied, other than goods manufactured by the complainers, and that during the existence of the complainers' copyright of said designs."

Now, the two parts of the prayer raise quite different questions. The first raises the question, what constitutes an infringement of a copyright of design? and the second raises this further question, whether the rights secured to the complainers under the registration of their designs may be infringed by the production abroad of goods bearing the designs secured by the registration, or any imitation of them. What is it then that constitutes an infringement of a copyright of design? The registration of a design in this country must be to a certain extent of a limited kind. It is impossible to say that a registration under a British Act of Parliament is to have effect all the world over, and that the manufacture of goods in a foreign country, although identical in pattern and design with those that are registered by the complainers, necessarily constitutes an infringement of their rights, because a British statute cannot have such an effect extra territorium. Suppose that in a foreign country such as Brazil, which is one of the countries mentioned here, a commercial firm manufactures goods which are identical in design with those that are registered under the complainers' copyright in design, it could never be said that that was illegal because it would be illegal in this country to do it. No doubt it would be illegal in this country in that way to infringe the rights secured by the law of this country, but it does by no means follow—on the contrary, it is quite obvious that it cannot follow—that the manufacture of goods of the same kind in a foreign country is therefore illegal

[1] H. M. Advocate v. Witherington, June 17, 1881, 8 R. (Just. Ca.) 41; Scott v. Lord Seymour, May 28, 1862, 1 Hurl. and Colt. 219; M'Larty v. Steele, Jan. 22, 1881, 8 R. 435; Mallet v. Howitt, Weekly Notes, 1879, p. 107.

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

—illegal either in that country or here. I say illegal either in the foreign country or here for the purpose of making this distinction. Of course it could not be illegal in the foreign country, because there is no right secured to the registered design in the foreign country, and therefore there can be no illegality in using or copying it. But I mean further to say that the manufacture by British subjects of goods in imitation of the design registered in this country cannot be illegal abroad, for the very plain reason that the infringement of a design of this kind consists in production of goods in this country, where they are protected, and nowhere else. The design is a thing that may be conveyed from the mind of one man to another—from a person in this country to a person abroad—without any illegality, and the person who has received that idea either from the original designer or from anybody else may in a foreign country legally manufacture goods of that description if there is no law in that country to forbid him; and there is no law directed against the person of a British subject for doing anything excepting infringing copyright of design as registered in this country—that is, manufacturing goods in this country in fraudulent imitation of a design which has been secured.

It therefore appears to me that infringement of a copyright of design must consist in the production in this country of goods made according to the design —no doubt either for sale or use in this country or for exportation; but the goods which are under the statute forbidden to be manufactured are goods made in this country and nowhere else; and therefore my conclusion is, that to make this a relevant complaint in either of its branches you must have goods manufactured in this country by the alleged infringer. The point is very well brought out by the third plea in law for the respondents, which is in these terms,—"In respect that the said designs are printed and applied to the goods only in Portugal and the goods themselves sold only in Portugal, the respondents are entitled to absolvitor." That was the foundation of the opening argument of Sir Ludovic Grant, and I confess I have never heard any good answer made to it; and therefore I am disposed to examine this record with a view to its relevancy for the purpose of seeing whether there is any allegation that comes up to this, that the designs were used in this country, or, in other words, that the goods printed in this country and manufactured for the purpose of sale, were in a complete state either to be sold in this country, or to be exported for purposes of sale.

Now, keeping that in view, the important averment of the complainers is in the third article of their statement of facts, and what they say is this,—"The respondents have applied or caused to be applied to goods in the said class 13 the said registered designs, or fraudulent or colourable imitations thereof, and have manufactured such goods bearing said designs, and have exposed for sale and sold in Lisbon, and other markets in Portugal, Brazil, and elsewhere, goods in the said class 13, to which the said registered designs, or fraudulent or colourable imitations thereof, have been applied, knowing that the same have been applied without the consent of the complainers." Now, in so far as that averment is concerned, we have no allegation that the goods were made in this country—that is to say, that goods were made in this country in conformity with the protected design for the purpose of sale here or elsewhere. The article goes on to say,—"The said goods, bearing the complainers' said designs so wrongfully and illegally applied, have been publicly offered for sale and sold, and are now being sold by the respondents by themselves directly, and through William Graham junior & Company in Portugal, Brazil, and elsewhere, and the respondents have also carried

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braco de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

lerable trade in this country for the sale and disposal of goods to which iners' said designs have been illegally and wrongfully applied as afore- w, that is a somewhat ingeniously stated averment, because it leaves l to inference. It leaves one to infer that the goods were made in this d then were sold abroad, but it is not distinctly alleged that they were his country and sold abroad, and that averment the complainers were ake, especially in the face of the answer which is made to this statement, is admitted that Graham & Company have printed what now appear were not then known to have been, copies of the complainers' designs, t their works near Lisbon, and in no place or country subject to the f the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883. In the face swer it was the undoubted duty of the complainers to make their erfectly distinct, and to say whether they meant to allege that the actually made in this country in order to be sold abroad. I do not l the complainers to make that allegation. There has been no proposal he record for that purpose, and it seems pretty clear on the face of the stands that they have no case of that kind. I am therefore of opinion is here no relevant allegation of an infringement by the respondents ght design registered in name of the complainers under the Patents l Trade Marks Act of 1883; and I am for recalling the Lord Ordi- rlocutor and dismissing the action.

DAM.—It appears to me that in order to entitle the complainers to hey are bound to prove that the parties complained against have in- eir just rights or have threatened to infringe their just rights, and in e entitled to such a proof they must aver acts in breach of the com- ghts, either actually done or threatened, and that raises the question r no there is any relevant case set forth on the record. That, again, n this other question, viz., whether or no the Patents, Designs, and ks Act of 1883 has any application beyond the territory of the United and whether it is effectual to prevent, or does prevent, acts of alleged nt committed, not in this country at all, but in foreign countries. t propose to go through this record again, as your Lordship has already ut it is clear that the only allegations of infringement made are applic- s done in Portugal and Brazil alone. As your Lordship has pointed ot said that the application of the design to the cloth was carried out in ry—in other words, that the manufactured article was produced in this There is no averment to that effect in this record, and accordingly it ppears to me that, both as regards the averment of the application of to the goods in class 13, and as regards the sale of the goods to which d designs have been applied, there is no allegation here that that was his country. Therefore the question which arises, as your Lordship is whether or no the acts, which the respondents do not deny they did, he applying the design to the goods in question in Portugal and selling ls in Portugal, are struck at by any of the Patent or Trade-Marks and Acts. Now, I should say that prima facie there can be no doubt of the rinciple that an Act, passed in this kingdom, is only intended to have n within the territory over which the Legislature of this kingdom has on. It is not to be presumed that an Act passed in this country is to prohibit something being done in a foreign country where this kingdom has no jurisdiction. It would require very strong evidence to satisfy my mind that, notwithstanding that principle, this particular Act was meant to apply to acts of British subjects extra territorium, and the question appears to me to be very much whether or no there is anything to take the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883 out of the common case, that an Act passed by the Legislature of this kingdom is intended only to affect acts done in this kingdom. Now, I can find nothing in that Act indicating that there was any such intention on the part of the Legislature. On the contrary, I think everything points the other way. The clauses, which bear upon this more particularly, begin at the 47th section of the Act, which provides for the keeping of a register. Where is the register to be kept? The party who wishes a design registered sends it to the Comptroller of the Patent Office; and where is the Patent Office situated? It is situated in London, and nowhere else. That points, it humbly appears to me, to local action, and nothing else. A person in this kingdom can apply at the register very easily to ascertain whether a particular design is a registered design or not, but how can a British subject in Portugal, in Brazil, or anywhere else acquire that knowledge? That was an illustration that was put with great force by the Dean of Faculty. Suppose a party brings a design to a manufacturer of cloth in Brazil—a British subject—and asks him to manufacture cloth embracing that design. If he had access to the register in this country he could easily satisfy himself whether that design was protected or not,—he would obtain the necessary information under the Act and under the Board of Trade rules, because the Comptroller is bound to give him the necessary information. But how can a British subject abroad acquire that knowledge? He might, in the most innocent way possible, infringe a design, if the Act is to have application to every British subject wherever he is. Then, if the nature of the right which registration gives is looked at, the same indication will, I think, be found. By the 50th section, when a design is registered, the registered proprietor of the design is, subject to the provisions of the Act, have copyright in the design for five years from the date of registration.

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

We are familiar with copyright in books—perhaps more so than in anything else—but I never heard that the copyright which a man has in a book in this country extended beyond this kingdom. I never heard that a British subject who happened to be resident in the United States of America could not publish as many copies as he pleased of the work of a British author. It has no privilege there. It is copyright here, but not in the United States. Now, such right being a right of copyright also indicates to me very clearly that the privilege so given was not meant to extend, and does not extend, beyond the limits of this country—beyond the jurisdiction of the Legislature. Then in regard to the 58th clause, under which more particularly these proceedings were taken, the first part of that clause is evidently directed against the application of a registered design to any article of manufacture, and the second part against the sale of any article to which such design has been applied. But what is the object of these two provisions? It is this, that "any person who acts in contravention of this section shall be liable to forfeit a sum not exceeding £50 to the registered proprietor of the design, who may recover such sum as a simple contract debt by action in any Court of competent jurisdiction." Is that intended to be a direction to a person—a native of this country—that he may go to Portugal and sue in a Portuguese Court for a penalty? I do not say that excludes such a thing, but I can only say that it points very clearly to

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

on—namely, application to a competent Court in this country to penalty for such unlawful proceedings. That also appears to me indicate that this is a local Act, in the sense of being confined to erritory, and not universal as was contended for.

ot know that anything was said which would lead us to put another ion than that upon this Act. It was contended that the Copy-Designs Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 100), sec. 3, specially provided proprietor should have the sole right to apply his design within the Kingdom, shewing, as it was argued, that this particular Act was o the United Kingdom, and that as the provision confirming the n of the Act to the United Kingdom was not repeated in the t of Designs Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 73), it must be held to abolished, and that the right conferred by the latter Act must be rsal application. But, as the Dean of Faculty pointed out, a very ntion to the terms of these Acts shews the reason of the difference hem. The Act 5 and 6 Victoria, c. 100, which enacted that the pro- hould only be privileged provided he applied his design within the Kingdom, left it open to people who wished to pirate the design simply ross to the Continent, have the design manufactured there, and then goods here and sell them. It was to put a stop to that practice, and tice only, that the subsequent Act declared that the application of the hould be prohibited whether done in the United Kingdom or done That is to say, no one was in future to carry the design with him country and pirate it abroad, have the goods manufactured abroad, them here and sell them with impunity. It was to put a stop to that and for no other reason, that the restrictive words of the Act of 1842 ted, and it appears to me very properly deleted, and therefore I think r removal gives us no indication that the Act of 1883 was meant to versal application.

only further to say that it does appear to me that it would be a very le and improper position in which to place British subjects if the pur- gument were sound, because it comes to this, that every person in Brazil, or anywhere over the world, provided he was not a British night manufacture and sell these goods ad libitum, wherever he might ed, but if he has the misfortune to be a British subject he must stand ake no share in the enterprise of producing or selling such goods, and ntirely at a disadvantage as compared with the natives of every foreign It may have been a probable or possible intention on the part of the re to do so, but I certainly am far from thinking it is so; and I am of upon the whole matter that there can be no doubt that the acts set on record, which to my mind are averred to have been done in Portugal il, and not within this kingdom, are not unlawful acts. Accordingly, y view the respondents are not averred to have done anything, or ed to do anything, in breach of the complainers' rights, I think this on ought to be refused.

M'LAREN.—I am of opinion that the exclusive privilege given under e of copyright in designs has no extraterritorial operation except what eceive from the agreement of parties, and in that respect it is a privilege analogous in its extent and operation to the cognate privilege given to patentees of inventions and dealt with in the same statute. If a party should in exchange for some advantage or concession, offer not to make use of the other party's design abroad, and if that offer is accepted, of course the law will enforce it, but beyond that I do not think there is any right given to a proprietor of a registered design to complain of an imitation abroad.

No. 110.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

I have really nothing to add to your Lordship's explanation of the law and the additional observations of Lord Adam, unless to call attention to the 54th section of the statute, which I do not think was referred to in argument although I may be mistaken. It is in these terms,—"If a registered design is used in manufacture in any foreign country, and is not used in this country within six months from its registration in this country, the copyright in the design shall cease." Now, that section seems rather to point to its being lawful to copy a design in a foreign country, because the owner of the design would not be likely to make use of it abroad and at the same time refrain from producing it in this country in the knowledge that he was thereby defeating the copyright given to him by the Act of Parliament. But the provision seems to be that if the owner has not thought his invention so good as to use it for manufacture and sale in this country, and if it has been in public use elsewhere, then the public of this country are to be entitled to compete with the foreign maker. I do not attach much importance to the clause, but it does appear to me in some degree to strengthen the argument derived from the general scope of the statute, and the evident limitation of its effect contained in the clauses your Lordships have referred to.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. The right which the statute confers upon the proprietor of a registered design is a right of copyright, and that is defined by statute to mean "the exclusive right to apply a design" to certain articles of manufacture. It is a very well settled rule of international law, as we administer it in this Court, that an exclusive right of this kind does not extend beyond the territory of the sovereign by whom it is granted. I think that general rule is very clearly recognised in this statute, because there is a provision (sec. 103) under which foreigners may have the benefit of the statute, and under which British subjects may have the benefit of similar provisions abroad in the event of Her Majesty being pleased to make arrangements with the governments of foreign states for mutual protection of inventions, designs, and trade-marks. It is not alleged that any such treaty has been made with Portugal, and therefore I am of opinion with all your Lordships that the right conferred by this statute extends to Portugal. Where there is no right there can of course be no infringement.

No doubt it may be competent for the Legislature to prohibit British subjects from using inventions registered here, even in countries where no exclusive right would be conferred by our Legislature. The reasons in policy why such legislation should be considered improbable were pressed upon us very strongly by the Dean of Faculty, but the material consideration is that there is no such prohibition in this statute, because, as your Lordship has pointed out, the statute does not operate by prohibition in personam but by conferring a right in rem, and where the right does not extend the consequent prohibitions against infringement cannot extend either.

I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that the complainers have no exclusive right to use their designs in Portugal which we can protect by inter-nst either British subjects or anybody else, and therefore that there is nt allegation of infringement.

No. 110.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Potter & Co. v. Braço de Prata Printing Co., Limited.

E COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors, sustained the first and third pleas in law for the respondents, repelled the reasons of suspension, and refused the note.

R, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—Agents.

AM M'QUAKER, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Balfour—Jameson.
OVERNORS OF THE BALLANTRAE EDUCATIONAL TRUST AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Macphail.

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.*
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

—School Bursary—Qualification of candidate—Discretion of School rs—Educational Endowments Commissioners—Scheme.—By a scheme by the Commissioners appointed under the Educational Endowments 2, it was, inter alia, provided that a bursary should be awarded by ive examination "among those who have been pupils in public or state-hools in the parish of B. for at least six months before the date of tion, and whose parents or guardians require aid for giving them higher n. It shall be tenable for such period, not exceeding four years, as the rs may determine, at a university or school for higher or technical, or nal education, to be approved by the Governors."

an examination, held on 25th April 1889, the Governors awarded the to W., and declared that M. was second in the examination.

ather, as his administrator-in-law, brought an action against the Gover- W. to have the award of the bursary to W. reduced and to have it ad- to M., on the ground that W. was disqualified in terms of the above on, in respect (1) that he had left the school on 26th October 1888, and ot been for the six months immediately preceding the examination a the school, and (2) that W.'s father did not require aid in giving his er education.

defenders did not dispute that W. had left the school as stated, but ed that he was not thereby disqualified, in respect that the regulation require that the qualifying six months should have been those imme- before the date of examination. They further maintained that, on uer's reading of the regulation, his son also was disqualified, in respect had been absent from the school from 7th August till 19th November It appeared that this absence was with the sanction of the schoolmaster, his name was retained for the whole period on the school roll. The rs further maintained that W.'s father required aid in giving his son a ducation.

Court (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood, diss. Lord M'Laren) granted s concluded for, holding that M.'s absence from the school was not such squalify him from competing for the bursary, but that W. having left ol was no longer entitled to compete.

ved that the Court would have been slow to interfere with the award of vernors on the ground that the successful pupil's father did not require iving his son higher education.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. C.

irtue of a scheme made by the Commissioners appointed under ucational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, and approved by in Council, date 23d April 1886, a governing body, entitled "The ors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust," was incorporated for, inter he administration of an endowment in the parish of Ballantrae unty of Ayr, so far as applicable to educational purposes, known Caddall Endowment.

section 25 of this scheme it was provided,—"The Governors shall the annual sum of not less than £20, nor more than £25, in estab-

* Decided Feb. 5, 1891.

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

lishing a bursary for university or technical education, which shall be called the Caddall Bursary. This bursary shall be awarded by competitive examination among those who have been pupils in public or state-aided schools in the parish of Ballantrae for at least six months before the date of examination, and whose parents or guardians require aid for giving them higher education. It shall be tenable for such period, not exceeding four years, as the Governors may determine, at a university or school for higher or technical or professional education, to be approved by the Governors. In the event of equality in examination between candidates, a preference shall be given to those resident in the quoad sacra parish of Glenapp."

On 25th April 1889 a competitive examination was held for the purpose of determining who should be the Caddall Bursar for the ensuing four years. As the result of the examination the Governors awarded the bursary to Hugh Wason, and declared John M'Quaker to be the second in the examination.

On 2d December 1889 William M'Quaker, crofter and labourer, Ballantrae, as father and administrator-in-law of his son, the aforesaid John M'Quaker, who was in pupillarity, and for his own right and interest, raised an action against the Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust, and also against Hugh Wason and his father, James Wason, concluding for reduction of the minute of the Governors awarding the Caddall Bursary to Wason, for declarator that the said bursary ought to have been awarded to M'Quaker, and that he was now in right of the same, for interdict against the Governors making payment to Wason, and for decree ordaining them to pay it to M'Quaker.

The pursuer, after narrating the scheme and results of the examination which were admitted, averred;—(Cond. 4) "Under the provisions of the 25th section of the scheme before quoted, the defender the said Hugh Wason was not eligible to compete at the said examination for the said Caddall Bursary. He had not attended any public school within the said parish of Ballantrae during the six months or thereby immediately preceding the date of the said examination. He left the Ballantrae Public School on or about 26th October 1888 and went to Glasgow, where he was enrolled as a pupil at Allan Glen's Technical School there, and any connection which the said Hugh Wason had previously had as a pupil in any school within said parish was thus severed. With reference to the statement in answer, it is explained that John M'Quaker attended Auchenflower Public School in the parish of Ballantrae regularly up to and including the afternoon of 29th May 1888. The pursuer is owner of a small croft, which he works during spare hours, and on the said 29th May 1888 John M'Quaker left school in order that he might aid his father in weeding, harvesting, and gathering potatoes, his assistance being absolutely necessary for the fulfilment of the work and the support of the family, which is a large one. It is quite customary for lads over ten to leave school for this purpose, many taking advantage of article 20 B of the Scotch code, which allows absence, when qualified by one hundred and fifty attendances, of children over ten years of age, and certified by the managers to be beneficially and necessarily employed at work when not at school. The teacher of the said school, Mr James M. L. Davidson, in pursuance of his instructions from the Scotch Education Department made inquiries as to the prolonged absence of the pursuer's son from school, and found that he was helping his father in outdoor work, and he undertook to return to school when outdoor work for the year was for the most part completed. Mr Davidson being accustomed to cases of this kind with boys who have passed the 6th standard retained John

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.

M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

M'Quaker's name as a pupil upon the daily register of school attendances, regularly marking him as absent, on the understanding that he would, as promised, return as aforesaid. The summer holidays extended from 22d June to 7th August, and on 19th November 1888 John M'Quaker returned to school, his name having been retained on the register during his necessary absence, and his copy-book and slate having all along remained in the school. The said John M'Quaker had never ceased to be a pupil in the said school during the summer of 1888, although he was temporarily absent as above set forth; and after a similar temporary absence in the summer of 1889, he again returned to the said school, where he is still a pupil." (Ans. 4) "Admitted that the defender Hugh Wason was enrolled as a pupil at Allan Glen's Technical School on 1st November 1888. Believed and averred that the pursuer's son, the said John M'Quaker, was not a pupil in any public or state-aided school in the parish of Ballantrae for the six months immediately preceding 25th April 1889. Quoad ultra denied, and reference made to the said scheme and Code." (Cond. 5) "The parents of the said Hugh Wason do not require aid in giving him a higher education. They had, as already mentioned, sent him to a technical school in Glasgow. They carry on the only banking business in Ballantrae, and his father the defender, the said James Wason, holds the offices of postmaster, inspector of poor, collector of rates, clerk to the local authority, sanitary inspector, clerk and treasurer to the School Board, and clerk to the said Governors, and he is well able to give higher education to his son." (Ans. 5) "Denied that the parents of the defender the said Hugh Wason do not require aid for giving him higher education." (Cond. 7) "At the date of the said examination the defender the said Hugh Wason was over sixteen years of age, having been born on 4th February 1873, and the said John M'Quaker was nearly twelve and one-half years of age. The parents of the said John M'Quaker are unable to provide means for giving him a higher education than he has received within the schools in the parish, and require aid for giving him higher education. They are extremely poor, and have a family of seven children, five of whom are attending school. In other respects the said John M'Quaker was duly qualified to compete at said examination for said Caddall Bursary." (Ans. 7) "Admitted that the defender the said Hugh Wason was born on 4th February 1873. Quoad ultra not known and not admitted."

The pursuer pleaded;—1. On a sound construction of the 25th section of said scheme, no pupil is eligible to compete for the said Caddall Bursary unless he has been bona fide a pupil in a public or state-aided school in the parish of Ballantrae for the six months immediately before the date of the examination for said bursary. 2. The defender Hugh Wason was not entitled to compete for the said bursary, nor to have the same awarded to him, in respect (1) that he had not been bona fide a pupil in a school in Ballantrae for the six months immediately preceding the date of the examination for said bursary, but on the contrary, had severed his connection with any such school by becoming a pupil of a technical school in Glasgow long previously to the said examination; (2) that his parents did not require aid for giving him a higher education than is given in public schools in the parish of Ballantrae. 3. The award of the said bursary to the said Hugh Wason having been illegal and contrary to the provisions of the said scheme, the pursuer is entitled to reduction as concluded for. 4. The said John M'Quaker having been first of the candidates duly qualified to compete at the examination for the said bursary on 25th April 1889, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and payment as concluded for, with expenses.

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

The defenders pleaded;—1. No title, et separatim, no interest to sue. 2. The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. 3. The pursuer's averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. 4. The defender the said Hugh Wason having been eligible to compete for, and having been duly awarded the said bursary, the defenders should be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the summons.

The parties lodged the minute of admissions quoted below.*

On 21st June 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action as irrelevant, finding the defenders entitled to expenses.†

---

* By this minute the parties "concurred in stating that John M'Quaker had attended Auchenflower Public School, in the parish of Ballantrae, for several years; that from the beginning of the school year on 1st April 1888 he attended up till and including 29th May 1888, and from 19th November 1888 until the date of the examination on 25th April 1889; that the school holidays during the said year extended to six weeks, viz., from 22d June to 7th August; that school attendances are marked twice daily, and that the total number of the said John M'Quaker's attendances for the school year ending 31st March 1889 was 175, and for the year immediately preceding 25th April 1889 was 181; that the said John M'Quaker has also attended the said school from 25th April 1888 to 5th June 1889, and from 22d October 1889 to the present date, and is still attending the same, and that the summer holidays during the said year extended to six weeks as previously. Further, that Hugh Wason had attended the Ballantrae Public School for several years prior to 26th October 1888; that during the year immediately preceding 26th October 1888 his attendances were 383, and that during the school year ending 31st March 1889 his attendances were 190, the whole of these being prior to 26th October 1888, when he left the said school."

† "OPINION.— . . . Taken literally, the words quoted [the 25th section of the scheme] simply mean (1) that the candidate must have been a pupil in a public or state-aided school in the parish of Ballantrae for at least six months, and (2) that the six months' attendance must have been completed before the date of examination. But it is objected that if the clause is thus construed, the bursary would be open to anyone who, perhaps years before the examination had attended a school in the parish for six months. The answer to this is, I think, that the clause must be read and applied reasonably, and that it was not an unreasonable decision on the part of the Governors to allow a boy to compete whose connection with a public school in the parish terminated not quite six months before the examination. They have power by clause 32 to make regulations and bye-laws, in so far as not inconsistent with the scheme, and the question might be fairly tested by considering whether a bye-law would be valid which allowed an interval of six months between the latest date of attendance and the examination.

"The pursuer's construction again involves the reading in of the word 'immediately,' and the contention that, in order to qualify, the attendance must continue till the examination. The difficulty of maintaining this construction is shewn by the boy M'Quaker's own case. He had not attended for at least six months immediately before the date of examination, but only since 19th November 1888, having been absent since 29th May 1888, a period of nearly six months. If the clause, as read by the pursuer, is to be construed strictly, the boy M'Quaker was also ineligible, and on that ground the pursuer has no title to sue, but, says the pursuer, not very consistently, the clause must be construed reasonably as regards the beginning of the six months, and this he proposes to do by eking out the necessary six months by attendance before 29th May 1888.

"Now, while I think the matter calls for regulation, I prefer a construction which does not disqualify a candidate who has left school a few months or weeks before the examination, and which admits of reasonable latitude as to the time

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—On a sound construction of the lause of the scheme, the pursuer's son had all the qualifications g him to compete for the bursary in question, and the defender was disqualified in respect (a) that he had not been a pupil in a or state-aided school in the parish of Ballantrae for the six months iately before the date of the examination, and (b) that his father t a person whose circumstances required aid in order to give his igher education. No objection was stated to M'Quaker's qualifica- on the latter of these grounds of objection to Wason. Nor was he objection that the pursuer had no title to sue based upon the s sustained in former cases,[1] and there could not well be, looking peremptory character of the 25th clause, which left the Governors on but to give the bursary to the best of the candidates who were ualified in terms of the clause, and M'Quaker was admittedly the ndidate if Wason was disqualified. The only objection to the pur- title was that his son had not been for six months a pupil in a rae school, and of course that meant, in the pursuer's view, for the six s immediately preceding the examination. That was the pursuer's

---

s at which the pupil must have finished his six months' attendance. , the pursuer's construction would lead to results quite as unfair and to the spirit of the scheme as any which could result from that put upon se by the defenders, because there would be nothing to prevent a boy nected with Ballantrae coming at any time, and attending only for six immediately before the examination in order to gain the bursary. The states a second objection to the award, viz., that Hugh Wason's father, ender James Wason, does not require aid for giving his son a higher on. . . . It appears to me that the question whether a parent requires the higher education of his son is peculiarly one for the consideration of vernors. It would require a very strong case of injustice to induce the o interfere. Now, nothing that is stated is inconsistent with Hugh s father requiring such aid. Nothing is said as to his liabilities and s, or even as to the amount of his income. The very number of the offices he is said to hold indicates that the remuneration in each must be small. herefore not disposed to allow a proof as to the state of Wason's affairs. ice the case was debated, and indeed since my opinion was written, the case us M'Donald v. The Synod of Argyll was decided by the First Division Court, 17th June 1890. The circumstances of that case were very similar e of the present, and the Inner-House, affirming the judgment of Lord r, held that the pursuer had no title to sue. The defenders in the present ead that the pursuer has no title and no interest to sue; but the only nts stated to me in support of that plea was that the pursuer had no title in respect that on his own shewing his son John M'Quaker had not d school for at least six months before the date of the examination. w it may be that the terms of the deed in the case of M'Donald v. The of Argyll conferred wider powers of selection upon the administrators of st than the scheme in the present case; and that there are stronger grounds case for maintaining that there was something of the nature of a contract effect that the bursary should be given according to priority in the com- n. At the same time, as I read the opinion of Lord Trayner, which was d to, it seems to me that the grounds of judgment in the case of M'Donald le enough to rule the present case.

, however, the point was not argued to me by the defenders, and as I have at the conclusion that the action must be dismissed on other grounds, I ot thought it necessary to postpone giving judgment until the case of ald is fully reported."

msay v. United Colleges, St Andrews, June 28, 1860, 22 D. 1328, 32 Scot. 2, affd. 1861, 23 D. (H. L.) 8; M'Donald v. M'Coll, June 17, 1890, 17 R.

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

reading of the clause against Wason, and he therefore must necessarily apply it to his son's case. No doubt, however, if he succeeded against Wason upon his second ground of objection, it would be open to him to adopt as an alternative Wason's reading of the clause. Now, the examination took place on 25th April 1889, and M'Quaker had de facto attended the school only from 19th November 1888; but from 22d June to 7th August constituted the school holidays, and from 7th August to 19th November M'Quaker, though de facto absent from school, was absent by permission of the schoolmaster, was retained on the school books, was at the date of the examination in actual attendance, and was still so, as he had been for some years prior to 22d June 1889. He was, therefore de jure a pupil during the whole six months in question. The number of his attendances as stated in the minute of admissions was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Committee of Council upon Education.

Wason's case was very different, and if the construction for which the pursuer contended was the sound one, viz., that it was the six months immediately preceding the examination which was the critical period, there could be no doubt that Wason was disqualified. He had finally left the school on 26th October 1888. The pursuer's construction was the sound one—otherwise the words "before the date of examination" were mere surplusage. No doubt this construction involved the interpolation of the word "immediately" into the clause; but that was a simple and very obvious addition. Whereas on the defenders' construction a very much more extensive change would be necessary, if, as the defenders appeared to admit, the case of persons who had left the school for years was to be excluded. It was said that the matter was left to the discretion of the Governors, but the clause did not say so, and it was not easy to see in what the discretion was to consist, for it would be necessary to lay down a rule specifying what length of absence from the school would disqualify, but that was not a matter of discretion, but a rule which presumably would have been inserted in the clause, had it been intended.

Then the pursuer was entitled to a proof of cond. 5. The averments there were sufficient to shew (if proved) that Wason's father was not in a position to require aid; at least they were relevant to warrant a proof.

Argued for the defenders;—The reading which the pursuer sought to put on clause 25 admittedly required the insertion of the word "immediately," but it was contrary to the rules of construction to hold a word as inserted if the words as they stood were capable of a reasonable construction, and the construction which the Lord Ordinary put on the words was one which they could reasonably bear, and was not in itself at all contrary to the spirit of such a bursary as this. No doubt the absence of some such word as "immediately" in form left it open to the Governors to admit to the competition persons who had not been at a Ballantrae school for many years. If they did so, an action would probably lie at the instance of properly qualified candidates. But in all probability the clause was left vague purposely so as to leave something to the discretion of the Governors without tying them down to a hard and fast rule which should oblige them to reject as disqualified boys who had attended the school till within a few days of the competition. Under the scheme the Governors had power to frame bye-laws, and if a rule specifying what period of absence would disqualify was thought to be necessary, a bye-law regulating that matter would not be ultra vires of the Governors. In any case, the pursuer's construction was self-destructive, for his son had not attended the school for the six months immediately preceding the examination. He had been absent for a substantial period, even

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

admitting that the six weeks of holiday was to be taken as a period of constructive attendance. It was said that his name had been retained on the books of the school, but that was the act of the school teacher only, it was not warranted by the Scotch Educational Code. M'Quaker was not a "scholar" in the sense of the code, and neither therefore was he a "pupil" in the sense of clause 25. As regarded the averment that Wason's father did not require aid to give his son higher education, that was a matter preeminently in the discretion of the Governors. The Court would not interfere unless on averments amounting to corruption.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an important and somewhat difficult question undoubtedly, but it appears to me to depend entirely upon the construction of the 25th section of the scheme which has been framed by the Educational Endowments Commissioners for the regulation of this foundation. The Governors, that is to say, the Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust, a body which is incorporated by the scheme, are empowered thereby to apply, or rather they are directed to apply—the words are imperative—"the annual sum of not less than £20, nor more than £25, in establishing a bursary for university or technical education, which shall be called the 'Caddall Bursary.'" The bursary is to be awarded by competitive examination, and here again the words of the scheme are imperative—"The bursary shall be awarded by competitive examination"—so far therefore there can be no dispute as to what the duty of the Governors is. They must apply an annual sum of between £20 and £25 in establishing a bursary, and they must award that by competitive examination. Then comes the definition of those who are eligible candidates for this bursary. The competitive examination is to be "among those who have been pupils in public or state-aided schools in the parish of Ballantrae for at least six months before the date of the examination, and whose parents or guardians require aid for giving them higher education; it shall be tenable for such period, not exceeding four years, as the Governors may determine, at a university or school for higher or technical or professional education, to be approved by the Governors"; and "in the event of equality in examination between candidates a preference shall be given to those resident in the quoad sacra parish of Girvan."

That is the clause to be construed, and the first thing that appears to me to be pretty clear upon the face of the clause is, that this is properly speaking a school bursary. It is not a bursary which is to be held at a particular university, or a particular technical or advanced school, but it is a bursary which is to be held by a pupil at a Ballantrae school. That is made, I think, very clear by the words of the clause, and accordingly the competitors for this bursary are described to be those who have been pupils in Ballantrae schools for at least six months before the date of the examination.

Now, the defender of this action, Wason, at the date of the examination, had ceased to be a pupil of the Ballantrae school. I think that is a matter of fact that cannot be disputed, because he had dissevered himself from that school and all connection with it, and had betaken himself to another school in a different part of the country, for the purpose of proceeding with his education, and therefore in any ordinary sense the term "pupil of Ballantrae school" could not be applied to him. He was a pupil of a school in Glasgow—Allan Glen's Technical School—and the objection to him therefore is, that he does not fall within the description of a pupil within the meaning of section 25 of the scheme.

No. 111. Feb. 6, 1891. M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

On the other hand, the son of the pursuer of the action, M'Quaker, is in this position—He has not attended a Ballantrae school continuously during the whole period of six months preceding the date of the examination, and therefore if that be essential as a qualification for competition he does not possess it. But it rather appears to me that that is not the meaning of the section. The question whether a boy is a pupil of a particular school does not depend upon his actual attendances. He may be a pupil although not in attendance, and I use the word "pupil" as exactly synonymous with the word "scholar" as used in the code. I do not think there is any difference between them. It means a boy who is bound under ordinary circumstances to attendance at the particular school, whose name is on the school roll, and whose absence from school, unless it be satisfactorily accounted for, is a fault for which he may be punished. Now, that is precisely the position of M'Quaker. His name was on the roll of the school during the whole of the period of six months preceding the examination. His absence is accounted for in this way. A part of the period of his absence was a period of vacation, and it is needless therefore to say anything more about that. For the rest of the period of absence he was engaged in useful work, assisting his father, who was a crofter, in out-door labour, and all this with the approval and sanction of the school authorities. Therefore, not only was his name on the school-roll, but his absence was justified by the employment in which he was engaged outside the school. It was therefore a justifiable absence, and being a justifiable absence it appears to me that it could not possibly be an absence that disqualified him from being a pupil or scholar of the school during the time of that absence.

That being so, my opinion is that the pursuer, M'Quaker's son, fully comes up to the requirement in the 25th section of the scheme, that he should have been for at least six months before the date of the examination a pupil in a Ballantrae school. But then Wason, on the other hand, has not been an enrolled pupil or scholar of a Ballantrae school for a considerable period. The length of the period is not very material, because this is not a question of more and less; it is a question whether, during six months immediately preceding the date of the examination, the condition of this 25th section had been complied with. Now, as I have said before, all connection between Wason and this school was put an end to at a period which in that view disqualifies him entirely as a pupil of any Ballantrae school. And therefore if I am right in my construction of the clause—that it means that this shall be treated and dealt with as a school bursary in the proper sense of the term—the pursuer's son has the necessary qualification and Wason has not.

That is the view of the case which I take, and I do not think it necessary to go into any of the other details at all. There are a number of things left to the discretion of the Governors, and with these we do not interfere in any degree and among other things I would hesitate very much to interfere with the discretion of the Governors in determining whether the parent of a competitor was in such a condition of life as to require the aid of this bursary to enable him to send his son to a university or technical school. At all events, that is a matter for consideration by the Governors in the first instance. If they were flagrantly wrong, and conferred the benefit upon a boy whose parent was quite able to send his son to a university at his own cost, probably there

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

e means found to restrain that, but there is no case of that kind orry to say I cannot agree with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, ink the pursuer is entitled to prevail.
.

ADAM.—It appears that on 25th April 1889 the Governors of Ballan-cational Trust held a competitive examination for a bursary of the value o £25 a-year, with the result that they awarded the bursary to Hugh nd placed John M'Quaker second. The present action is raised by 'Quaker's father to have it found that the Governors in so awarding ry to Wason acted wrongly, and ought to have awarded it to his son, ound that Wason was not qualified under the conditions under which ry fell to be awarded, and that his son as second is entitled to have ry awarded to him. If it is proved to our satisfaction that Wason was that M'Quaker was qualified, the defenders do not contest M'Quaker's the bursary, or, in other words, they do not contend that a second ion must be held before the bursary can be awarded, and I think tly abstain from putting forward that contention, as in my opinion if r were the best of the qualified candidates he is entitled to have the warded to him.

rst question is, whether Wason was qualified as a candidate under the connposed by the scheme? The facts which raise this question are these :—It d dispute that Wason ceased to be a pupil of any school in Ballantrae in 1888—that is, in the October preceding the April in which the examinaplace—and that he became a pupil of Allan Glen's Technical School in on 1st November 1888. The question is whether, on a construction of section of the scheme, a person in that position was qualified to com-the bursary? I agree that this question depends entirely on the con-of that section, and I also agree that the bursary is intended to be what d a "school" bursary, to be competed for by persons who are pupils of ic schools in Ballantrae. It is the intention of the scheme and the con-of the scheme, as I read it, that the bursary should be awarded among o are at the time of the examination pupils of one of the public schools ntrae, with this further qualification added, that they must have been such school for the six months before the date of the examination.
the section bear that interpretation it is not necessary to interpolate ds, though no doubt the meaning might be expressed in another way g that the bursary was to be awarded among those "who are and have pils" in the Ballantrae public schools for six months. I also think that uite entitled to look at the possible consequences of reading the section
e. It is to be observed that the governors have no discretion as to g the bursary. If a duly qualified candidate appears they must award defenders say that the only necessary qualification is that a candidate ve been at some time a pupil in a public school at Ballantrae for six —no matter when or how long before the competition—and that if a e so qualified is successful, he is entitled to have the bursary awarded to t is a very startling conclusion to reach, that a person, it may be, who as a ve had been a pupil in one of the Ballantrae public schools for six months be entitled to come back and compete for the bursary against present f these schools. That would be an unlikely condition to attach to any

No. 111.
Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

bursary, and it would require a great deal more distinct language than I can find in the section to make me put that interpretation upon it. If, however, that were to be taken as the proper interpretation of the scheme, I think the observation made by Mr Jameson would be correct, that there would be no use of the phrase six months "before the date of examination." These words would, it appears to me, be in that case mere surplusage, but if the other view is adopted, that a candidate must have been a pupil of a Ballantrae school for the six months immediately preceding the examination, then the presence of these words is explained.

I agree, therefore, that on the construction of section 25 of the scheme the bursary is a proper "school bursary," to be awarded to a boy who has been a pupil of a Ballantrae public school during the six months preceding the date of the examination.

If, then, that is the true construction of the 25th section of the scheme, the result as to Wason's claim to the bursary is quite clear, because it is beyond doubt that he was not a pupil of any school in Ballantrae at the time of the competition. He had six months before withdrawn from the school at Ballantrae, and had become a pupil of a school in Glasgow, and if there had been a similar bursary there he might have competed for it. It is clear in the view I take of the scheme that as he was not a pupil of a Ballantrae school at the date of the examination he was not qualified to compete for the bursary. Even if he had happened to be a pupil of such a school nearer the time of the examination than he actually was, that would not in my opinion make any difference, the conclusive and cardinal fact being that he was not on the rolls of, and was not a pupil of any school in Ballantrae at the date of the examination. I think therefore, that Wason was not entitled to compete for the bursary or to have it awarded to him.

The next question is, whether M'Quaker has a qualification? Now, the facts bearing on this question are these:—The competition, as I have already said, was held on 25th April 1889, and M'Quaker's attendances at the Auchenflower Public School in Ballantrae during the preceding year were as follows:—From the beginning of the school year on 1st April 1888 till 29th May 1888, and from 19th November 1888 until the date of the examination, 25th April 1889. He was accordingly absent from the school between 29th May and 19th November in that year, but six weeks of that period—from 22d June to 7th August—were taken up by the school holidays. It is, however, beyond all doubt that he was a pupil of a Ballantrae public school at the date of the examination, as he was then on the rolls of the Auchenflower School, and had been attending that school during the five months preceding the date of the examination, and the only question which remains is, whether he was or was not a pupil of that school for six months preceding the date of examination. It is contended by the defenders that he was not, because he did not attend the school during the month prior to 19th November 1888, but it is necessary to point out that the question is not one of attendance, but simply whether he was a pupil of the school during the necessary period. As a matter of fact, he was absent during the month in question, but with the permission of the school authorities, and he was on the roll during that period, and was marked as absent because he was regarded as being on the roll and as a pupil of the school. It is not, I think, necessary to go into the question whether the authorities of the school ought or ought not to have treated him as a pupil of the school. In the

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

the country, schoolmasters, with some authority from the code, are in y of allowing lads during the summer leave of absence to assist their s in the field-work, and that is regarded, and apparently quite properly ed, as an ordinary ground of absence, and was so treated in this case, as ster of the school, with the authority of the Governors, treated him as a of the school, and marked him as absent. The question however is not er he was entitled to earn the Government grant, but whether he was a and I think he was. If so, he was qualified as a candidate for the bur- nd it ought to have been awarded to him, and if that is the view of the no difficulty is raised as to his being found entitled to it.

h regard to the question whether Wason satisfies another condition of npetition, namely, that his parents should require assistance in giving him education, I shall only say that that question does not arise for considera- this case. If I had to express an opinion upon it, I should say that that matter almost entirely within the discretion of the Governors. They the locality and the circumstances of each candidate's parents, and they persons to judge whether or not the parents require assistance in educat- eir children. I do not say that we would not interfere if they had ed the bursary corruptly, but there is no such case here, and I should not ined to interfere with the Governors' award on this second ground.

ree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled and for the pursuer pronounced.

D M'LAREN.—We are reviewing the decision of the Lord Ordinary in an brought to have it found that the successful competitor for a bursary is lified and that the second best competitor is to be preferred. The dis- cation is rested on two grounds. It is said that the boy Wason who was ed did not comply with the conditions of the order of the Education vment Commissioners, in respect that he was not a pupil in a public or ided school in the parish of Ballantrae for six months immediately pre- the date of the competition; and then it is said that his parents or ans are not in the position of requiring aid to give him a higher education. e latter question, I entirely agree with the observations which have fallen your Lordship in the chair and from Lord Adam. I think that a condition s kind does not mean that it is absolutely impossible for a parent to give ild that higher education out of his own means—that he cannot, even by ing himself to privation, send his son to a higher school or to a university. ans that in the ordinary acceptation of the language he is a person who es aid for that object, whose circumstances are not such as to make it easy m to send his child to a university or higher school without pecuniary nce. Without professing any accurate local knowledge, I may say, from ing I know of the locality, I should think it would be difficult to find a a village like Ballantrae who was disqualified on the ground that his ts were too well off to need assistance. But, of course, it might happen person with a large income had settled down in a country village, and it not be right that if he were in easy circumstances his son should be allowed npete. That is no doubt a sufficient reason for the insertion of this very le restriction.

ssing from that part of the case I come to the more important matter, which construction of the first condition—"The bursary shall be awarded by

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

competitive examination among those who have been pupils in public or state-aided schools in the parish of Ballantrae for at least six months before the date of the examination." I agree with your Lordship that this points to what is usually known as a school bursary. I think one may gather from the clause as a whole, and from the character of the order, that it was intended to enable boys to pass direct from the parish public school to a school or college of higher instruction. I could not for a moment entertain the view that it would enable a grown-up person at any distance of time to come forward and compete with the proper recipients and objects of this foundation upon the plea that he had in early life attended six months at this public school at Ballantrae. But I arrive at that result entirely by implication—implication from the whole object of the foundation, and especially from the tenor of this particular clause; because, as I read the clause, there is no restriction in words as to the time at which the attendance may have been given. On that subject I would venture, as the Lord Ordinary's opinion was not very fully brought under our notice by the bar, to read a sentence from it which fully expresses my view on this question. His Lordship says,—"Taken literally, the words quoted simply mean (1) that the candidate must have been a pupil in a public or state-aided school in the parish of Ballantrae for at least six months; and (2) that the six months' attendance must have been completed before the date of examination. But it is objected that if the clause is thus construed the bursary would be open to anyone who, perhaps years before the examination, had attended a school in the parish for six months. The answer to this is, I think, that the clause must be read and applied reasonably, and that it was not an unreasonable decision on the part of the Governors to allow a boy to compete whose connection with a public school in the parish terminated not quite six months before the examination." I have nothing to add to this expression of opinion on the question of the reasonable construction, as I should consider it, of this clause, but as to the literal construction of the clause I should like to add a word. I think the expression "those who have been pupils for at least six months before the date of the examination" is not a strictly accurate expression, because if read literally it would mean only those who had attended school before the passing of the order. The words are "who have been," referring to time past. What is really meant is attendance in the future. I am not finding fault with the language; it is good colloquial language; but if it were in an Act of Parliament we should expect it to read "among those who shall have been pupils at least six months before the date of the examination." Now, that is a form of speech which is no doubt equally applicable to a period of six months completed immediately before the examination, or to a period completed at any previous time. But then if the former is to be the meaning, one would expect that the word "immediately," or some equivalent word, would have been inserted, or that the clause might have been put, "among those who are at the time of the examination and have been pupils for the period of at least six months." The Lord Ordinary holds—and I agree with him—that the pursuer's construction involves the reading in of the word "immediately," and the contention that, in order to qualify, the attendance must continue until the examination. Now, there are cases where a Court of construction may justifiably introduce into the clause which is construed some word which is not there, but which is clearly implied, and is necessary either to make the clause sensible or to give effect to what may be reasonably supposed to be its meaning when the whole clause is read consecutively. But it seems to me

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

is at least a conceivable construction that the Commissioners by whom rder was made intended to leave the competition open, not only to boys ad just completed a period of six months' attendance, but also to those ad completed it only a short time before the examination commenced, and ad not done anything that might be considered to be an impediment to passing from the school to the university. I see no particular public tage in limiting the competition to those whose attendance has exactly and ually terminated at the time of the examination, and I see no disadvantage ing in those who had completed their school attendance a few months

And therefore I cannot assume that the insertion of the word "imme-" (if it is to be inserted) is necessary in order to make sense of the clause, rder to give effect to the general intention of the order. I rather under- your Lordship to think that "immediately" was implied, because you he word in giving your view of the sense of the clause. But in my humble n we are not entitled to read the clause in that sense, because there are rds, so far as I can see, that impose any such strict limitation as to time. ave only to add that, for the reasons which I have given, I think that aker also was qualified. I have no doubt of it, although, strictly speaking, d not been in attendance during six months immediately preceding the nation. The difference is that you had to add a period at the beginning Quaker's attendance to complete the six months, while you have to add a at the end to the attendance of the other young man to bring him within ause. Both, I think, are quite legitimate according to my interpretation scheme. I do not think it necessary to proceed at all—indeed, I doubt nuch the relevancy of proceeding upon the rules of the Department of tion, which are not in any way referred to in this enactment. If Wason qualified, I should doubt very much whether M'Quaker would be in any position, but if the view of the majority of your Lordships is taken, this does not call for further consideration. My opinion is that the judgment Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

D KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and with Lord first question to be considered is, whether the pursuer has a good title to nd that depends upon whether his son has or has not a qualification to te for this bursary in terms of the scheme. That of course requires us to ue the scheme, and I agree with the construction which your Lordship and Adam put upon it. The 25th section is certainly not expressed in very e or accurate language, and I do not think it could be made more precise urate by the mere insertion of any additional words. I agree with an ation which was made by Lord M'Laren, that we are not to criticise too ly the grammatical structure of a scheme of this kind, but that we ought ept the language which the Commissioners have used as being in conformity colloquial usages although not in accordance with strict grammatical rule. reading it in conformity with that observation, I should be disposed to also with the observation Lord M'Laren made in the course of the discus- that if this sentence had been expressed grammatically it would have run —"The bursary shall be awarded by competitive examination among those t the date of the examination shall have been pupils in any of the public te-aided schools in the parish of Ballantrae for a period of at least six months." If that is the meaning of the clause, and I think it is, then I think there can be no question at all that the pursuer's son did satisfy the qualification. What is required is, that he shall have been a pupil of the school, and it is proved to us that he began to be a pupil of the school more than a year before the date of the examination, that he was still a pupil of the school at the time that examination took place, but that his continuous attendance during the period immediately preceding the examination had lasted for five months only, his previous attendance having been interrupted by absence, which was sanctioned by the headmaster and the authorities of the school. And therefore it comes to this, that he had been a pupil for a year, that he had been in continuous attendance for five months before the date of the examination, but that he had leave of absence for the part of the period preceding the five months. I am of opinion that a pupil who has leave of absence is still a pupil of the school, and therefore that the pursuer's son has satisfied the qualification required by the scheme. I should agree with the observation made in the course of the discussion, either from the bar or from the bench, that to keep a boy's name upon the roll will not of itself make him a pupil, if it is not done in good faith and in the ordinary course of school administration. But then there is no suggestion that in this case anything that was done was not done in the ordinary course of the administration of the school. It would be altogether out of the question to exclude from the benefit of a bursary of this kind a boy who during a portion of the period of six months required by the scheme had obtained leave of absence from the school for a sufficient cause. If he were absent through illness I suppose nobody would raise a question about his right to be considered a pupil of the school. If he is absent for such a reason as that which was sanctioned in the present case by the master, namely, that his father required his son's help in cultivating his croft, and that the son might be absent without prejudice to his study at school, I should think that such a case was exactly in the same position as a case of illness. But we are not, as it appears to me, to inquire into the reason of absence, and the grounds upon which the master sanctioned it. It is enough that the school authorities sanctioned his absence, and I think, therefore, that he must be held to have remained a pupil of the school. I only desire to add upon that point that it does not appear to me that in order to bring him within the position of a pupil we are to take into account the attendance for a certain period and add the period during which he did attend. All we have to consider is, whether this boy was or was not a pupil. It is conclusive upon that subject that he having attended the school his name was retained upon the roll by the headmaster, and his absence during the period at which he was not at school was with the headmaster's sanction.

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

If the pursuer has a title, the next question is, whether the boy Wason who beat him in the competition had also a qualification? and I am of opinion that he had not, because he was not a pupil of the school. I agree with your Lordship that what is established by this scheme is an ordinary school bursary. It is a bursary to be given by competitive examination among scholars of Ballantrae schools, and not among boys or young men who have already obtained a higher education at a university or a technical school. Now, the boy who has succeeded had left Ballantrae school for months, and before the date of the competition, I think, he had been for some months at a technical school in Glasgow. It is not material during what period of time his attendance at that school has lasted. The material point is, that he had absolutely left the school in Ball

No. 111.

Feb. 6, 1891.
M'Quaker v. Governors of the Ballantrae Educational Trust.

d had gone to a higher technical school. Now, if that were not held ify, it would appear to me that the scheme must be read so as to let s and young men who had at any time of their lives been even for six any Ballantrae public school. That would be altogether inconsistent lesign of the scheme, and we cannot arrive at a construction involving nconsistency—an inconsistency that would be a sufficient reason for he construction. I think the only reasonable construction is in favour suer's view, and of the view your Lordship has expressed.

COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having con-dered the cause, and heard counsel for the parties on the reclaim-g note for the pursuer William M'Quaker against the interlocutor Lord Wellwood, dated 21st June 1890, recall the said interlo-tor: Reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive and claratory conclusions of the summons: Interdict, prohibit, and scharge the defenders the Governors of the Ballantrae Educa-onal Trust from making payment to the defender Hugh Wason the Caddall Bursary, or any instalment thereof: Further, decern d ordain the said Governors to award the said bursary to John 'Quaker, to be held by him for four years, commencing at 1st ovember 1889, and to make payment to him or the pursuer Wil-m M'Quaker, as his administrator-in-law, of the sum of £20, s. annually, the tenure of the said bursary by the said John 'Quaker being subject always to the conditions and provisions the scheme for the management, inter alia, of said bursary proved by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty in Council the day of April 1886, and particularly article 27 of said scheme: nd the pursuer and reclaimer entitled to expenses," &c.

SIMPSON & LAWSON, W.S.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 112.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Edward's Trustees v. Edward.

ILVIE AND OTHERS (Edward's Trustees), Pursuers, Real Raisers, and Claimants.—Baxter.

ES SMITH EDWARD, Claimant (Reclaimer).—Dickson—Aitken.

OUNG AND ANOTHER, Claimants (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour —Salvesen.

ANE EDWARD AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Baxter—Hay—Law.

n—Testament—Accumulations—Uncertainty.—A testator by holo-, after expressly declaring that C., one of his nephews, was "to get nd leaving legacies to certain of his relatives named, appointed four per-his trustees,—two of them being legatees, the third a stranger, who got and the fourth a sister, who also got no legacy,—and directed his trus-umulate the income of his estate for fifty years, "After the fifty years e money to purchess an estate in my name that cannot be sold nor in-d the income from it, after paying expenses, to be divided amongst those in my will yearly." There was no other direction as to the estate. was one of the next of kin of the testator, maintained in a multiple-aised a year after the death of the testator that the estate, after satis-legacies, ought to be distributed as an intestate succession, on the at the clause quoted was void from uncertainty, and, therefore, that ion to accumulate, whether as regarded the period permitted by the Act, or as regarded the period struck at by that Act, was likewise , as being ancillary to the said clause.

hat as the direction to accumulate was unambiguous, and as it did not t at the expiration of the period of accumulation the directions in the necessarily be incapable of execution, the direction to accumulate must

No. 112.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Edward's Trustees v. Edward.
2D DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.
M.

receive effect in so far as permitted by the statute, and that it was premature to determine in hoc statu the rights of parties in the capital and accumulations.

WILLIAM EDWARD, surgeon, Letham, Forfar, died on 6th August 1889 leaving a holograph trust-settlement in the following terms:—

"Letham, 13th September 1888.

"This is the will of William Edward, surgeon.

"1. Charles Smith Edward, my brother James' son, is to get nothing not to be allowed to enter my house, that's him settled.

"2. John Young, my sister Ann's son, is to get £5; William Young £5; Jane Young, their sister, £5.

"3. John Ogilvy, stationmaster upon the Caledonian Railway, £20 Jessie Ogilvy £30 yearly, to help to bring her family up and educate them, and also money to college her three sons; and John Ogilvy money to college one son, the amount each year not to exceed £30 for each of them.

"It has taken me hard work fifty years to make the money that I have, and I want it kept for another fifty years, and what is over expenses paying each year added twice a-year to the stock. The estate at present is as follows—£3,400 in the Royal Bank at Forfar, £2,000 in the Bank of Scotland at Forfar, £2,600 in the Commercial Bank at Forfar, all upon deposit-receipt, besides my book-accounts, pony, and furniture. I appoint Robert Bruce, agent in the Commercial Bank at Forfar, and John Ogilvy, stationmaster, and Jessie Ogilvy, his sister, and Jane Edward, my sister, my trustees. The trustees always to be four. Haldane Edward Fyfe, if he come up well, to be appointed one at twenty-one years. Everything here is my own, and if any person enter objections beat them off.

"WILLIAM EDWARD, Surgeon.

"It requires no witnesses. See left side."

[On left side.]—"After the fifty years is past, the money to purchase an estate in my name that cannot be sold nor indebted, and the income from it, after paying expenses, to be divided amongst those mentioned in my will yearly. WILLIAM EDWARD, Surgeon."

The heirs in mobilibus ab intestato of the testator were Jane Edward (one of the trustees appointed by the will), his only surviving sister; Charles Smith Edward (mentioned in the will) the only son of the testator's only brother, James Edward, who predeceased him; John Ogilvy and Jessie Ogilvy or Fyfe (both mentioned in the will), the only children of the testator's sister Innes Edward or Ogilvy, who predeceased him: John, William, and Jane Young (all mentioned in the will) the only children of the testator's only other sister, Annie Edward or Young, who also predeceased him.

In consequence of competing claims the trustees, on 21st December 1889, brought a multiplepoinding, in which they claimed, as their first alternative claim, to retain the residue of the estate until 6th August 1909.

Charles Smith Edward claimed as one of the heirs ab intestato of the testator to be ranked and preferred to one-fourth of the whole estate, all events after satisfying the legacies under heads 2 and 3 of the will, on the footing that the provision in the will for the disposal of the accumulated fund and the fee of the estate was void from uncertainty.

John and William Young (besides claiming on the same footing as Charles Smith Edward) maintained alternatively "that on a sound construction of the will the deceased thereby directed his trustees to purchase an estate and to entail it for behoof of the five persons taking benefit under the will, viz., the present claimants, and Jane Young, John Ogilvy, and Jessie Ogilvy. These directions, however, being defective, the claimants contended that the whole of the testator's means, under burden of the annuities

No. 112.

Feb. 6, 1891.
Edward's Trustees v. Edward.

d by the will, and under deduction of the special legacies thereby ell to be paid or conveyed equally among the said five persons. tively, the claimants contended that the trustees were bound to d accumulate the fund in medio, as directed by the will, for a period ty-one years, and thereafter to divide the estate among the said sons, or their issue as coming in place of them, on the footing that truly imported a gift of the fee of the estate among them; or, in nt, that the trustees were meantime bound to give effect to the 's direction to accumulate for a period of twenty-one years, leaving stions as to the disposal of the fund and the income arising there- be determined at the end of said period."

ns were also lodged for other parties, to which it is unnecessary to detail.

st November 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this utor:—"Finds that the pursuers and real raisers, trustees of the d Dr William Edward, are bound to implement and satisfy the ons in the second and third heads of the will, and to retain the of the trust-estate until the 6th August 1910, being twenty-one om the date of the truster's death, the free balance, after paying es of administration and providing for the said special legacies, dded to the capital at the two terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas year: Further, finds that it is premature to determine in hoc statu nts of parties in the capital and interest of the said residue: There- stains the first alternative claim stated for the said pursuers, and the remaining claims in the competition in so far as inconsistent e foregoing findings: Finds the claimants entitled to their expenses competition out of the funds of the trust-estate: Allows accounts to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor nd report, and grants leave to reclaim." *

PINION.—It is to be regretted that the parties have not agreed to a divi- the fund in medio, because I am unable to hold that the testator's direc- to the disposal of the residue of his estate are so radically bad from un- y as to warrant an immediate division of the fund. The will contains a arly expressed direction to accumulate the free income of the estate for of fifty years; the reason assigned being that it had taken the testator rs to make the money and that he desired it kept until it reached a sum t to purchase a landed estate. This direction, so far as accumulation is ed, can only receive effect for twenty-one years, the time limited by But, subject to that restriction, the direction must receive effect unless ctions as to the ultimate disposal of the fund are so inextricable and n as to lead to the bequest being annulled.

e directions are as follows:—'After the fifty years is past the money to e an estate in my name, that cannot be sold nor indebted, and the income after paying expenses, to be divided amongst those mentioned in my rly.'

w these directions are confused and incorrectly expressed; but it is pretty at what was in the testator's mind was, that he wished his trustees to e a landed estate and settle it by deed of strict entail, and that the heirs l should adopt his name. Of course the direction to entail (if it can be cannot receive effect, because no tailzied destination, and indeed no ion at all, is given. There still, however, remains a direction to purchase e with the residue.

much as to the subject. As to the objects of the bequest, they are d as 'those mentioned in my will.' It was strongly maintained by all mants, except John and William Young, that there was radical uncertainty e persons referred to in these words. The words certainly need construc- t I do not see any insuperable difficulty in putting a reasonable construc- on them. I do not wish to prejudge any questions which may hereafter

No. 112.

Feb. 6, 1891. Edward's Trustees v. Edward.

Charles Smith Edward reclaimed, and argued;—Except as regarded the pecuniary legacies and the educational provisions, this will was void from uncertainty. There was no doubt a distinct enough direction to accumulate for fifty years, but the clause expressing the purpose for which this accumulation was to take place was unintelligible. It was impossible to discover who were the persons intended to be benefited, or what precise benefit they were intended to take. They were described as "those mentioned in my will." Was that expression intended to be confined to those mentioned beneficially, or did it include also those who were mentioned only as trustees, one of whom, it might be observed, was the testator's only surviving sister? Then what were these persons, whoever they were, intended to take? What was said was, that "the money" was to purchase an estate in the testator's name that could not be sold or indebted, the yearly income to be divided among these persons. There was in that no express gift of the fee, but merely of the income, but it was said that a gift of the fee was to be implied. Plainly not an absolute gift in fee, for the provision about paying the income would then be meaningless. Possibly what the testator had in his mind was a confused notion of an entailed estate, but it was obvious that there was here no effectual direction to entail; for one thing, there was no destination. It might be that by means of a trust a testator could tie up his moveable estate for the purpose of paying the income to such persons as he might select if he made it quite clear what he intended, but that would not warrant the inference that he intended the same persons to take the fee. The fee therefore being undisposed of fell into intestacy. That being so it followed that the intended accumulation, in so far as it was to have arise, but I may say, in illustration, that prima facie there is a good deal to be said for the contention of the claimants John and William Young. They maintain that by 'those mentioned in my will,' the testator meant those beneficially interested under it, namely, his nephews and nieces (five in number), to whom he left specific bequests; that the expression clearly did not include his nephew Charles Smith Edward, who is disinherited in very emphatic terms; and that it would be unreasonable to hold the words to refer to the persons named as trustees, other than those who are already named as legatees. The remaining trustees other than those already mentioned as legatees are Robert Bruce, agent in the Commercial Bank at Forfar, who was not apparently connected with the family, and Jane Edward the testator's sister. As to the latter, there would have been much to say in favour of its being intended that she should get a share of the residue, had it not been that the time contemplated for payment cannot in human probability arrive during her lifetime. I do not say that the argument should prevail, but it is certainly stateable and not extravagant.

---

"There is more difficulty as to the extent of the interest which the persons favoured are to take. It may be that when the time for decision comes it will be held that the testator died intestate quoad the capital of the residue. But assuming that it is clear who the persons are who are described as 'those mentioned in my will,' the will says that they are to receive at least the free yearly income of the estate when purchased.

"I therefore think that the truster's directions to accumulate must receive effect in so far as allowed by law, and at the expiry of twenty-one years from the date of his death it will fall to be decided who are then entitled to the income and capital of the estate. It may be that even then the trust may not be brought to a close; but as a question will then arise as to the disposal of the income which can no longer be legally accumulated, it is not necessary at present to look further ahead.

"This being my opinion, I think the trustees must continue to hold the fund for twenty-one years, accumulating the free income, and in the meantime satisfy the provisions of the second and third heads of the will."

No. 112.
Feb. 6, 1891.
Edward's Trustees v. Edward.

e during the period beyond the twenty-one years permitted by so fell into intestacy, for it was only where the fund or estate, the source of the intended accumulation, was given to some o that the accumulation was a mere burden on the gift, that the testato were excluded from the benefit of the Act.[1] Of course, as Act went, the direction to accumulate was good for twenty-one it was a direction to accumulate for a purpose which was so bly expressed as to be void for uncertainty, and consequently the even so far as within the statute, was ineffectual. The Court eclare that now, for it was not a case in which some contingent ight have emerged at the end of the twenty-one years.[2] for John and William Young;—It was at anyrate plain that r intended the reclaimer to get nothing; the deed therefore e critically construed so as to carry out that intention, if pos- was also plain that the testator intended the income of his be accumulated, and it was sufficiently plain to take the case e category of wills void from uncertainty that the persons o be benefited by the accumulation were those mentioned in parts of the will beneficially. The fair reading of the added to give the whole estate, capital and income, to those persons; yrate there was no reason why the unambiguous direction to e should not receive effect, in so far as within the statute.

STICE-CLERK.—This is undoubtedly a very curious will. The ques- we have to determine is, whether it is, or is not, intelligible in so uires to be dealt with at present. It clearly is so as regards Charles ward, of whom the testator emphatically states that he is to get d there is also no difficulty as to the special legacies and as to certain provisions. But then the testator goes on to say that as it has taken ears' hard work to make his money, he wishes it kept for another fifty "what is over expenses paying each year added twice a-year to the nd he adds in a codicil or postcript:—"After the fifty years is past, to purchase an estate in my name that cannot be sold nor indebted, come from it, after paying expenses, to be divided amongst those in my will yearly." think the only question which we have now to decide is whether istinct direction to accumulate, and I have no hesitation in saying is. No doubt the law says that the accumulation must cease at the nty-one years, but if there is a good direction to accumulate given n able to give such a direction it must receive effect in so far as the s. There may be some difficulty at the end of the twenty-one years ning what is to be done with the money, but the problem may have elf out by that time. I think, at all events, that we are not called cide now how the accumulated fund is ultimately to be disposed of. that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right, and should be affirmed.

OUNG.—The only direction dealt with by the Lord Ordinary is the direc- mulate, and the meaning of that direction is not doubtful. It is a direc- mulate the income of this estate, under certain deductions, for fifty years.

---

e v. Kirk-session of Dundee, July 18, 1846, 8 D. 1229; Mackenzie v. 's Trustees, June 29, 1877, 4 R. 962; Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell, 877, 5 R. 248.
loch v. M'Culloch, Nov. 28, 1752, reported as a note 5 W. and S. on v. Skinner, March 6, 1844, 16 Scot. Jur. 422.

No. 112.

Feb. 6, 1891. Edward's Trustees v. Edward.

Of course that period must, in terms of the Thellusson Act, be restricted to twenty one years, but why should the direction, so restricted, not receive effect? The only objection which has been stated is of this nature,—it is said that at the end of the twenty-one years it will be found that the accumulation has all been in vain,—that the provisions of the will directing what is to be done with the accumulated fund at the end of the period are unworkable. Now, like your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, I do not think that I am in a position to affirm this proposition now. I would if I could. If I were sure that these provisions are incapable of execution, I should be willing to interpose now, and find that they are, but it is quite possible that there may be found persons at the end of the twenty-one years who are entitled to the whole accumulated fund. I therefore agree with your Lordship in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordships in thinking that it is impossible for us to hold that the accumulation directed by the testator must necessarily be to no purpose. On the contrary, it may be found at the end of the twenty-one years that there are persons entitled to the benefit of the provision of the will, even although no one is pointed out to take the fee of the estate. My impression is that the accumulation can only be for the benefit of the persons named in the will who under it are declared to be entitled to the income of the estate after the accumulation has ceased. But whatever may be my impression upon that matter, I cannot decide it now. I think we can do nothing else than affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur entirely with Lord Young.

THE COURT adhered.

ARCHIBALD MENZIES, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—A. W. GIFFORD, W.S.—JOHN RHIND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 113.

Feb. 7, 1891. King, Brown, & Co. v. Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation, Limited.

1st DIVISION. C.

KING, BROWN, & COMPANY, Pursuers.—Daniell.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN BRUSH ELECTRIC LIGHT CORPORATION, LIMITED, Defenders.—Jameson.

Appeal—Expenses—Petition for interim execution pending appeal—Expenses of petition and of extract.

(SEE ante, vol. xvii. p. 1266.)

In this case the defenders having appealed to the House of Lords, the pursuers petitioned for interim execution for expenses pending appeal, and in moving the Court to grant the petition, asked for interim decree for the expenses of the petition and the dues of extract. The Court declined to pronounce any other than the usual order.

THE following was the interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition for execution pending appeal, along with the Auditor's report upon the petitioners' account of expenses, approves of said report, and decern against the Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation, Limited, for the sum of £1114, 1s. 4d., the taxed amount of said expenses: Allow said decree to go out and be extracted and execution to proceed thereon, all as prayed for in said petition, upon the petitioners finding caution in common form to repeat whatever sum or sums they may receive under this decree in the event of the interlocutors appealed against being reversed in the House of Lords."

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S., Agents.

s Riddell and Others (Rev. W. Barr's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Shaw—W. Campbell. am Riddell and Others (Mrs Barr's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Lorimer.

No. 114.

Feb. 19, 1891.
Barr's Trustees v. Barr's Trustees.

n—Testament—Clause of return.—A testator directed his trustees is wife (1) £2100 with full power of disposal thereof; (2) "£2000 to her during her lifetime, and the uncontrolled possession and profit of shall enjoy as long as she lives, which sum, however, should nothing nder it necessary to touch upon, or induce her to dispose of it other- she shall have power to do, the same or balance thereof shall at her n and form part of my trust-estate." In a supplementary settlement his trustees to pay his wife (1) the said £2100 to be at her sole dis- (2) the £2000, "the free and unfettered use of which she shall enjoy he lives, with power even to trench upon the principal should she ever emergency require to do so; declaring, however, that the said £2000 t required for my wife's personal use shall at her death return, and, necessary, be ordered by her then to return to my estate."
e survived. At her death she left the £2000 separately invested her means, but disposed of it expressly by will. Held that the wife er to dispose of the £2000 mortis causa, and that it belonged to the rustees.

v. William Barr died on 7th June 1883. He left a wife, but By his settlement he conveyed his whole estate, heritable able, to certain persons as trustees, appointing them also his By the third purpose he directed his trustees, inter alia, at erm after his death, to pay to his widow £2100, "with power to rself alone, to dispose of the same during her life, or in such manner as she shall think fit." In the fourth place, the testator he trustees to pay to Mrs Barr at the first term after his death, tional sum of £2000 to be held by her during her lifetime, and trolled possession and profit of which she shall enjoy as long as which sum, however, should nothing occur to render it neces- er to touch upon, or induce her to dispose of it otherwise, which have power to do, the same or balance thereof shall at her death l form part of my trust-estate." The residue of his estate was lied as directed by a subsequent writing. The settlement was Mrs Barr in virtue of a clause therein contained to the effect pproved of the provisions made for her, and accepted thereof in of her legal rights.

2d Division. Ld. Kyllachy. M.

pplementary settlement, dated 26th January 1882, Mr Barr, on ive of his former settlement, instructed his executors to pay his l continued:—"My debts thus paid, I instruct my said executors nly to hand over to my wife for her liferent use all my house- iture, &c., as specified in my previous will, but also to pay to two sums on the conditions stated,—1st, the sum of two thousand nund. pounds sterling (£2100) in fee, to be alike in use and n at her sole and absolute disposal; and 2d, the sum also of and pounds (£2000), the free and unfettered use of which she y so long as she lives, with power even to trench upon the should she ever under any emergency require to do so; declar- ver, that the said £2000 so far as not required for my wife's use shall at her death return, and, if thought necessary, be y her then to return to my estate and be disposed of as I shall and on the further narrative that the residue of his estate would nter alia, "what is likely to return to my estate after the death of my wife, £2000," directed the trustees to divide the whole residu among the nephews and nieces of himself and his wife.

No. 114.

Feb. 19, 1891.
Barr's Trustees v. Barr's Trustees.

After her husband's death, Mrs Barr received two sums of £2100 an £2000. She died on 24th October 1889, leaving a trust-disposition an settlement whereby she conveyed to trustees her whole estate belongi to her, "or over which I may have power of disposal at my death, . . declaring that the above clause is intended to include and shall include sum of £2000 left to me by my said husband under his trust-dispositi and settlement, and what my said husband intended I should dispose as I thought right and proper."

In September 1890, Mr Barr's trustees raised against Mrs Barr's tru tees an action for payment of the £2000 received by her from her hu band's estate. They averred that it was separately invested by her, th she did not require to use it, and did not use it, having other ample mea over and above her liferent of it.

The defenders denied this averment, and stated that Mrs Barr treat it as part of her general estate.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said Mrs Barr not having trenche upon or disposed of the said sum of £2000, the same falls to be re to the estate of the said Rev. William Barr, as provided by his set ment, and decree should accordingly be pronounced as concluded (2) The settlement of the said Mrs Barr not being a valid exercise her of the power of trenching upon or disposing of said £2000, the pu suers are entitled to decree.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the Re William Barr's settlements, Mrs Barr, on his death, took an absolu right to the £2000 in question, or otherwise had a testamentary powe disposal thereof. (2) The late Mrs Barr having trenched upon or di posed of the said £2000, under the power to that effect conferred on h the defenders, as her trustees and executors, are not liable to pay as cc cluded for.

A joint minute was put in for the parties, shewing the manne which the £2000 had been invested.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) gave decree in terms of the conclus of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The first question is as to the true construction Mr Barr's settlement with respect to the bequest of £2000, which is the ject of the action. In my opinion, that settlement must be held to inclu both the original trust-disposition and settlement and the holograph sup mentary settlement; and reading these documents together, I am unab come to any other conclusion than that maintained by the pursuers, viz., th Mrs Barr's right was in effect a liferent, with a limited power of disposal dur her life. I do not doubt that she might have spent the money, and it mig that she might have disposed of it gratuitously inter vivos. But I do not thi it possible to hold that she had the power to test upon it, and therefore, ass ing—as I do assume—that she was entitled to have the money paid over t and to use it, or any part of it, for any purpose she pleased during her life consider that she was under an obligation to repay at her death to her husb estate so much of it as she did not so use.

"The next and only other question is, whether Mrs Barr did in fact l the sum in the bequest intact. I am of opinion that the joint minute of a sions (No. 20 of process) sufficiently establishes that she did. It is not nec sary to consider what would have been the result if she had mixed the f with her other funds. An argument might in that case have arisen which do not arise. For it is clear that Mrs Barr kept the bequest separately invest so that there is no difficulty in tracing and identifying it. Indeed, in her w

No. 114.

Feb. 19, 1891. Barr's Trustees v. Barr's Trustees.

fenders reclaimed, and argued;—Mrs Barr had a right to "dis- the £2000. That included a right to do so by mortis causa It was her money, for it would have been liable for her debts, ould spend it at pleasure. It should therefore fall under her rsuers were not called on.

OUNG.—I do not think it necessary to call for a reply. I agree with Ordinary that not only the trust-deed, but the holograph supplemen- ment, must be taken into account. It is therefore unnecessary to con- we should have decided if the latter deed had not existed. Taking together the question is, whether the sum of £2000 passes under the , or whether the testamentary trustees of the husband are entitled to it as part of the husband's estate. I think the latter is the correct e wife, in my opinion, had only a liferent of the sum of £2000, and was provided that under circumstances of exceptional necessity she it, she had no power to dispose of it by will. The contrast between nd the other sum of £2100 makes this clearer. I think the husband hat the £2100 was to be at the wife's own disposal, but that the £2000 o be used by her if a necessity should arise, and that not having been returns to the trustees of the husband.

UTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—WINCHESTER & NICHOLSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 115.

Feb. 20, 1891. Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

S RUSSELL (Surveyor of Taxes), Appellant.—Asher—Young.
RTH OF SCOTLAND BANK, LIMITED, Respondent.—Dickson.

—Income-Tax—Application for certificate of over-assessment—Appeal ency—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 133—Taxes nt Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 19), secs. 57 and 58.—By section Income-Tax Act, 1842, it is enacted, "That if within or at the end of urrent at the time of making any assessment under this Act," any arged under schedule D should find, and should prove to the Commis-she attempts to bequeath the fund to the defenders, she treats it as a nd still extant fund.

---

as argued that it was clear from Mrs Barr's settlement that, in bound for her brother in a certain cautionary obligation for £900, intended to create a charge on the £2000. I do not, however, think inference can be legitimately drawn from the settlement, and I also w far, in such a matter, the settlement can be legitimately appealed he whole I think that the pursuers must have decree in terms of their following authorities were referred to:—For pursuers, Sprot, June 12, D. 840, 27 Scot. Jur. 432; Lawson, June 10, 1841, 3 D. 1001; Smith, 1883, 10 R. 1144; Tronson, 12 R. 155. For defenders, Buchanan's Feb. 28, 1868, 6 Macph. 536, 40 Scot. Jur. 273; Ersk. iii. 8, 45; 13 S. 246; Dwyer, 1 R. 943."

orities in note of Lord Ordinary; Reddie's Trustees v. Lindsay, March 17 R. 558.

No. 115.

Feb. 20, 1891.
Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

sioners, that his profits during the year had fallen short of the computed sum upon which he had been assessed, it should be lawful for the Commissioners to cause the assessment to be amended, and if the sum assessed should have been paid, to grant a certificate of overpayment.

A banking company on 12th October 1888 discovered that they had been over-assessed, on their own return, for the year 1888-9, but they made no claim under the above section until 10th July 1890. The General Commissioners granted a certificate of over-assessment, holding, inter alia, that the claim for overpayment had been made "within a reasonable time." The Surveyor of Taxes appealed to the Court of Exchequer. The bank objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that an application for a certificate of over-assessment was not an appeal to the Commissioners within the meaning of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, and therefore, that an appeal from the determination of the Commissioners to the Court of Exchequer was incompetent; and, on the farther ground, that the appeal was an appeal against the determination of the Commissioners on a question of fact, viz., the reasonableness of the delay in applying for a certificate of over-assessment.

The Court sustained the appeal, reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and remitted to them to refuse the certificate, holding that the bank, by failing to make the application within or at the end of the year of assessment, had lost their remedy under the Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 133.

Opinion per cur. that the claim must be made either within the year or within the shortest period after the close of the year sufficient in the circumstances to enable the person assessed to ascertain, by using due diligence, whether and to what extent an overpayment has been made.

Exchequer Cause.
1ST DIVISION.
C.

AT a meeting of the Commissioners of Income-Tax for the County of Aberdeen, held on 29th October 1890, the North of Scotland Bank, Limited, appealed under the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 1[illegible], as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1865 (28 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 6, against an assessment upon £35,840, 7s. made upon them on their own return under schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts for the year 1888-9, and craved to have it restricted to £27,036, 8s. 7d.; and inasmuch as the tax on the assessment had been paid the bank also craved for a certificate of overpayment and to be repaid the sum of £220, 1s. 1[illegible], being the tax at the rate of 6d. in the pound on £8803, 18s. 5d., the amount of the alleged over-assessment.

The Surveyor of Taxes opposed the appeal on the ground that it had not been intimated "within or at the end of the current year" in the sense of section 133 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.*

---

* "The Income-tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 133, enacts,—"And be it enacted, that if within or at the end of the year current at the time of making any assessment under this Act, or at the end of any year when such assessment ought to have been made, any person charged to the duties contained in schedule D, whether he shall have computed his profits or gains arising the last aforesaid on the amount thereof in the preceding or current year, or on the average of years, shall find, and shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners by whom the assessment was made, that his profits or gains during such year for which the computation was made fell short of the sum so computed in respect of the same source of profit on which the computation was made, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners to cause the assessment made for such current year to be amended in respect of such source of profit as the case shall require, and in case the sum assessed shall have been paid, to certify under their hands to the Commissioners for Special Purposes at the head office of Stamps and Taxes in England the amount of the sum overpaid on such first assessment, and thereupon the said last-mentioned Commissioners shall issue an order for the repayment of such sum as shall have been so overpaid."

No. 115.

Feb. 20, 1891. Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

Commissioners sustained the appeal and granted a certificate of ment, being of opinion (1) that the words "within or at the end urrent year" did not imply a limitation, but an extension of time; that the appeal had been intimated within a reasonable time, g that the statute was to be read as meaning that appeals must ated within a reasonable time.

Assessor obtained a case.

llowing were the facts stated in the case:—"1. The company ssed under schedule D on its own return on the full amount of xed profits on the average of the three years 1885, 1886, and shewn by its balance-sheets made up to 30th September in each years. 2. The proved amount of the untaxed profits for the year ment, estimated in conformity with section 6 of 28 Victoria, cap. ne average of the three years, including the year of assessment, t of the amount assessed by the sum of £8803, 18s. 5d., and it is on this sum at the rate of 6d. per pound (£220, 1s. 11d.), which is unt of which repayment is sought for 1888-89. 3. The company's for each of the years on which the foregoing average is founded tified by the company's auditors as under:—1886, on 15th October 887, on 17th October 1887; and 1888, on 12th October 1888. 4. ting of the shareholders at which these balances and directors' were approved, were held as under:—1886, on 5th November 887, on 4th November 1887; and 1888, on 2d November 1888. e time the company made the return for the year 1888-9 the f the year of assessment were not and could not be known, the 's financial year ending on 30th September in each year. 6. No on of any appeal was made until 10th July 1890."

uestions of law were:—"(1) Whether the Commissioners' decision t to appeal or review; and (2) if it be so, whether, according to stated, the Commissioners had power to grant a certificate of ment for the year 1888-89?"

d for the Assessor;—(1) An appeal to the Court of Exchequer on uestion as the present was competent.[1] It was said that the pro- before the Commissioners were not of the nature of an appeal, ons 57 and 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 . 19) read together shewed that such proceedings constituted an o the Commissioners in the sense of that Act, and therefore an o the Court of Exchequer under section 59 was competent. It further that, admitting (on the merits) that the 133d section a limitation as to time, what was meant was that intima- ver-assessment must be made within a reasonable time, and that ommissioners had here determined that the intimation had been thin a reasonable time, an appeal against that determination, as determination on a matter of fact, was final. Now, in point of haps, the Commissioners had here determined a matter of fact, but reality they had determined was a question of law—the interpre- the statute,—and that on a matter affecting their own jurisdiction, appear from the second branch of the argument. (2) On the ne Commissioners were wrong. The meaning of the statute was imations of over-assessment must be made within the year of nt, or, if that was impossible, as soon after the end of the year as ossible for the person assessed to have discovered the error. The vas so worded as to permit a certain latitude as to time, because [1] lton v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, May 22, 1890, 17 R. 787; of Taxes v. Macrae, Dec. 12, 1884, 12 R. 336.

No. 115.

Feb. 20, 1891.
Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

the exigencies of a large business might make it impossible to discover the actual profits for any given year within that year, but the statute did not permit any greater latitude than was absolutely necessary to make that discovery in the particular case. The bank misunderstood the import of the Copper Company's case.[1] The Court there had no certain information as to when the company discovered that they had returned an overstatement of their profits for the year; the decision therefore was simply a decision that in the circumstances of that particular case it was reasonable to assume that delay for a certain time after the end of the year was necessary in order to make the discovery, and consequently that that delay was, in the particular case, permissible under the statute. The decision was no authority for the proposition that a similar period of delay was permissible in all cases, or that any period of delay was permissible at all, where, as here, the person taxed had certain knowledge of the overstatement before the end of the year. To hold, as the Commissioners here had done, that a delay of twenty months after that knowledge had been acquired was a reasonable delay, was practically to read the words under construction out of the statute. The Commissioners therefore had misinterpreted the statute, and their finding that the intimation had been made within a reasonable time was ultra vires, and, being so, could not bar an appeal, as the bank contended it did in answer to the first question. The Act 23 Vict. cap. 14, did not apply. Its purpose was to impose a limit—three years—in cases where there had been no limit before; but here there was a limit—that imposed by the words under construction.

Argued for the bank;—(1) The appeal was incompetent. The proceedings before the Commissioners were not of the nature of an appeal but were merely administrative proceedings,[2] and under section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, it was only "on the determination of an appeal," i.e., to the Commissioners, that a right of appeal to the Court of Exchequer was given. Further, the Commissioners had found in fact that the intimation of over-assessment had been made within a reasonable time, and that being a finding in fact was not appealable under the Taxes Management Act, 1880.[3] Then (2) on the merits, the words "or at the end of the year," if understood as meaning "at the latest moment of the year," had no practical effect, for the words, so understood, added nothing to "within" the year. The words therefore must either be rejected as meaningless, or must be open to construction, and the fair construction was, that if the intimation was made within a reasonable time after the end of the year it would be good. That was the ratio of the Cape Copper Company's case, where an intimation was held to be good although it was made until nearly three years after the end of the year of assessment. If, on the other hand, the words were meaningless, i.e., imposed no limitation at all, then the case was regulated (if the right of appeal was in any way limited as to time) by the Act 23 Vict. cap. 14, which imposed a limit of three years.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal under section 133 of the Income-Tax Act (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35) by the North of Scotland Bank against an assessment made on them on their return for the year 1888-9.

[1] The Queen v. Special Commissioners of Income-Tax (In re Cape Copper Mining Company) 1888, L. R., 21 Q. B. Div. 313, 2 Tax Cases, 332.

[2] Strain v. Strain, June 26, 1886, 13 R. 1029.

[3] In re Cape Copper Mining Co., supra.

No. 115.

Feb. 20, 1891.
Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

The proved amount of the untaxed profits for the year of assessment estimated in conformity with sec. 6 of 28 Vict. c. 30, on the average of the three years, including the year of assessment, fell short of the amount assessed by £8803, 18s. 5d.; and it is the tax on this excess, at the rate of sixpence per pound (£220, 1s. 11d.), of which the appellants claim relief for the year 1888-9.

The company's balance for the year of assessment was certified by their auditors on 12th October 1888. This balance, and the directors' report thereon, were approved by a meeting of the shareholders on 2d November 1888.

It does not appear from any statement in the case before us at what date the overpayment was made, and probably this is immaterial. Indeed, I am disposed to think it is quite immaterial. The important dates are (1) when the fact of overpayment was ascertained, and (2) when application was made to the General Commissioners for a certificate of overpayment. After the overpayment was made the only remedy open to the appellants was an application for a certificate of overpayment under sec. 133 of the Statute 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35. The question is, whether they have made such application within the time prescribed by the section according to its true and just construction?

The blunder had been discovered by the company's auditor so early as the 12th October 1888, but no claim was made for a certificate of over-assessment till the 10th July 1890. The surveyor maintains that this demand comes too late according to the true construction of sec. 133, while the company's contention is in effect that there is in the section no limitation of time for making such demand.

The words of the section are—"If within or at the end of the year current at the time of making any assessment . . . any person charged to the duties contained in schedule D, whether he shall have computed his profits or gains arising as last aforesaid on the amount thereof in the preceding or current year, or on an average of years, shall find and shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners by whom the assessment was made that his profits or gains during such year for which the computation was made fall short of the sum so computed in respect of the same source of profit on which the computation was made, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners to cause the assessment for such current year to be amended in respect of such source of profit as the case shall require, and in case the sum assessed shall have been paid, to certify under their hands to the Commissioners for special purposes the amount of the sum overpaid on such first assessment," and thereupon the Commissioners for special purposes shall issue an order for repayment of the sum overpaid.

The words specially requiring construction are the words introductory to the section—"within or at the end of the year current at the time" of making the assessment. Literally these words may be read as meaning that the claim must be made before the expiry of the year of assessment; and in some cases there may be no difficulty in complying with this strict and literal meaning of the words. But when there is another and ever largely increasing class of cases in which such compliance is absolutely impossible, as where a company is engaged in large mercantile concerns involving the keeping of accounts in various parts of the world, which cannot be brought together and balanced as a whole without the lapse of a considerable time after the lapse of the financial year on the 5th of April—to apply a strict and literal construction to the statutory words in such cases would be in the highest degree unreasonable and unjust. On the other hand, it would be quite as unreasonable to extend the time for making the claim to any time subsequent to the lapse of the year of assessment. This construction would really deprive the words "at the end of the year" of all intelligible meaning. It seems to me therefore that the only rational and the satisfactory solution of the difficulty is to hold that the claim must be made either within the year or within such a period after the close of the year as will enable the trader to ascertain, by using due diligence, whether and to what extent an overpayment of tax has been made.

No. 115.
Feb. 20, 1891.
Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

The case of The Queen v. Special Commissioners of Income-tax (in re Cape Copper Mining Company) came first before a Divisional Court and afterwards before a Court of Appeal of the High Court of Justice in England. The arguments of counsel and the judgments are to a considerable extent devoted to technical questions with which we have no concern. But there are very distinct and lucid expressions of opinion as to the construction of the opening words of section 133, which are worthy of the highest consideration, particularly as in the end they formed the real ground of the judgments.

In the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls said (T. C. p. 350),—"You must give a meaning to these words 'at the end of the year' elastic enough to make them fairly and reasonably applicable to the different cases to which they will have to be applied. I think it must not be so large as to say at any time after. I think it must not be so restrictive so as to say that the Court can lay down one single period within which every case must be found and proved. I think you must give an interpretation, as I say, which will make it applicable to each particular case, and the real construction of it to my mind is this. It must be in as short time as in the particular case, by exertion, the party can fairly be said to have found out and to have proved; it is not simply to say that it is within a reasonable time as a general mode; it is in the shortest time that he can do it if he has made every exertion which he ought to have made. So that if a person really delays the examination of his affairs, although it may not be unreasonable for him to delay, if he really delays it beyond the time when if he had made all the exertion he ought to have made he would have found it out sooner, he is too late; he has not complied with this stipulation 'at the end of the year'; but if he has made every exertion which he ought to have made, then to say because a man has been several months, or in some cases more than a year, or, if you please, more than two years—for you cannot fix a time—if he has made every exertion that he ought to have made and yet cannot have done it within a less time than he has done it, to my mind he has satisfied the meaning of the section."

Lord Justice Lindley said (T. C. p. 355),—"It appears to me the true view that expression has been stated correctly by the Master of the Rolls. It is soon after the end of the year as is reasonably possible having regard to the facts of each particular case. Not literally at the end; that is absurd—everyone sees that it is impossible. Nor does it mean at any time hereafter, nor even within a reasonable time afterwards, unless diligence be employed as a limitation."

These opinions commend themselves to my mind as presenting the most rational and satisfactory view of the intention of the Legislature in using the language under construction. And therefore, without further discussion, I content myself with expressing my entire concurrence in these opinions.

The application of the rule so established to the present case does not admit of any dispute. As already mentioned, the fact and the amount of the over-

No. 115.

Feb. 20, 1891.
Russell v. North of Scotland Bank, Limited.

of tax was ascertained so far back as the 12th of October 1888, but no made for a certificate of over-assessment till the 10th of July 1890. any therefore, in full knowledge of the facts, delayed their application nmissioners for a period of twenty months. This is certainly not the gence" nor "every exertion which he ought to have made" in the of the learned Judges already quoted.

dgment of the Court, I think, ought to be, to reverse the determination ommissioners, and remit to them to refuse the certificate of over- t for the year of assessment mentioned in the case.

ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and emitted to them to refuse the certificate of over-assessment.

SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 116.

Feb. 20, 1891.
Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr.

VID CUNNINGHAM LOUDON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Dickson—W. Campbell.
NCORPORATION OF TAILORS OF AYR, Defenders (Respondents).—Asher—Johnston.

— Trade incorporation — Member — Qualification—Process—Amend- urt of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29.—A tailor , who was born and received his education in Ayr, brought an action he Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr for declarator that he was entitled to ted a member of the Incorporation as being the son of a member, and hat by immemorial usage the sons of members were as such entitled to ted, although not resident in Ayr. The defenders did not dispute that ner's father had been a member at his death, but denied the averment The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders, holding that the aver- usage was not proved. On a reclaiming note the pursuer abandoned ment of usage, and contended that he was entitled to admission as ailor in Scotland, and offered, if necessary, to amend his summons to ct. Held that the proposed amendment, even if competent, would be t.

on (per Lord President) that the proposed amendment was incompetent, uld have the effect of converting an action on the pursuer's own account action for behoof of the public at large.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

D CUNNINGHAM LOUDON, tailor in Annan, raised an action against orporation of Tailors of Ayr, and against two persons named,— known members thereof,—of which the main conclusion was for tor that "in terms of the constitution and regulations of the said ration the pursuer is entitled to be admitted a member of the said rotherhood of the said Incorporation of Tailors as the son of a r and guild brother thereof." He also had a conclusion for declara- t he was entitled to be admitted to a benefit scheme connected ne incorporation.

pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "The Incorporation of Tailors of which the defenders are the sole present members, is of very t date. . . . By the immemorial usage and custom of said in- ation, both prior to and since 1761, the sons of members, as such, on application, admitted members thereof, and of the said relative e, though not burgesses of Ayr or tailors exercising their trade in It is not the case, as alleged by the defenders, that only burgesses r, and tailors exercising or about to exercise their trade in Ayr, admitted as members." (Cond. 5) " . . . The pursuer's

No. 116.
Feb. 20, 1891.
Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr.

father, James Loudon, tailor and clothier in Ayr, became a member of the incorporation and relative scheme on or about 24th January 1831 and continued a member till his death on 28th November 1872, having enjoyed an annuity from the corporation for some years prior thereto. After his death the pursuer's mother enjoyed an annuity till her death in August 1882." (Cond. 6) "The pursuer was born on 2d October 1845 and is a master tailor and clothier. He was born, brought up, served his apprenticeship, and learned his trade in the burgh of Ayr, and has the strongest claims for admission into the said incorporation. The pursuer does a considerable tailoring business in Ayr. . . . His father before his death in 1872, and thereafter the pursuer himself, made repeated applications to the incorporation for the admission of the pursuer as a member thereof and also of the said scheme, as the son of a member, but the defenders have most improperly delayed or refused to admit him."

The defenders did not dispute the earlier averments, but denied the averment of usage, and stated that no one had ever been admitted a member of the incorporation who was not a burgess of Ayr, and who was not a tailor exercising or about to exercise his trade in the town; that the pursuer was not a burgess of Ayr, and was a tailor in Annan and not in Ayr, and that he was not at the date of the action or at any prior time qualified to be entered a member of the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr or eligible to its said scheme.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Under the constitution and regulations of the said incorporation and of said scheme, the pursuer, being a son of a member, is entitled as such to be admitted a member of said incorporation, and also a member of the benefit scheme incident thereto.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) That the pursuer being neither a burgess of nor a tailor in Ayr was not qualified for admission as a member of the incorporation or of the scheme.

On 30th November 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed the parties a proof before answer.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer, who is a tailor and clothier in Annan, concludes for declarator that, as a son of a member of the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr he is entitled to be admitted a member and guild brother of that incorporation and of 'the scheme of said incorporation for the benefit of aged and infirm members and the widows and children of members.' He avers that he was born in 1845; that his father was a tailor and clothier in Ayr and a member of the incorporation and of the scheme; that by the immemorial usage of the incorporation the sons of members as such were on application admitted members of the incorporation and scheme though not burgesses of Ayr or tailors carrying on their trade in Ayr; and that from 1872 downwards he and his father on his behalf had applied for the admission of the pursuer as a member of the incorporation and of the scheme.

"The pursuer's demand is resisted by the present members of the incorporation on two grounds,—First, because the pursuer is not possessed of the essential qualification for membership, not being a burgess of Ayr nor a tailor exercising his trade in the burgh of Ayr; and secondly, because he has passed the age for admission to the scheme, which they aver has been fixed at the age of thirty by the regulations of the incorporation.

"On this latter point the pursuer's case seems to be, that a member of the incorporation according to the regulations is admissible to the scheme until he is forty, and that he applied for admission and was entitled to be admitted on his application before he had attained either age.

"There are thus two questions involved—

"First, Whether the pursuer possesses the requisite qualifications for membership of the incorporation? and

No. 116.

Feb. 20, 1891.
London v. Tailors of Ayr.

defenders reclaimed to the First Division. On 8th January 1890, rt adhered.

proof was mainly documentary, consisting of voluminous excerpts e books of the incorporation, and of states tabulating the position ons who had been admitted to the incorporation during a long f years. There was no evidence to shew that persons had been d merely as being the sons of members. A considerable propor- the persons admitted were not at the date of their admission es of Ayr, but many, though not all, subsequently became es. With at most three possible but somewhat obscure exceptions had been admitted who was not at the date of admission a tailor in Ayr. Why these exceptional persons—if they were excep- were admitted it did not appear, but there was nothing to shew was because their fathers had been members.

st July 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this utor:—"Finds that (1) it is not proved that the pursuer carried business of a tailor in Ayr; (2) that it is not established by proof ndly, Whether he established his right to be admitted to the scheme e had reached the age at which he ceased to be eligible?

---

defenders have pleaded that the pursuer has no title to sue, and they d a very interesting and weighty argument in support of that plea. It d on the position that this Incorporation of the Tailors of Ayr, like de incorporations of the kind, was a subordinate burghal incorporation of the wider incorporation which was the burgh itself. It was sub- hat no man could be a trading member of the incorporation of a burgh being a resident burgess, and that, therefore, it was impossible that any d be a member of the subordinate trade incorporations without being a burgess. In support of this position the defenders' counsel appealed to no doubt a work of the highest possible authority on this subject—the n the Municipal Corporations of Scotland, dated in 1837. The argu- mitted and the authority for it will no doubt require careful considera- eafter, but it does not appear possible to give effect to it at this stage of . It may have been, and no doubt was, very frequently the fact that bers of such minor incorporations were always resident burgesses. Still t maintained as a proposition in law that it was legally impossible for not a burgess to be admitted as a member of such an incorporation; pears impossible, on the strength of the argument submitted, to ignore t as wholly irrelevant the pursuer's averment that it was according to e of this particular incorporation to admit to its membership sons of though not themselves burgesses nor residents in the burgh. I think e on the point must be ascertained, and the weight due to the usage considered, and I cannot think that any satisfactory judgment could unced founded on historical investigations as to the usage of such trade ations generally without regard to the usage of this particular incorpora-pears to me, therefore, that the pursuer has stated averments in support im to be admitted a member of the incorporation which ought to be to probation.

ether he is also entitled to be admitted to the scheme of the incorpora- different question, and depends on the regulations of the incorporation point and on the date and character of the pursuer's application for n. On these points parties are at variance."

defenders urged that the proof should be confined, in the first instance, rmer point, because if that were determined in their favour an inquiry second point would be superseded. But it does not appear that the oint can involve any lengthened inquiry, and it does not appear expedi- ke a course which might involve the necessity of having two separate the cause."

No. 116. Feb. 20, 1891. Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr.

of custom, or otherwise, that by the constitution of the Incorporation of Tailors in Ayr he is entitled to be admitted a member of that incorporation merely as the son of a member thereof: Therefore repels the first plea in law for the pursuer, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, &c., reserving meantime any question as to modification."

The pursuer reclaimed. At the hearing he abandoned his claim to be admitted as being the son of a member, but argued that he was entitled to be admitted as being a tailor in Scotland, or at all events a tailor who though not resident in Ayr, did business there. By becoming a member of a trade incorporation of a place a person merely acquired a qualification to practise the trade in the place, which he might use or not as he pleased. Of course the necessity for such a qualification was now abolished, but it was necessary to look at the original theory in order to determine the pursuer's right. The proof established that burgess-ship was not essential, nor even residence, at the date of admission. If necessary the pursuer was willing to amend his summons.

The defenders were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I understand that none of your Lordships think it necessary to require an answer in this case.

The action is laid upon a very distinct ground, namely, that the pursuer has a right to be admitted as a member of the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr, on the qualification which he alleges is that he is the son of a member and grandbrother thereof. The leading conclusion of the action is for declarator that, "in terms of the constitution and regulations of the said incorporation, the pursuer is entitled to be admitted a member of the said guild brotherhood of the said Incorporation of Tailors as the son of a member and guild brother thereof," and the further conclusions of the summons are precisely in accordance with the leading declarator. In like manner the qualification set out in the statement on record is the same, and the pleas in law are all embodied in the first plea, because the others are merely ancillary. The first plea is that "under the constitution and regulations of the said Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr, and of the benefit scheme, the pursuer, being the son of a member, is entitled to be admitted a member of the said incorporation, and also a member of the benefit scheme incident thereto." I may here say in a single word in regard to the benefit scheme mentioned in that plea, that that really has no bearing upon the question present before us. Of course the pursuer can have no interest in, or right to, that benefit scheme unless he is entitled to become a member of the incorporation, and his title to become a member of the incorporation depends entirely upon the face of this record, upon his being the son of a previous member.

The case was brought before us at an earlier stage by a reclaiming note against a judgment of the Lord Ordinary allowing a proof to the pursuer of his averments, and it was very clear from the Lord Ordinary's note appended to the interlocutor of 30th November 1889 what it was that he intended that the pursuer should be allowed to prove. He sets out that the pursuer avers "that he was born in 1845, that his father was a tailor and clothier in Ayr, and a member of the incorporation and of the scheme, and that, by the immemorial usage of the incorporation, the sons of members, as such, were, on application, admitted members of the incorporation and scheme, though not burgesses of Ayr, or tailors carrying on trade in Ayr." Again he says in a later part of his note,—"It appears impossible to ignore and treat as wholly irrelevant the pursuer's averment that

No. 116.

Feb. 20, 1891.
Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr.

cording to the usage of this particular incorporation to admit to its rship the sons of members, though not themselves burgesses nor residents burgh." Now, in adhering to that interlocutor, I am quite satisfied that pted the view which the Lord Ordinary thus expressed, and that it was e of that particular averment as to the immemorial usage of the incorpora-admit sons of members, as such, on application, that we affirmed his ip's impression that it was a matter proper for inquiry; and indeed, in over the record again, I do not see that there is any other matter for at all. That seems to be the only substantive averment in support of ion as laid, namely, an action for declarator that the pursuer is entitled, son of a former corporator, to be admitted, as such, a member of the ination.

now matter of concession that that immemorial usage which the pursuer to exist has really no existence at all, and that the fact of a man being of a former corporator gave him no title whatever, according to the usages corporation, to be admitted a member himself. The pursuer is a tailor, bt, and I have no doubt he was bred in Ayr, and probably received his ducation in Ayr, but his present position in life is that he is a tailor in
, and it is not said that a tailor in Annan has any particular qualification dmitted to the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr.

only other ground, upon which the argument submitted to us that he has ification is founded, is that he is a tailor in Scotland. It seems to me to o that, and if that is a qualification, it certainly seems a very strange one, ch as I never heard in connection with corporation law before. But if a tailor in Scotland is a qualification to be admitted as a member of the oration of Tailors of Ayr, I do not see how we are to stop at Scotland.
should not every tailor all the world over have a good right to be admitted benefits of this incorporation? I cannot see a ground of distinction, and ore, even if the pursuer were in a position to amend his record and to ine this as a new ground of action, I should have very great scruple and lty indeed in listening to such a suggestion.

I doubt the competency of such an amendment in a case of this kind, e in this case the pursuer is suing on his own account. He is suing to be ed a member because he is the son of a previous member; but if he is d to convert his action into a suit to be admitted as a member because he ilor, that is to say, because he is either a Scottish tailor, or a tailor some-else in the world, then it becomes an action of a very different class in-much more comprehensive in its conclusions. It would be an action suing r behoof of the pursuer himself, but for behoof of a great community. I think that is within the scope and intention of the Act of Parliament, allows such extensive amendments as we are now acquainted with.

really it is in vain to speculate upon whether that amendment could be d, because if it were, and if this action were converted into an action of ator that every tailor in Scotland was entitled to be a member of this ination, that would be so plainly and obviously irrelevant that I think your hips would at once reject the whole amendment.

hink the pursuer's case entirely fails. He has no title according to the ce of immemorial use as the son of a previous member, and he has, in my n, no title or shadow of a title arising from the mere fact that he happens a tailor, and is in some way connected by birth or education with Ayr. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

No. 116. Feb. 20, 1891. Loudon v. Tailors of Ayr.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in your Lordship's opinion. In coming to the consideration of this question, I think we start with a very elementary rule of the law of corporations—namely, that such bodies keep up their membership by co-optation. That is the universal mode of continuing the personality of a corporation, subject of course to modification, according to the written or customary law of the particular institution. But there is unquestionably an element of choice in the mode in which the membership of a corporation is to be continued or increased. We know that in some cases certain persons, especially sons of former members, have, either under the original constitution of the body, or by custom, acquired the privilege of being admitted as of right, and the case with which the pursuer came into Court was a case of that nature—that in respect of being the son of a member he could claim to be admitted into this body as of right. That is a perfectly intelligible case, and, if well founded in fact, is consistent with what we know of the usage of such bodies. But then when we come to the question of fact, on which proof was allowed, the Lord Ordinary has shewn that the case of the pursuer entirely fails, and it was not suggested in the argument addressed to us that the proof contained anything contrary to the Lord Ordinary's opinion. It was admitted that the claim as founded upon birth membership has failed, and now it is sought, for the first time, to press the claim of the pursuer on a very different and more general ground, namely, that in respect of mere membership of the trade or ability to exercise the trade, the pursuer is entitled to be admitted without reference to the wishes, or, I take it, to the past practice of this corporation. Certainly it has not been shewn that the past practice of this corporation recognises any absolute right on the part of non-resident tailors to be admitted members. The records contain instances of individuals, who were non-residents, being admitted to membership, but these instances are not very numerous, and there is nothing to shew that the admission was given as matter of right; the inference is rather, I think, of the opposite character. I am of opinion with your Lordship that the position which is now taken up by the pursuer is really hardly distinguishable from this, that any person is entitled to join this corporation. That does not seem to me to be a relevant statement of qualification at all, and therefore both in respect that it is different from the ground of action set forth on record, and also because it does not appear to me to be a relevant ground of action even if it were there, I am of opinion that the action has failed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordships, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 117. Feb. 21, 1891. Flynn v. M'Gaw.

DAVID FLYNN, Pursuer (Appellant).—Shaw—Salvesen.
WILLIAM M'GAW, Defender (Respondent).—Jameson—Sym.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42)—Relevancy.—In an action of damages raised by a labourer against his employer, a contractor, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the pursuer alleged that in the course of working as a

No. 117.

Feb. 21, 1891.
Flynn v. M'Gaw.

er at the demolition of an old building he fell by part of one of the floors way and received injuries, that he had been employed at the work under rection and superintendence of a foreman, to whose orders he was bound form, that he had been ordered by him to go upon a floor which was weak h age and decay, and through the removal in the course of the work of supports, that he met with the accident by conforming to this order, and e pursuer was not aware of the danger he incurred by obeying this order, e foreman was grossly negligent in giving the order to go upon the floor, he knew or ought to have known was dangerous without guarding against t, or enabling the pursuer to guard against it, and that the foreman was ncompetent to be left in charge of the work, and that his want of skill or contributed to the accident.

l (diss. Lord Young) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

VID FLYNN, labourer, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanark- against William M'Gaw, contractor, Maryhill, for damages for s through the alleged fault of the defender. The pursuer had been defender's employment. The action was laid at common law, and nder the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "The pursuer was at the date of the nt after mentioned, and for about three weeks previously, in the yment of the defender as a labourer." (Cond. 3) "During the of September 1890 defender was in the course of pulling down an ilding at 216 Holm Street, Glasgow, and the pursuer was employed t as a labourer, along with other two men, under the direction and ntendence of Samuel Merrigan, a foreman in the employment of er. The pursuer was bound to conform to the orders and direc- of the said Samuel Merrigan in connection with said work." 4) "On 23d September 1890 pursuer was ordered by the said l Merrigan to go up to the floor of the first flat of said building at Holm Street, and to remove the flooring and joists." (Cond. 5) partition walls of said flat had already been partly taken down, the lime, and rubbish therefrom were left lying upon the floor, and l of the joists which supported said floor, had also been already taken The said work had all been done under the directions of the said l Merrigan." (Cond. 6) "While clearing away the rubbish prepara- lifting the floor, a portion of the floor gave way beneath pursuer, and s in consequence precipitated to the bottom of the building, a ce of nine or ten feet, where he fell upon a quantity of bricks, and ied the injuries after mentioned. The said accident resulted from rsuer having conformed to the orders of the said Samuel Merrigan narrated." (Cond. 7) "The said accident, and the injuries which d to the pursuer therefrom, were due to the fault of the defender, said Samuel Merrigan, for whom the defender is responsible. The n question was in an insecure state, in consequence of its age, and ate of decay into which it had fallen, prior to the operations in on, and it had been rendered still more insecure and dangerous by erations of the defender, under which are included the removal of ists from beneath a portion of it, said removal having taken place instructions of the said Samuel Merrigan, or the defender, who ime to time personally supervised the work. The pursuer was not of the danger he incurred by obeying said order, and he received rning on the subject. It was the duty of the said Samuel Merrigan e first ascertained whether the work which he ordered pursuer to ld safely be carried out before giving him said order. Had he done weakness or defect in the floor would have been discovered and cident would not have occurred. The said Samuel Merrigan was grossly negligent in ordering the pursuer to proceed to do work at a place which he knew, or ought to have known, was insecure and dangerous without in any way guarding against such an accident as occurred, or enabling the pursuer to guard against it." (Cond. 8) "Alternatively, the defender is responsible for the said accident, in respect that the said Samuel Merrigan was quite incompetent to be left in charge of said operations. Had a skilful foreman been put over the job at which the pursuer was engaged, as ought to have been done, owing to the difficulties and dangers connected with it, he would presumably have taken means to guard his gang against dangers, such as those which led to the pursuer's accident. The said Samuel Merrigan was not sufficiently skilled or experienced to be entrusted with the direction of such operations, and his want of skill caused or contributed to the accident to the pursuer."

No. 117. Feb. 21, 1891. Flynn v. M'Gaw.

The defender stated, inter alia, that Samuel Merrigan was employed not as a foreman but as a labourer.

The Sheriff having allowed a proof, the pursuer appealed for jury trial.

The defender argued that the action was irrelevant. It appeared from the pursuer's condescendence that there was no duty on the defender's part to provide a secure flooring. The work was the taking down of an old building, and certain risks were incident to it. Of these the pursuer had as good an opportunity of judging as Merrigan or the defender. It was not said that he did not know about the operations which had been performed, nor what a skilled foreman ought to have done that was undone.

The pursuer argued;—Merrigan was said to be an incompetent man and to have failed in duty, with the result that there was an accident. That alone would make the action relevant.[1] It was also said that the operations had made the floor very insecure, and yet that the pursuer had been ordered to go and work upon it. It could not be assumed against him that he knew of the danger. In any view there was a relevant case under the Employers Liability Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case made by the pursuer is, that he and seven other men, working under charge of a foreman, were engaged in pulling down a ruinous old building, that this was an operation requiring more knowledge and skill than could be expected from an ordinary workman, and that the foreman was the proper person to direct the operations, he having special knowledge and skill. It is also alleged that the master, in appointing the person he did as foreman, appointed a man who was incompetent and unskilled for the work. That is the fault alleged against him, and it is averred that that fault led to the accident. It is rather an unusual averment, because in almost all these cases the pursuer does not dispute the skill of the foreman, and the averment of the defender is that the foreman was quite a competent person, and that the master was justified in appointing him. Now, whether this work of pulling down the old house was a work requiring more skill than could reasonably be expected from the pursuer is a question of fact, and I think also that the question whether the foreman appointed by the master was a person incompetent for the duty assigned to him is also a question of fact.

The case is no doubt a narrow one, but I do not think that I would have excluded inquiry in this case even if that averment of the incompetency of the foreman had not been upon record, because the pursuer avers that he was bound to conform to the orders of the foreman, who knew that the place he was set

[1] M'Aulay v. Brownlie, March 9, 1860, 22 D. 975, 32 Scot. Jur. 415.

No. 117.

Feb. 21, 1891.
Flynn v. M'Gaw.

to was insecure, which he himself did not. He was sent up to help in taking down this storey of the house, and while he was doing some necessary preliminary work of clearing away lime and rubbish he fell through the flooring. The question whether the person who sent him up was a foreman in the sense of the Employers Liability Act is also a question of fact.

I must say I think that in cases of this kind, where the Sheriff has granted an inquiry, it is unfortunate that the pursuer should bring the case here, and ask for the much more expensive form of inquiry by jury trial; but I see no ground to refuse the pursuer an issue.

LORD YOUNG.—I am bound to say that I think this case as stated is irrelevant, and ought not to be submitted to a jury.

In the first place, I take the case as it is presented to us at common law. The parties are at issue whether a certain person was a foreman or whether he was a labourer. The statement of the pursuer is, that he and two other men, under the direction of a foreman, had been engaged for a period of three weeks in taking down this old building. The defender says that there were four labourers engaged, and that the pursuer, who was one of them, had as much skill as any of the others, and was as well qualified as they to look out for himself. Now, whether this man Merrigan was a foreman or not, the pursuer has not stated any case against the master so as to make him liable, because he has not averred any ground upon which he thinks a more experienced foreman should have been appointed over the work. If one workman or a number of workmen accept the contract with a master that they shall pull down a ruinous old building, and one of them is injured in the course of carrying out the work, I do not think that he has any ground for an action at common law against the master because he did not appoint a skilled foreman to superintend the work which the men had contracted to do.

I can understand a workman making some such accusation as this in a very special case, that he had been led into going on with the work, having been deceived into the idea that he was going to work under a skilled foreman, whereas in fact the man put over him as foreman was not really a skilled man at all. But that is not the case here. The pursuer had been engaged with Merrigan in this job for some weeks, and there is no suggestion upon the record that he had been deceived into the belief that Merrigan was a specially skilled man in matters of this sort. I think that no blame can be attributed to the master for any failure in his duty as a master to provide a specially skilled foreman for this job, and therefore I think that there is no relevant case of fault alleged against Merrigan, one of the four labourers who were engaged.

Then a point was made that Merrigan was a person to whose orders the pursuer was bound to conform. No doubt the language in the Act of Parliament is very loose and general language, but I cannot read that language as meaning that whenever the master has appointed one of the workmen as foreman over the others, and the foreman gives a perfectly general order to his men to go on with their work, that the master shall be responsible for any accident which may happen in the course of the work. I think that that provision applies only to the case where one is acting as a deputy-master, whose orders are given as if they were the master's own orders, and who is giving a special order to the workmen which is being specially obeyed. Here no special order had been given, but merely a general order to go on with the work. Looking to the sum and

No. 117. substance of the whole case, I think that no relevant case has been averred either at common law or under the statute.

Feb. 21, 1891. Flynn v. M'Gaw.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I do not think that it would be safe to exclude inquiry in this case, and therefore I think the case must go to a jury.

LORD TRAYNER.—The question before us is one of relevancy only, and in the consideration of such a question I think it is impossible to keep too strictly to the pursuer's averments. The question is, whether if these are true the pursuer has not stated enough to entitle him to the remedy he seeks. I confess I think the record narrow, but I cannot say that, assuming the truth of the pursuer's averments, it is so irrelevant that he has put himself out of Court.

THE COURT granted an issue.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 118. SAMUEL HENRY RAMSBOTHAM, First Party.—Asher—Johnston—Dundas.

Feb. 25, 1891. Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited. THE SCOTTISH AMERICAN INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, Second Party.—D.-F. Balfour—Lorimer.

Process—Special case—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 63.—Held that a special case between a limited company and one of its shareholders for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the question whether special resolutions of the company creating preference shares were ultra vires, was a competent form of process, as the question raised might have been tried between the same parties in another form of process.

Company—Creation of preference shares by company—Ultra vires—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 12.—The memorandum of association of a company registered under the Companies Act, 1862, and limited by shares, provided that the capital of the company should be £1,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each. The articles of association provided that the company might, by special resolution, increase the capital, and might "determine the conditions on which such increase shall be made, the number and amount of the shares into which such increased capital shall be divided, and the time, mode, and terms at, and according to which, such last-mentioned shares shall be issued, and how the premium, if any, on such shares shall be applied." Held that a special resolution of the company to increase the capital of the company by the creation of preference shares was ultra vires.

1ST DIVISION. C. THE SCOTTISH AMERICAN INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, and was registered on 29th March 1873.

The fifth head of its memorandum of association provided that "the nominal capital of the company is £1,000,000, divided in 100,000 shares of £10 each."

The articles of association contained, under the title "Capital and Increase thereof," the following provisions:—"28. The original capital shall be £1,000,000 sterling, divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each; but the company, with the sanction of a general meeting of the members to be specially convened for that purpose, may from time to time increase such capital to any amount that may be determined by such meeting. Such general meeting, or any subsequent general meeting, may determine the conditions on which such increase shall be made, the number and amount of the shares into which such increased capital shall be divided, and the time, mode, and terms at and according to which such last-mentioned shares shall be issued, and how the premium, if any, on such shares

No. 118.

Feb. 25, 1891.
Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited.

be applied, and all new shares so created shall be offered to the ng members in proportion to the existing shares held by them, or as is may be."

March 1875 the capital of the company was increased by special tion to £2,000,000, and the memorandum and articles were altered lingly.

an extraordinary general meeting of the company, held on 11th nber, confirmed at another meeting held on 30th December 1890, llowing special resolutions were passed, inter alia:—

That the capital of the company be increased to £2,400,000 by the on of 200,000 shares of £2 each, entitled to a fixed cumulative pre- ial dividend of 4½ per cent per annum, but to no further or other ipation in the profits of the company.

. That the following changes be made in the memorandum and es of association, viz.:—

) That article 5 of the memorandum of association as altered by l resolution be deleted, and the following substituted in place f:—The nominal capital of the company is £2,400,000, divided 00,000 preference shares of £2 each, entitled to a fixed cumulative ential dividend of 4½ per cent per annum, and into 200,000 ordi- shares of £10 each. Any shares when fully paid may be converted tock by resolution of the shareholders in general meeting."

') That article 28 of the articles of association as altered by special tion be deleted, and the following substituted in place thereof:— apital of the company shall be £2,400,000 sterling, divided into 00 preference shares of £2 each, and into 200,000 ordinary shares of ach. The preference shares shall be entitled to a fixed preferential lative dividend at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, before any nd is paid on the ordinary shares, and to priority in repayment of l, but shall in no case be entitled to participate in surplus assets; he company may (if it see fit), convert its shares, or any portion or thereof, when fully paid, into stock: The company may, further, ime to time, increase its capital to any amount that may be deter- l by the shareholders in general meeting."

Samuel Henry Ramsbotham, a shareholder in the company, inti- to the company that he objected to this proposed creation and of preference shares as ultra vires both of the directors and of the ny.

pecial case was thereupon presented, Dr Ramsbotham being the first and the company the second party.

e question of law was:—"Whether the increase of the capital of the sh American Investment Company, Limited, by the creation of 00 shares of £2 each, entitled to a fixed preferential cumulative nd at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum before any dividend is paid e ordinary shares, and to priority in repayment of capital, but with ht to participate in surplus assets, is within the powers of the com- and whether the special resolutions of December 1890, so far as they rt to increase the capital by the creation of such shares, are valid?"

en the case was called in the Single Bills on 9th January 1891 doubt was suggested from the bench as to the competency of the on the ground that the question raised was one which affected the e body of shareholders, whereas the parties to the case were the com- and only a single shareholder.

rimer, for the parties, cited the Parochial Board of Bothwell v. Pearson,[1] [1] Feb. 6, 1873, 11 Macph. 399, 45 Scot. Jur. 264.

No. 118.

Feb. 25, 1891. Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited.

and contended that the case fell within the rule there laid down, viz., that where the question raised could have been tried between the parties in another form of process a special case was competent. Special cases analogous to the present had recently been considered without objection.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I rather think that Mr Lorimer is right in saying that the present case stands the test of which he spoke, for I think the second party, although only a single shareholder, might have challenged the proceedings of the company by a suspension or a declarator, and therefore I think that the case is one which complies with the provisions of the 63d section of the Court of Session Act.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

The case was sent to the roll.

At the hearing on the merits the second party argued;—The 5th head of the memorandum of association, and articles 28 and 29 of the articles of association, taken along with the 12th section of the Companies Act, 1862* gave the company power to create preference shares. The memorandum of association was no doubt in a general sense the charter of the company, but nevertheless the memorandum and the articles were contemporaneous documents, to be read together, and the articles might legitimately be used to explain the memorandum as to matters on which it was ambiguous or silent.[2] Now, so using the articles the company had power to increase its capital, and to determine the "conditions" of such increase. "Conditions" was a word of wide import; it described the whole elements which went to the constitution of the company, and among such conditions there might well be included a provision that new capital should be issued on the footing of a preference over the old, and it had so been held in England in Harrison's case.[2]

Argued for the first party;—An essential principle of all companies under the Companies Acts was that of equality among the shareholders in the matter of dividends, unless there was a clear stipulation to the contrary in the memorandum and articles of association. If they were silent on the subject, it was ultra vires of the company to derogate from that principle of equality by creating and issuing preference shares. There might be some difficulty in reconciling the English authorities on other matters, but they were at one on this rule of presumed equality

---

[1] Bruce v. Ratepayers of Fordoun, March 7, 1889, 16 R. 563; Police Commissioners of Kirkintilloch v. M'Donald, Oct. 31, 1890, supra, p. 67.

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 12, enacts,—"Any company limited by shares may so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum of association, if authorised to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution in manner hereinafter mentioned, as to increase its capital, by the issue of new shares of such amount as it thinks expedient, or to consolidate and divide its capital into shares of larger amount than its existing shares, or to convert its paid-up shares into stock, but, save as aforesaid, and save as is hereinafter provided in the case of a change of name, no alteration shall be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association."

[2] Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., 1875, L. R., 19 Eq. 358; South Durham Brewery Co., 1885, L. R., 31 Chanc. Div. 261.

[3] Ashbury v. Watson, 1883, L. R., 30 Chanc. Div. 376, per Lord Esher, M. R. at p. 381; Harrison, supra, per Jessel, M. R., at p. 366.

No. 118.

Feb. 25, 1891.
Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited.

sent case was ruled by the cases of Hutton[1] and Ashbury.[2] It was t it might be a "condition" in the sense of article 29 that the pital should have a preference. The word "condition" had never d this wide meaning. In the cases founded on as shewing that it vider meaning, it was collocated with "privileges" or "priorities," se cases[3] expressly recognised the authority of the cases of Hutton hbury.

PRESIDENT.—The fifth head of the memorandum of association of this y provides,—"The nominal capital of the company is £1,000,000 into 100,000 shares of £10 each."
that undoubtedly suggests an equality of interest in all the shareholders, re does not appear to be anything in the articles of association, which temporaneous with the memorandum of association, which in any way from that equality of interest.
28th section of the articles of association declares,—"The original capital one million pounds sterling divided into one hundred thousand shares pounds each, but the company, with the sanction of a general meeting members to be specially convened for that purpose, may from time to crease such capital to any amount that may be determined by such meet-
That is precisely in accordance with the 5th head of the memorandum ciation which I have read, and certainly imports no variation of that which appears upon the face of the memorandum of association.
e immediately, however, follows in the articles a clause (29) which de-—"Such general meeting, or any subsequent general meeting, may deter-he conditions on which such increase shall be made, the number and of the shares into which such increased capital shall be divided, and e, mode, and terms at and according to which such last mentioned shares issued, and how the premium, if any, on such shares shall be applied, new shares so created shall be offered to the existing members, in proto the existing shares held by them, or as near as may be."
it is said that that imports that a general meeting called in terms of cles of association may determine the conditions upon which an increase tal may be made, in this sense, that it may make it a "condition" of crease that the new capital shall have a preference over the old.
appears to me to be an unreasonable construction of the word "con-
A "condition," in the ordinary and literal sense of the word, imports tion of a right, and not an extension, priority, or privilege, and I can see in the 29th article which suggests that the word is to receive any other ordinary meaning.
pears to me therefore that the word is to be read in its ordinary sense.
mpany are to determine at a general meeting when, where, and how the ares are to be paid for, and whether the shareholders are to participate in end at a particular time or date, but to interpret the word "condition" ning anything of the nature of a privilege or priority over the other would be to depart from the ordinary meaning of the word, and accordtton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., 1865, 2 Dr. and Sm. 514 and 521.

---

hbury v. Watson, supra.
rrison v. Mexican Railway Co., supra; South Durham Brewery Co.,

No. 118.

Feb. 25, 1891.
Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited.

ingly it is a reading which I am not prepared to adopt. I therefore think that the powers given by article 29 of the articles of association do not in any way conflict with the 5th head of the memorandum of association, or confer any power on the company to create preference shares.

What, then, have the company done? We find that they came to a resolution on 11th December 1890, confirmed on 30th December of the same year, that "the capital of the company be increased to £2,400,000 by the creation of £200,000 shares of £2 each, entitled to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend of 4½ per cent per annum, but to no further or other participation in the profits of the company."

Now, for the reasons which I have stated, and applying my mind as best I can to the statements of the case, the resolution appears to me to be entirely beyond the powers of the company, and altogether illegal. I am therefore for answering the question in the negative.

LORD ADAM.—In the case of a limited company, as we all know, certain things are required to be set forth in the memorandum of association which cannot be altered except to a limited and modified extent.

The fifth clause of the memorandum of association of this company is as follows:—"The nominal capital of the company is £1,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each." This clause may be modified, but only to the extent and under authority of the 12th section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), which enacts,—"Any company limited by shares may so far modify the conditions contained in the memorandum of association, if authorised to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution in manner hereinafter mentioned, as to increase its capital by the issue of new shares of such amount as it thinks expedient, or to consolidate and divide its capital into shares of larger amount than its existing shares, or to convert its paid-up shares into stock."

Now, had the question occurred for the first time, I should, I confess, have entertained doubts as to whether the resolution, not merely to increase capital and consolidate and convert, but to issue new shares upon terms altogether different from those applicable to the original issue, was competent under the 12th section of the Act, although power to issue such shares might be contained in the articles of association but not in the memorandum. One cannot, however, avoid seeing that the English cases cited to us have treated the memorandum of association and the articles of association as contemporaneous documents which should be read together and not separately, and therefore a clear and distinct power to create preference shares, though contained in the articles of association only, would probably be sufficient to warrant such a resolution as the one in question here.

I agree with your Lordship that the words of the 5th clause of the memorandum imply equality of interest in all the shareholders, and I come to the opinion upon a construction of the words and upon the principle which underlies the cases cited to us, which is that equality in benefit is necessarily to be implied, and is not to be displaced unless there is a clear stipulation to the contrary.

I can find nothing in the 29th clause of the articles (in which the power given by the 12th section of the Act is embodied) to subvert the necessary implication of equality of interest in the shareholders.

No. 118.

Feb. 25, 1891. Ramsbotham v. Scottish American Investment Co., Limited.

t the cases quoted to us were different from the present. In one of find not only the word "conditions" but also the word "privileges," word implies priority. Then in another case the words were "special and priority."

absence of such words clearly implying a change in the equality of any, I am of opinion that the resolution was ultra vires and illegal.

M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

E, BELL, & BANNERMAN, W.S.—MENZIES, BLACK, & MENZIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 119.

Feb. 26, 1891. Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

HAWORTH & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—J. A. Reid—Ferguson.

SS AND ACCIDENT ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Lorimer—W. C. Smith.

ner—Contract—Conditions—Guarantee for servant's fidelity—Failure to use checks stipulated for.—An assurance association entered into a vith a merchant and a traveller employed by him by which the associa- ed, on payment of a premium, to guarantee the employer to a certain gainst loss by embezzlement on the part of the traveller. The contract that the employer had delivered to the association a proposal containing atements, and a declaration setting forth, inter alia, "the checks to be n" the traveller's "accounts, and has consented that such proposal ration, and each of the statements therein referred to or contained, the basis of the contract," "and this agreement is granted on the that the business of the employer shall be conducted in every parti- ccordance with the said proposal, statements, and declaration, except consent of the association in writing." The proposal referred to con- e following questions to and answers by the employer:—"(Q.) How l the employer balance and settle the applicant's accounts? (A.) (Q.) Specify the checks which the employer will use to secure in the applicant's accounts. (A.) Statements sent to customers by (Q.) In particular, will the employer send accounts direct to cus- nd if so, how often? (A.) Every three months."

action by the employer against the association for payment of the f a sum embezzled by the traveller, it was proved in defence that no settlements had been made between the employer and the traveller, the practice had been that, at the end of three months from the date der, the employer sent the account, not to the customer direct, but to ller himself for collection.

hat the employer had failed to comply with the conditions of the con- l that the defenders were not liable.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Stormonth Darling. J.

RS JOSEPH HAWORTH & COMPANY, tea-merchants in Manchester, is action against the Sickness and Accident Assurance Associa- nited, Edinburgh, for payment, under a contract of guarantee, of s. 10d. alleged to have been embezzled by Richard Slater, a , formerly employed by them.

efenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having failed to checks upon Slater for the protection of the defenders stipulated agreed to in the contract of guarantee, the defenders are not liable, uld be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

greement of guarantee entered into between Messrs Haworth & y, Slater, and the association, in July 1889, narrated,—"Whereas loyer has delivered to the association a proposal containing certain statements, and a declaration setting forth, among other things, th duties and remuneration of the said employed, the moneys to be entruste to him, and the checks to be kept upon his accounts, and has consente that such proposal and declaration, and each of the statements therei referred to, or contained, shall form the basis of the contract hereinafte set forth," and, after narrating the payment of the yearly premiu further bore,—"Now it is hereby agreed that, relying on the truth the said proposal, statements, and declaration, and on the strict observan and performance by the said employer of the contract hereby made, a subject to the conditions herein contained, the association, during o year from the date hereof, . . . shall make good and reimburse the employer, to the extent of the sum of £250, and no further, all mone which the employed, in connection with the duties hereinbefore refer to, shall embezzle or fraudulently appropriate and apply. . . . A this agreement is granted on the condition that the business of the e ployer shall be conducted, and the duties and remuneration of the e ployed shall remain in every particular in accordance with the propo statements, and declaration hereinbefore referred to; and if during t continuance of this agreement any circumstance shall occur or cha be made which shall have the effect of making the actual facts differ fro such statements without notice thereof being given to the association, the consent and approval in writing of the association being obtained, any suppression or misstatement of any fact affecting the risk of t association be made at the time of payment of the first or any subseq premium, or if the employer shall continue to trust the employed w money after having discovered, or after having received notice of, having reasonable cause of suspicion of any act of embezzlement or a propriation as aforesaid, or of any act of dishonesty whatever, this ag ment shall be void."

No. 119.

Feb. 26, 1891.
Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

The proposal, &c., referred to in the contract contained, inter alia, th questions as to the checks to be kept by Haworth & Company upon Sla These, with the answers, were as follows:—"(11) How often will employer balance and settle the applicant's accounts? (Ans.) Mont (12) Specify the checks which the employer will use to secure acc in the applicant's accounts. (Ans.) Statements sent to customers employer. (13) In particular, will the employer send accounts dire customers, and if so, how often? (Ans.) Every three months."

Appended to the proposal was this declaration signed by Haworth & Company and by Slater,—"We declare that the answers forth above are true and in conformity with fact, and we agree that th accuracy shall form the basis of the contract with the association."

At the end of December 1889 Slater was dismissed by his employ He was subsequently found to have embezzled money belonging to to the amount of £87, 11s. 10d.

The defenders alleged, inter alia, that the pursuers had failed to s out statements direct to their customers, and to balance and settle accou with Slater monthly.

A proof was allowed, from which it appeared that Slater's defalcati began with an order received from a customer named Moran on August, and took place with regard to twenty-two orders dated in S tember, October, November, and December. The goods contained in th orders were sold on three months' credit, and the manner in which Sl embezzled the money was that he went to the customers within the per of credit and uplifted and appropriated the sums in their accounts. duty was to pay into Haworth & Company's bank sums which he upli and send in cash sheets shewing them, which were compared by the cas

No. 119.

Feb. 26, 1891.
Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

he bank's advice notes, and this he had not done in the case of the mbezzled.

ettlement of the commission which Slater received for his work nor ation of his accounts had ever taken place between Haworth & ny and Slater, because the latter was always indebted to the former ances to account of commission which he had requested.

ppeared that Haworth & Company never sent accounts direct to stomers till after Slater had left their service. They followed their y custom in business, which was to send the accounts to Slater at l of the three months' credit.* At 1st January 1890, three days Slater was dismissed as an inefficient traveller, and before his defal- were known, statements of the accounts of his customers as they n Haworth's ledgers, and bearing reference to Haworth's "quarterly were sent out to customers, many of whom then intimated that ccounts had been paid to Slater.

Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 26th November 1890, d against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of £85, † worth, the sole partner, deponed,—"In the conduct of my business I send nts of accounts direct to customers only when they are considerably over- when I have any doubt as to the solvency of the customers. Before I com- e directly with them, the accounts are sent to my travellers, and are by esented to the customers. . . . (Q.) Supposing you had sent the accounts the customers, would that have been any check upon Slater's honesty? t necessarily so. When he had authority to collect the accounts, I don't made the least difference as regards embezzlement whether the accounts ssed through him or sent direct to the customers. In either case, the r would get notice of the sum due, and pay it to Slater. When accounts due more than three months, it depends entirely upon who the customer ong it would be before I would communicate directly with him. In the person in good credit, I should not think of pressing him and requesting ayment till the account was five or six months old. Cross.— . . . With e to my reply to question 13 in the proposal—'Will the employer send s direct to customers, and if so, how often?'—I meant that they were ect to the customers through the traveller. (Q.) How do you come to an employer is sending accounts direct to the customer if he is sending rough the traveller? (A.) Because it is the custom of the trade, and we llow the custom. (Q.) And not the terms of the contract? (A.) I con- nave followed the terms of the contract in adhering to the custom. The f sending a statement direct from the employer to the customer is to the money. (Q.) Has it nothing to do with being a check upon the r? (A.) No, not unless we have received ground for suspicion, and it is ked upon in that sense. (Q.) Did you not understand you required to he checks which were stipulated in this policy? (A.) I applied the strictly to the letter, in the ordinary way of business. As soon as accounts due the statements were furnished for collection; we did not post them and I never contemplated that in answering these questions. . . . . eference to my answer to the question in the proposal—'How often will ployer balance and settle the applicant's accounts?'—those accounts refer mission only, and he was always in my debt, so there was practically to settle. My answer did not apply to accounts. I made up a state- hich contains his commission account for settlement at the end of the (Q.) When did you first ask him to make up a statement of his commis- count? (A.) He does not make up a statement at all; we keep the books ake up a statement. I never asked Slater before the 20th of December me a statement of the accounts he had received."

---

OPINION.— . . . The first order in the list of defalcations (No. 220

No. 119.

Feb. 26, 1891.
Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The object of the questions put by them before the guarantee was given, which, with the answers, formed of process), was taken on 14th August, and the amount (£8, 14s. 6d.) was collected by Slater on 16th September. This was nearly two months before the sum was due, for all the goods were bought on three months' credit. The remaining orders were taken from time to time down to 14th December, and the amounts uplifted, in the majority of cases, much within the period of credit. Slater's remuneration (besides a nominal salary of £5) was to consist of a commission of half the net profits; but no settlement of this commission took place between him and the pursuer, monthly or otherwise, the reason being, as the pursuer explains, that he was always in advance to Slater, and accordingly there was nothing to settle. It appears from the correspondence that accounts were sent by the pursuer to Slater for collection at or about the expiry of the three months' credit, but no accounts applicable to any of the orders obtained by him were sent direct to the customers till 1st January 1890.

"The pursuer's explanation of this is that he never sent accounts direct to customers until they were overdue, and that customers would have resented it if he had. He also says that his only departure from that rule was in the case of the statements sent to Slater's customers on 1st January, the reason being that he had by that time resolved to dismiss him.

"As regards the absence of monthly settlement of Slater's accounts, it seems to me that the pursuer's explanation is sufficient.

"It cannot be said that, in the actual circumstances, a monthly settlement would have led to the detection of any of Slater's embezzlements, and I think that the undertaking so to settle meant nothing more than that he was to remit his commission, if any should be due, at monthly intervals. So far as payments by Slater were concerned, the system was that he should pay sums collected by him into the pursuer's bank account, and should send the pursuer cash-sheets which, when compared with the bank's advice notes, would shew how far he was in the pursuer's debt. He did make certain payments into bank, and did forward certain cash-sheets, and the correspondence shews that the pursuer was constantly urging him to be more active both in obtaining orders and remitting money. But, of course, no statements by him nor settlements with him could throw any light on intromissions of his which he deliberately suppressed, and I think, therefore, that the defenders are not relieved from liability by the want of formal monthly settlements, which in the circumstances could have done no possible good.

"It is a much more difficult question whether the pursuer has lost his remedy by a breach of his undertaking to send statements direct to customers every three months. But there also, though not without hesitation, my opinion is in favour of the pursuer.

"I assent to the defenders' doctrine that answers 12 and 13 were not mere vague representations of how the pursuer's business was likely to be carried on, but constituted a positive undertaking by the pursuer that he would send statements direct to customers every three months as a check on Slater's conduct. Nor can I accept the view suggested by the pursuer himself in his evidence that he sufficiently fulfilled this undertaking by sending statements through Slater. The statements, if they were to be of any value as a check, clearly required to be sent direct. But the expression, "every three months," is ambiguous. It might mean, and the defenders contended it did mean, on the first quarter-day occurring after the date of the order. Thus they say that the statement applicable to Moran's order of 14th August should have been sent out on 1st October. On the other hand, it might mean three months complete from the date of each order, in which case Moran's statement should have been sent out on 14th November. Again, it might mean on the first quarter-day occurring three full months after the date of the order, in which case Moran's statement did not require to be sent out till it actually was sent out, viz., on the 1st of January. I reject the first of these interpretations, because I do not think the words justify it, and because I fail to see what check it would afford in the

No. 119.

Feb. 26, 1891.
Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

s of the contract, was to ascertain what checks the employers would prevent or detect defalcations by Slater. They undertook by their to the defenders' questions to balance and settle accounts with him ly," and to use the "check" of "statements sent by the employers ustomers direct every three months." It was certain that none of recautions was taken. The Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeded case to send a statement to the customer before the account was due. te true that Slater, by importunity or contrivance of some sort, did get of most of his accounts before they were due; but I think that the of a stipulation of this kind must be taken with reference to the length given in the particular trade, and that the check was much more likely ectual if the statement was to be sent after the time when the salesman irly be expected to have received the money. It would, in that case, ertainly draw from the customer the explanation that he had already account; while, in the other case, he would not require to take any it at all. For the same reason, I think it unlikely that the expression hree months' was used or understood in the sense that an account e sent out on the exact expiry of three months from the date of each The average amount of the orders is apparently not more than a few and such a course would mean a constant sending out of very small , with the probability, as in the case last supposed, that it would not any useful information from the customer. I come, therefore, to the on that the most reasonable interpretation of the undertaking is that accounts were to be sent direct to the customers, but not till the were due. If that is even a possible interpretation, I think the pur- ntitled to the benefit of it; for if the defenders understood it in a differ- e, and intended to exact a strict performance of it, they were bound to all ambiguity at the time.

re is some confusion in the proof as to what the pursuer's practice was ard to the time of sending out his quarterly statements. He says that o fixed quarter-days, but I rather think that in saying so he must have his mind the accounts which he sent to his salesman for collection, ndoubtedly were sent at various periods occurring on the termination of e months' credit. I agree with the defenders that the lithographed and especially the phrase 'quarterly audit,' together with such indica- practice as are to be found in the correspondence, all point to the con- hat the statements sent to the customers were sent on fixed quarter- But if the defenders were not prepared to accept the pursuer's explana- t he never sent these statements in the ordinary case till the items were they might have brought evidence to shew that the statements did, in fact, include items which were not yet due. In the absence of such , I must accept the pursuer's explanation.

umber of cases were cited to me, but I do not think that the legal prin- pplicable to the case are doubtful. No assistance is to be derived from ke Weems v. Standard Life Assurance Company, 11 R. 658 (H. L. 48), urn on the question whether statements applicable to existing facts are nature of representation or warranty. The answers here on which the rs rely were undoubtedly of a different kind, and imported an under- for the future. I do not doubt that these answers were part of the , and that the pursuer was bound by them in the sense explained by ood in British Guarantee Association v. Western Bank, 15 D. 834 (at , 25 Scot. Jur. 502, viz., that the undertaking was one 'not requiring performance to the letter, but only that it should be substantially ented or fulfilled.' This is in accordance with the ratio decidendi English case of Benham, 1852, 7 Welsby, H. and G. 744. But my is really founded on what seems to me the reasonable interpretation undertaking, and if so, there can be no doubt that it was sufficiently ful-

No. 119.

Feb. 26, 1891. Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

on the footing that they had not. His Lordship discussed the meaning of the expression "every three months." But in no view of the expression had the thing stipulated for been done. The pursuers' own construction of it would admit of five months, or even more, intervening between the order and the sending of a statement of account direct to the customer. If on 1st October the pursuers had sent out a quarterly account to customers who ordered goods in the course of three months before it, the fraud of Slater would have been discovered. Instead of that, it was not discovered till January thereafter. It was enough for the defenders, in any view, that the condition on which the pursuers obtained their guarantee was not observed.

The pursuers argued;—The Lord Ordinary's judgment was right. As there were no commissions due to Slater, monthly settlements were unnecessary. But if they had been made, the embezzlement would not have been discovered. As to sending accounts direct to customers every three months, that did not mean sending them within three months of the orders they gave. Thus the first embezzlement was on Moran's order in August. The pursuers' duty could not be to send an account direct to him on 1st October, within three months of his order, and thus within the period of credit. That would only offend a customer. And if it had been done it would not have elicited the truth, as Slater had authority to collect accounts. The expression really imported, at the first quarterly audit within three months after the period of three months' credit expired. That had been done on 1st January, and the fraud had been discovered. If that was a fair view, the policy must be so construed, because, if ambiguous, it was to be construed against the insurer. It was not a condition precedent of the policy that the answers to the questions should be strictly carried out according to their terms. They were expressions of intention which need only be carried out according to their fair meaning.[1]

Lord Young.—The legal question before us arises on what is sometimes called a guarantee policy. The policy was issued after the employer of the defaulting traveller had made a proposal to the company, which took the form of certain questions and answers, which form the basis of the contract. The important part of these questions and answers is that in which the insurance company ask and the employer states the checks which he is to use to prevent the traveller whose honesty is to be guaranteed, from embezzling his funds. Of these there have been specially brought before us, one, the eleventh, in which, in answer to the question, "How often will the employer balance and settle the applicant's accounts?" the answer "monthly" is given; the other, the thirteenth, in which, in answer to the question, "In particular, will the employer send accounts direct to customers, and, if so, how often?" the employer answers, "Every three months,"—that is to say, those customers who are not reported to him as having paid their accounts are to have their accounts sent to them regularly and direct every three months. That is intended to check the traveller if he is disposed to embezzle his employer's funds by uplifting money and not account for it.

Now, neither of these tests was applied. The employer did not call traveller to account every month, and he did not directly render accounts every three months, in any fair meaning of that expression. The only question, then, is, whether that is an answer to this claim upon the policy. It is almost with regret that I say that I think it is. I think that this employer acted in good faith and with no idea at all of neglecting the reasonable interest of the insurers. But he did in fact neglect to take both the steps which it was provided that he should take, and I am of opinion that that neglect forms a good answer to this action, and, therefore, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be recalled, and that the defenders must be assoilzied.

[1] M'Taggart v. Watson, April 16, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. 553, Lord Brougham's opinion; Benham v. United Guarantee and Life Assurance Co., 1852, 7 W. and G. 744.

No. 119.
Feb. 26, 1891.
Haworth & Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defenders.

FYFE, IRELAND, & DANGERFIELD, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

GILROY, SONS, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Asher—Dickson.
W. R. PRICE & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—D.-F. Balfour—Aitken.

No. 120.
Feb. 27, 1891.
Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

Ship—Affreightment—Bill of lading—Exemption of liability for shipowner for default of crew in the "navigation" of the ship.—Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which exempted the shipowner from liability for "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilot, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage." The goods were damaged in consequence of the absence of casing on the pipe of a water-closet, which was broken by the pressure of the cargo in rough weather. It was proved that the master and crew had, shortly before the ship sailed with the cargo in question, removed the casing, and had thought it unnecessary to replace it before sailing, as they relied on other means for protecting the pipe from injury. In an action at the instance of an onerous indorsee of the bill of lading against the owners held that the pipe ought to have been provided with casing, that the failure to provide it was a default of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage, and therefore that the shipowner was not liable.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

MESSRS GILROY, SONS, & COMPANY, Dundee, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Messrs Price & Company, the owners of the ship "Tilkhurst," to recover damages for injury done by sea-water to a cargo of jute on a voyage from Chittagong to Dundee. The pursuers were onerous indorsees of a bill of lading under which the defenders accepted the jute as shipped in good order and condition, and undertook to deliver it at Dundee in like good order and condition, "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilot, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature and kind excepted."

There was no dispute that the cargo had been damaged owing to the breaking off of the discharge-pipe of the water-closet, and the consequent influx of sea-water into the cargo.

The pursuers averred that the "vessel when she sailed from Chittagong on 5th December 1888 was not in a seaworthy condition; said pipe was then cracked or otherwise faulty. It had no casing such as is usually put round such pipes, and is necessary for their safety. In consequence, the pipe had been injured by pressure from the cargo, or otherwise got

No. 120.
Feb. 27, 1891.
Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

injury, which would not have happened if the casing had been there. The damage to said cargo was caused in consequence of the defective state of the pipe and/or the want of said casing."

The defenders denied this averment, and stated that the "pipe was in perfect order when the vessel left Chittagong, and that the cargo was stowed and secured in such a way that the pipe could receive no injury therefrom or be injured from the inside of the ship."

They stated with regard to the cause of the breaking of the pipe that the vessel had encountered a severe gale and a very heavy sea on 11th, 12th, and 13th December, by which she was much strained and injured in certain particulars:—"The vessel made no water until the occurrence of the foresaid gale. After that gale water was found in her, and on investigation it was discovered that during the gale the force of the sea, and the working, straining, and labouring of the ship, or one or other of these causes, had broken the iron portion of the port water-closet discharge pipe at the flange, on the ship's side."

The defenders further founded upon the exception clause in the bill of lading which is quoted above, and they pleaded, inter alia;—(3) In any view, the damage having emerged through one or other of the perils excepted from the contract, the defenders should be assoilzied.

A proof was led. It appeared the "Tilkhurst" sailed from Cardiff in 1888 on a voyage to Acheen with coals, thence to Chittagong in ballast, and thence to Dundee, with a cargo of jute.

On 11th, 12th, and 13th December, about a week after leaving Chittagong, the ship encountered heavy weather. It was found, inter alia, that water had got into the cargo at a water-closet pipe on the port side. She put into Galle for survey, and the cargo (except part which had been jettisoned, and part which had been too much damaged) was dried and repacked.

It also appeared that the pipe in question, which was partly lead and partly iron, was not provided at the time the ship left Chittagong with any casing or protection round it to prevent the pressure of cargo upon it. The casing was taken off between Acheen and Chittagong, when the ship was being painted, and was not replaced. There was much skilled evidence to shew that such casing was both usual and necessary, and that the bales of jute, though packed tightly, were apt to yield somewhat in heavy weather with the motion of the ship, and that the injury to the pipe, which took place at a flange where the leaden part joined the iron part some feet within the skin of the ship, had resulted from the pressure of the cargo upon the pipe. Another view, however, suggested by these witnesses was that the pipe, for want of casing, might have been broken when the stevedores were putting in the cargo by their bringing a bale against it.

The defenders led evidence to shew that the pipe had probably been broken by the shock of a heavy sea striking the vessel during the gale, and not by the cargo, which had been kept entirely off the pipe by dunnage, and in particular by pieces of wood called "toms" so placed upon the framework with which the hold was lined as to keep the jute bales off the pipes. The master and crew thought that a sufficient and proper mode of stowage, and that no casing was needed. The defenders also maintained that the cargo was too tightly packed to shift and so loosen these "toms" and press against the pipe. The Court came to the conclusion on the evidence, which is discussed in the opinion of Lord Trayner, infra, that the injury was caused by pressure of the cargo on the pipe during the voyage.

On 18th July 1890, the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) found that the

No. 120.

Feb. 27, 1891. Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

ers had not proved that their failure to deliver the jute in good nd condition was due to any cause for which they were not respon- nd by a subsequent interlocutor gave judgment for £3407, 11s. 9d., he amount agreed on as the damage sustained.
defenders appealed to the Court of Session.
ued for the defenders;—The defenders were not liable if the case came the exceptions in the bill of lading. One of these was perils of the . It was proved that the ship was seaworthy when she left Chitta- The precaution of casing the pipes was not universal, and the ques- s whether proper means by casing or otherwise were taken to keep go from impinging on the pipes. Now, "tomming" was the mode nd if thoroughly done it was quite as good. The ship being sea- when she left Chittagong and having encountered very heavy he injury to the cargo by sea water was prima facie caused by ess of weather, and the defenders had displaced the presumption from the fact of the delivery of the cargo in a damaged state.[1] The hewed that the ship had been severely strained by the weather. t in any view the defenders were protected by the other clause, exempted them from liability for fault of the "master or crew in igation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage." If the t arose from the want of casing or from defective "tomming" the and crew were to blame for that, and the exception applied. It ault in navigation by them, for that expression included omissions the departure of the ship on her voyage and during the prepara- it.[2] pursuers argued;—The cause of the accident was proved to be that e had no casing, and that the natural pressure of the cargo during weather broke it. If, as the defenders said, the violence of the sea ithout had broken the pipe, it was proved that the ship would have other and greater marks of injury than she did shew. The ship erefore unseaworthy when she left Chittagong. The case was like Steel & Craig[3] where a ship sailed with a porthole open, which let r and injured the wheat she carried. The fault of not casing was ault "in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the " It was committed before sailing and not at sea, and the pipe en covered up by the loading of the cargo. The cases cited on the ide as to the meaning of the expression "during the navigation" ry special cases, with very different circumstances. Assuming that ident was caused by the pipe having been broken in the loading, l not come within the exemption clause founded on.
dvising,—

TRAYNER.—The "Tilkhurst," belonging to the defenders, sailed from ong for Dundee on 5th December 1888, laden with a cargo of jute.

---

liams v. Dobbie, June 27, 1884, 11 R. 982.
michael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association, . R., 9 Q. B. D. 242, præsertim opinion of Lopes, L. J., at p. 251; Laurie las, 1846, 15 M. and W. 746; Good v. London Steamship Owners' Protecting Association, June 23, 1871, L. R., 6 C. P. 563; The "Work- Dec. 12, 1883, L. R., 9 P. D. 20; Canada Shipping Co. v. British Ship- Mutual Protection Association, 1889, L. R., 23 Q. B. D. 342; Serraino v. Campbell, 1890, L. R., 25 Q. B. D. 501; Norman v. Binnington, 1890, 5 Q. B. D. 475; The Carron Park, 1890, L. R., 15 P. D. 203; The nac," 1890, L. R., 15 P. D. 208.
el & Craig v. State Line Steamship Co., March 16, 1877, 4 R. 657, y 20, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 103.

No. 120.

Feb. 27, 1891. Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

On the 11th, 12th, and 13th of December the vessel encountered a very severe gale, in the course of which, namely on the afternoon of the 12th, it was found that the vessel had a heavy list to port, and on sounding the pumps it was ascertained that there were twelve inches of water in the well. Early on the morning of the 13th the master of the vessel, finding that the vessel was rather unmanageable in consequence of the list, opened the hatches in order to jettison part of the cargo, when he found that the forward water-closet pipe on the port side had been broken away from the flange by which it was fastened to the ship's side, and that the cargo in the vicinity of that pipe was wet. This was occasioned by water which had come in through the hole in the ship's side from which the discharge pipe already mentioned had been broken away. The hole in the ship's side was plugged by the carpenter at once, and the ship was thereafter taken to Galle, where the cargo was unloaded, and the damaged jute landed. Some of it was dried and repacked and then reloaded. The pursuers, who are onerous indorsees of the bill of lading under which the jute was being carried on the voyage in question, now claim from the defenders the amount of damage sustained through the cargo being wet as aforesaid, on the ground that the ship was not seaworthy when she sailed from Chittagong, the said pipe being then cracked, or otherwise faulty, and not cased, as was necessary for its safety. The defenders resist the pursuers' demand on the grounds that the ship was seaworthy, that the said pipe was in perfect order when the ship left Chittagong, that the damage complained of was occasioned entirely by the perils of the sea; or otherwise, was occasioned by the fault of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the course of the voyage, and for which, in terms of the bill of lading, the defenders are not responsible. The case can be conveniently disposed of by considering each of these grounds of defence in the order in which I have stated them, as they cover fully the grounds of action.

The only ground on which the "Tilkhurst" is said to have been unseaworthy is the faulty condition in which the discharge pipe of the forward water-closet on the port side is said to have been when the ship left Chittagong. There is no proof whatever in support of the pursuers' allegation that the pipe itself was cracked or otherwise faulty when the voyage commenced; there is nothing even in the proof to suggest to me a probability that it was so. It is, however, proved by the admission of the master and crew that the pipe in question was not cased as such pipes invariably, or almost invariably, are, and as this pipe itself was when the ship left this country on her outward voyage. The want of this casing, however, did not constitute unseaworthiness, for the ship was quite staunch and strong and fitted to carry her cargo safely to the port of destination without such casing. Nor would the want of casing have led to any damage being done to the cargo if (in view of the want of casing) the master and mariners had done their duty in otherwise securing and protecting the uncased pipe from undue pressure by the adjacent cargo. I think therefore that the pursuers' case fails on the proof, so far as the alleged unseaworthiness of the ship is concerned. The pursuers sought in argument to liken this case to the case of Steel & Craig. But I think the cases are essentially different. In Steel & Craig's case, the ship sailed with an open or partially open porthole, access to which, from the nature of the cargo, could not be had in the course of the voyage. In the present case there was no open port, or hole, through which the sea water could gain admission to the cargo at the time the vessel sailed. In the one case the ship was tight when she sailed, and in the other she was not; and the defect in the ship in the rough which the damage complained of was occasioned was one, , which arose after the voyage had commenced, and was not only was reached and remedied while the ship was at sea. The decision, teel & Craig's case does not seem to me to have any bearing upon estion.

however, having been shipped in good order and condition, as is e bill of lading, and having thereafter been damaged, the defenders for that damage unless they can shew that the damage was occa- ne cause for which they are not responsible. Accordingly the ntain that the damage in question was occasioned by perils of s, of course, the defenders must establish; and in the ordinary not impose a very heavy onus on the shipowner. I agree with own upon that subject in the case of Williams v. Dobie. If the shew that the damage to cargo has been occasioned by sea water, veather encountered on the voyage and the condition of the ship account for sea water getting at the cargo in a ship which was en the voyage commenced, he will, in my opinion, sufficiently nus laid upon him. Of course, circumstances will vary indefinitely, will depend more or less upon its own particular circumstances. tion of what I mean, let me instance the case of a shipowner who damage done to cargo by sea water by shewing that the ship such severe weather as to strain the ship so as to admit sea water ams, or that heavy seas had injured the hatches and so admitted ne hold before the hatches could be repaired or reseamed. In such sumption would be that the damage to the cargo arose from perils presumption which could doubtless be rebutted, but would need by very distinct evidence before the shipowner could be held nt case I am of opinion that the defenders have failed to dis- s laid upon them, of shewing, even prima facie, that the damage pe and consequent damage to the cargo was occasioned entirely f the seas. The cause of the damage, as averred by the defenders, ay,—"On investigation it was discovered that during the gale the a, and the working, straining, and labouring of the ship, or one or causes, had broken the iron portion of the port water-closet dis- t the flange on the ship's side." In support of this averment ses are adduced, who give it as their opinion that a heavy sea, or iking the side of the ship would or might have broken away the flange. None of these witnesses ever knew of such a thing ning—they speak merely to opinion of what might happen, without experience of any such thing having happened. On the other suers have adduced a considerable body of evidence to the opposite witnesses (of great nautical experience) are of opinion that the force king the ship could not have broken the pipe as it was broken, ch a result had followed from the force of the sea, the effects of such hip would have been evidenced by signs of great straining through- It is proved conclusively that there were no such signs,—and tely no evidence of any such straining or labouring of the ship as is e defenders. In addition to this, there is evidence adduced on the rsuers to shew that the pipe in question was broken by pressure from within the ship, which although to a large extent mere evidence of opinion, is supported by the real evidence derived from the ascertained facts as to the place and character of the break, and the condition of the pipe when it was discovered broken. On this part of the case, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the great preponderance of the evidence is against the defenders, and that they have failed to shew that the damage in question was occasioned by the perils of the seas.

No. 120.
Feb. 27, 1891.
Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

It remains now only to be considered whether the defenders can claim exemption from liability for the damage now sued for in respect of the clause in the bill of lading which provides that they are not to be responsible "for any act, neglect, or default of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage." Now, before considering the legal effect of that clause, I think it right to state what in my view are the ascertained facts of the case to which that clause in its legal effect was to be applied. How, in point of fact, and through what fault, did the damage arise which is now in question? It is suggested by some parts of the evidence and it was put to us in argument, although it is not averred upon record, that the damage may have arisen from bad stowage. If that had been proved, I think the defenders could not have pleaded the clause in the bill of lading as exempting them from liability. The cargo was stowed by a stevedore and his men, and they are not among the persons for whose fault or neglect the defenders are exempt from liability by the bill of lading. But I think this is not proved, and therefore I dismiss that matter from further consideration. It appears to me to be established by the evidence, including the real evidence afforded by the character of the break, and the state of the pipe when the break was discovered (by which I refer specially to the bend in the upper or lead part of the pipe and the displacement of the flanges connecting the upper and lower (or iron) part of the pipe) that the pipe was broken by pressure of the cargo. I think it is the result of the evidence that there was a certain—but limited—movement of the cargo to the side and aft when the ship was rolling in a heavy sea, and that in and by such movement the cargo pressed upon the pipe so as to bend and break it, which result would not have followed had the pipe been duly and properly cased, according to the usual if not invariable custom. It was the want of this casing which exposed the pipe to the risk of breakage; it was this want which directly led to its being broken.

If I am correct in this view of the facts, it cannot be doubted that the damage arose through the fault or neglect of the "master or crew" of the ship. It was the duty of the carpenter on board (who had removed the original casing) to have cased the pipe; it was the duty of the master to have seen that this was done. Well then, was this a fault or neglect of the master or crew "in the navigation of the ship"? I think it was. Neglect or default in navigation is the same thing as improper navigation, and that has been well and correctly described as including "every case where something is omitted to be done before the departure of the ship in order to enable the ship to carry the cargo safely from the port of departure to the port of arrival, and where that omission leads to the cargo not being safely and properly so carried" (per Fry, L. J., in Carmichael, L. R., 19 Q. B. D. 249; see also Good, L. R., 6 C. P. 563). Navigation means more than the transit of the ship across the sea. It includes the management of the ship with a view to her crossing the sea,—there may be navigation "without any voyage at all" (Carmichael, supra, 248).

No. 120.

Feb. 27, 1891.
Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

remains, however, another question, was this fault or neglect on of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship committed ordinary course of the voyage"? If the voyage here referred to n the charter-party voyage, there could have been no doubt, on rities, that any fault or neglect committed while the ship was in port gong was committed in the course of the voyage. But the charter-party out on the record as part of the contract of affreightment with which ers have any concern. It is only mentioned incidentally by the bstitute; and the defenders' counsel stated at the bar that they could the charter-party against the pursuers. The voyage, therefore, with e have alone to do is the voyage from Chittagong to Dundee. Was the n, which led to the damage, committed in the course of that voyage? in my answer must be affirmative. The fault itself, as we have seen, ailure duly to case the pipe. It was a fault no doubt to omit the casing pe while the ship lay at Chittagong before her cargo was loaded. But or neglect was committed every day so long as the neglect continued. erefore committed every day on the voyage from the time the ship left g until the damage occurred. The fault or neglect could have been between the 5th of December, when the vessel sailed, and the 11th ber, when she encountered the gale in the course of which the damage —not easily remedied, perhaps, but certainly possibly. It could have edied by the partial removal of the cargo so as to admit of a casing on; or the discharge hole could have been plugged up (as was done e gale) to prevent damage by the entrance there of sea water, in the the pipe being broken in consequence of the want of casing. The default in question was a continuing one—and although committed as not the less committed after the voyage to Dundee began.

herefore of opinion that the damage in question was occasioned by the default of the master or crew in the navigation of the ship in the course of her voyage, and that for the consequences of such neglect or he defenders are exempted by the express condition of the bill of lading ich the cargo was carried.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK .

s interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor appealed gainst: Find in fact (1) that the defenders were carriers in their hip the 'Tilkhurst' of a cargo of jute from Chittagong to Dundee nder the bill of lading No. 20 A of process, of which bill of lading he pursuers are the onerous indorsees; (2) that the said cargo vas damaged in the course of said voyage by sea water, which btained access to said cargo by means of a hole in the side of the hip to which was attached or connected the discharge pipe of the orward water-closet on the port side, which pipe was broken in he course of the voyage; (3) that said pipe was broken by pressure f the cargo thereon; (4) that said pipe was not cased as it should ave been to prevent the pressure of cargo on said pipe, and that he want of casing as aforesaid led to the breaking of said pipe nd consequent damage of the cargo; (5) that the failure to case aid pipe was a default or neglect on the part of the master or crew of said ship in the navigation of the ship committed by them

No. 120.

Feb. 27, 1891. Gilroy, Sons, & Co. v. Price & Co.

in the ordinary course of said voyage: And find in law that the defenders are not liable for said damage, it being damage for which they are exempted from liability by the terms of said bill of lading: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Find no expenses due to or by either party, and decern."

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Forrester & Davidson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 121.

Feb. 27, 1891. M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee.

Robert M'Gavin, Complainer (Respondent).—Johnston—Dundas.
Thomas Martin Dodds (Sturrock's Trustee) and Another, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Asher—Hay.

Right in Security—Lease—Bankruptcy—Security retenta possessione.—A lease of a farm from Martinmas 1858 to Martinmas 1878 provided that in the event of the tenant's bankruptcy the lease should, in the option of the landlord, be null and void, and come to an end at the next Martinmas term. It was also provided that the rent "payable for the last crop of the lease shall be exigible by the proprietor previous to the removal of any part of said crop from the ground," the tenant having the option either of paying the rent in advance, with certain discount, or finding security for payment. After 1878 the tenant continued to possess by tacit relocation, and became bankrupt in August 1890. The landlord sought to interdict the tenant and his trustee, in virtue of the clause of the lease quoted, from selling or removing any part of the crop. Held that that clause could not be made effectual as against creditors, in respect it was an attempt to create a security in the landlord's favour over moveables, the possession of which remained with the tenant, and interdict refused.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Adoption of bankrupt's contract.—A lease provided that the rent "payable for the last crop of the lease shall be exigible by the proprietor previous to the removal of any part of said crop from the ground," the tenant having the option of either paying the rent in advance, with certain discount, or finding security for payment. The tenant became bankrupt three months before the end of the lease, and his trustee thereafter directed and controlled all farm operations, keeping a large number of milch cows, sublet some pasture, and generally ingathering the crops. The landlord sought to interdict the trustee and the tenant from removing any part of the crop on the ground that the stipulation in the lease quoted above was good against the tenant, and therefore good against the trustee, in respect he had adopted the lease.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) held that although the trustee without adopting the lease would have been entitled to reap the crop sown by the bankrupt, he had no right to be in possession of the farm for the three months after the sequestration except in virtue of the lease, and that by doing so he must be held to have adopted the lease, and so subjected himself to the obligation not to remove the crop without paying the rent.

On a reclaiming note, held (rev. the Lord Ordinary's judgment) that, assuming the clause to be good against the tenant, the actings of the trustee did not constitute an adoption of the lease, but were done in discharge of his duty in realisation of the estate.

2d Division. Ld. Kyllachy.

By lease, dated in October 1858, the trustees of William M'Gavin let the farm of Ballumbie to Charles Sturrock. The term of entry was Martinmas 1859, the endurance of the lease nineteen years, and the rent £882 per annum, payable at Candlemas and Lammas after reaping. Assignees and subtenants were excluded, unless with the written consent of the landlord, and in the event of the tenant's bankruptcy it was provided that the lease should, in the option of the proprietor,

No. 121.

Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee.

cto null and void, and shall come to an end at the first term of mas thereafter."

lease further provided,—"That the rent payable for the last crop lease shall be exigible by the proprietors previous to the removal part of said crop from the ground, the tenant having it in his either to pay the rent in advance on getting an abatement of t at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, corresponding to the period n the time of actual advance and the stipulated terms of payment, rwise, before removing any part of the crop, to find security to the tion of the proprietors, or their factor, for the regular payment of d rent."

r Martinmas 1878, when the lease came to an end, Sturrock con- to possess the farm by tacit relocation.

28th August 1890 Sturrock's estates were sequestrated, and T. M. was appointed interim factor. On 9th September he was con- as trustee.

24th September the proprietor, now Robert M'Gavin, raised a of interdict against Sturrock and his trustee to prevent them selling and removing, or otherwise disposing of, removing, or other- way taking from the lands . . . any part of the crop of the 890, whether of wheat, oats, barley, beans, peas, turnips, potatoes, other produce of the ground; and whether still growing on the f the said farm, or already reaped or gathered and stored thereon, at aye and until payment shall be made to the complainer of the nounting to £882 sterling or thereby, payable by the said Charles k for the said farm for crop and year 1890, or until security for ne shall be found to the satisfaction of the complainer."

complainer pleaded;—In respect of the above-recited provisions said lease, and of the bankruptcy of the said Charles Sturrock, the iner, in the circumstances condescended on, is entitled to interdict ed.

respondents pleaded;—(3) There is nothing in the said lease, even relevant and binding, nor in the circumstances of the case, which itle the complainer to prohibit the respondent, the said Thomas Mar- dds, as trustee in the sequestration, from recovering and realising the of the bankrupt, or to warrant the conclusions of this process. (4) mplainer's claim for rent, both as to the amount and question of nce, falls to be adjudicated upon in the first instance by the trustee, t to the review of the Court, as provided by the statute.

1st October the complainer gave notice to the respondents to leave m at the ensuing Martinmas, the trustee having previously inti- his intention to quit the farm at that term.

arrangement the crop was allowed to be sold, the proceeds being d, so as to be paid to the complainer in the event of his being suc- l.

oint minute was lodged for the parties as to the state of the farm at ustee's entry to it, and his actings in connection with it.

principal facts were these:—At the date of the sequestration, the op of the year had been cut and secured. The corn crop was uncut. subsequently cut and harvested between 3d September and 11th er. The potatoes, which had been planted in April and May, were the ground. They were subsequently lifted between 14th October st November. The turnips, which had been sown between 24th nd 25th June, were to the extent of an acre or thereby lifted and ned between the date of the sequestration and Martinmas. The nder of the turnip crop remained on the ground and was sold at the waygoing sale, to be lifted and removed at buyer's option up to the 1st April 1891. The trustee sublet some pasture in October, and received rent for it. Between the date of sequestration and 5th November 1890, being the date of the waygoing sale after mentioned, there were thirty-two milch cows kept on the farm, and these were fed partly on grass, partly on draff, partly on mashley, for which purpose about seven acres of mashley (portion of the grass crop) was used, partly on turnips, for which purpose about one acre of the turnip break was lifted and used on the farm. Sturrock remained in personal occupation of the dwelling-house until 22d November 1890, but from the date of Dodds' appointment till the waygoing sale all farm operations necessary were performed under his orders and control, as trustee under the sequestration.

No. 121.

Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee.

Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary), on 7th January 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, apart from the arrangement" of parties, "the complainer had right to prevent the removal of the crop (other than hay) from the farm of Ballumbie until the rent of the current year was either paid or secured: Finds that as the said arrangement has been or is in course of being carried out, it is not now necessary to grant interdict in terms of the prayer; but in respect of the said joint minute, finds that the respondents are bound to apply the proceeds of the said crop, other than the hay, primo loco in payment of the said rent as the amount of the same shall be determined in due course in the sequestration."*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . In these circumstances, two pleas are maintained by the complainer. He says, first, that, in respect of the clause in the lease already quoted, there was constituted a security for his rent by way of retention over the whole waygoing crop effectual against both the tenant and his creditors. And he says, second, that in any view the non-removal of the crop until the rent was paid was a stipulation of the lease good as against the tenant, and that the trustee in the present case has so acted as to adopt the lease and render himself liable in its prestations.

"I confess I have had difficulty in seeing how—in the state of the facts with which I have to deal—the first of these pleas can be maintained. The waygoing crop here was reaped and reduced into the tenant's possession during the period of his tenancy. It was not as if the lease had terminated at Whitsunday and the bargain had been that the tenant, while having right to return and reap the crop then on the ground, should yet do so under the condition that he should first pay the rent. It may be that even against creditors that condition would be effectual. I shall have to consider that presently. But the ish of the lease here was Martinmas, and even in the event of bankruptcy the irritancy was only to take effect at Martinmas; by which term, as I have said, the crop was reaped. The question is therefore the same as if it had arisen not with respect to the waygoing crop, but with respect, for example, to some other crop during the lease, which was sought to be poinded and carried off by a poinding creditor. And I am not able to hold that a landlord who has let his lands on an agricultural lease, retains such a possession of the subject as enables him to set up or contract a right of retention over the fruits of the subject. At anyrate such right, if maintainable on principle, must, I think, be held to have been taken away by the statutory abolition of the law of hypothec. I do not overlook what was urged in argument, that in various respects the law still recognises the landlord's right to qualify by paction the tenant's right in the produce of the farm. That is certainly true with respect, e.g., to the straw of all crops except the last, and with respect also to the dung made with such straw. It perhaps also is true with respect to the straw of the waygoing crop. And it may even be that it is so with respect to the waygoing crop as a whole if and when the tenant gets the first crop under his lease free, and the last crop is stipulated to become the property of the landlord on the principle of steelbow.—Rankine on Leases, 256 and 369; Dun v. Johnston, Jan. 28, 1818, Hume, 451; Stewart

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—In the first place, the clause as to retention did not apply here at all. "The last crop of the lease"

Rose, Feb. 2, 1816, Hume, 229. These, however, are, in my opinion, special cases involving special principles which are here inapplicable. The condition here is not one which affects the proper cultivation of the farm. Neither is it a question of defining or limiting the tenant's property in the fruits of the farm. On the contrary, the tenant's property in this waygoing crop is assumed; and the attempt is not to limit the tenant's right of property, but to create a security over it by way of retention. It appears to me that these are differences which take this case outside the category of the cases I have referred to.

"But this brings one to the second of the complainer's pleas, viz., that the trustee has here adopted the lease so as to become bound by all its provisions. Now, certainly it is very difficult to say that, taking the lease as a yearly lease terminating at Martinmas, there is any benefit which the trustee could have taken under it which he has not taken. Indeed, if the bankruptcy had occurred say at Whitsunday, and the trustee had done for six months what he did for nearly three, I do not at present see how there could have been any doubt as to his liability for the year's rent and fulfilment of the other prestations of the lease. But the question arises in this way, and it appears to me to be a rather delicate question. The trustee was entitled, without adopting the lease, to do all that was necessary to realise to reasonable advantage the moveable property of the bankrupt, including the stock, crop, &c., upon the farm at the date of sequestration; and what he says is that he had no longer or further possession, and took no further benefit from the lease than was reasonably necessary for that realisation. And what I have really to decide is, whether this was so, or whether, on the other hand, the trustee took or is now claiming benefit from the lease which he could not have had if he had renounced, or caused the bankrupt to renounce and cede possession to the landlord, at or immediately after the sequestration.

"Now I think it is clear enough upon the joint minute that the tenant's possession up to Martinmas was the trustee's possession, and that whatever was done in the way of carrying on the farm was done by the trustee. I further think that a part at least of the farming operations as set forth in the joint minute—and particularly the continued pasturing of the cattle from 28th August up to 6th November—went somewhat beyond what was necessary for mere realisation. I confess, however, I should have felt, if that was all, that that was a somewhat narrow ground for a judgment in favour of the complainer. But there is another element in the trustee's action which appears to me to make it unnecessary to consider this somewhat narrow point; and that is, that the trustee is here claiming an immunity from the stipulation in the lease as to the non-removal of the waygoing crop before payment of the rent—which immunity, in my opinion, he could not have claimed but for his continued possession up to Martinmas, and his consequent ability to reap the crop before the landlord obtained possession.

"It must be considered that, except under the lease, neither the bankrupt nor his trustee had right to possess the farm for a day. They had right, no doubt, after quitting possession to return when the crops were ripe and to reap them. And they were entitled to such possession as might be necessary for that purpose. But to continue in possession from August to November so as to exclude the landlord was, I think, to exercise a right under the lease. Now, had that right not been exercised—had the trustee immediately renounced the lease and ceded possession to the landlord, what would have been the result? The crop, it will be observed, was for the most part not only uncut, but unripe. Even the corn crop did not begin to be cut till the 3d September. The landlord, therefore, entering in the beginning of September, would have had undoubted possession of the uncut crop. And I see no reason in principle why, having obtained such possession, he should not have been at liberty to put in force his stipulated right of retention for the rent, if indeed he did not possess such right apart from stipulation altogether. The case would really have been the same as the case I supposed a little ago, of a Whitsunday ish, and a stipulation for a lien over the crop then on the ground for the rent of the year. Or the position would have been

No. 121.

Feb. 27, 1891. M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee.

was quite intelligible in reference to a lease of several years, but when tacit relocation, tenancy from year to year, set in, that clause was meaningless. To apply it to such a tenancy would make the rent a forehand rent for all these years of tacit relocation. In the next place, this lease was, by the provisions of the 42d and 28th sections of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), declared to be a lease under a contract of tenancy beginning after 1883. The tenant was therefore possessing free of the condition in the lease, for it had become illegal by that Act. Nor could there be any right of retention in the landlord, for he had neither possession of the crop nor property in it. The common law gave the tenant the property in the crop.[1] The case of Moncreiff[2] did not deal with crops such as the crops here, which had come to maturity and were ready to be ingathered or actually were ingathered. The obligation upon the tenant, if obligation there were, was a personal obligation merely, and that did not transmit so as to affect his trustee, unless the trustee adopted the contract. Now, did he adopt it? Did he take up the lease? Surely not. All that he did was necessary for realisation of the tenant's property for behoof of his creditors. He had not gone beyond the duties of a trustee, as these had been laid down by the Court.[3] The time itself during which his occupation lasted shewed that his possession could only be for purposes of realisation.

The complainer argued;—The years during which the farm was held by tacit relocation were none of them the last year, till notice was given, as it had been here in the year in question. That made it the last year. Again, any possession by the tenant, or anyone in his right, must be under all the conditions of the lease,—for there was here tacit relocation,—and therefore it was subject to the provisions of the clause in question. The case of Moncreiff was closely analogous to the present, for there a clause in similar terms was held to deprive the tenant of all right to reap what he had sown. The trustee took the asset from the bankrupt tantum on principle the same as if the landlord had obtained a decree of irritancy and ejection proceeding on a clause of irritancy which gave him right to retain and appropriate the crops then on the ground. It is no doubt true that, according to the maxim 'messis sementem sequitur,' the tenant has presumably a right of property in the growing crops which he has sown, but I know no authority for holding that the operation of that maxim may not be conventionally qualified—I mean by stipulations in the lease. At all events, I know of no authority adverse to the constitution by paction of a security by way of lien or retention over such portion of a waygoing crop as may remain unreaped at the tenant's ish and may pass into the landlord's possession in that event. The only cases quoted on the subject appear to be Elder v. Allen, 5th July 1833, 11 S. 902; Moncreiff v. Hay, 6 Dec. 1842, 5 D. 249, 15 Scot. Jur. 84. So far as they go, they are favourable to the complainer.

---

"But this being so, it follows that by the possession which he retained under the lease the trustee here was enabled to do a great deal more than merely realise. His possession enabled him to get the crops of the year ripened and reaped and reduced to possession, so as to exclude the landlord's possession, and defeat the landlord's security for his rent. It appears to me that in these circumstances the trustee must be held to have adopted the lease which was current at the date of the sequestration, and so to be liable for the year's rent, and disable from removing the waygoing crop (other than the hay) until the rent of the year is paid."

[1] Earl of Hopetoun v. Wight, July 10, 1863, 1 Macph. 1097, 35 Scot. Jur. 621, affd. (H. L.) May 27, 1864, 2 Macph. (H. L.) 35, 36 Scot. Jur. 542, 4 Macq. 773.

[2] Moncreiff v. Hay, Dec. 6, 1842, 5 D. 249, 15 Scot. Jur. 84.

[3] Kirkland v. Cadell, March 9, 1838, 16 S. 860, Lord President at p. 881, 1 Scot. Jur. 363.

No. 121.
Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee.

The tenant's right was not a right of property, or at least there was iz., the turnips, in such a condition at the date of the sequestra- at it could not become the tenant's property—enough to satisfy dlord's demand without raising any question as to grain or potatoes. n, the question were confined to the turnips, they were at that date soli, they could not be lifted, and therefore were not the tenant's ty. Just as a crop only brairded could not be poinded,[1] so these s could not be the tenant's property. The landlord had then a right n sufficient to ground retention. The minute of admissions shewed ption by the trustee of the lease,—e.g., he should have sold the not kept them.

dvising,—

D YOUNG.—The landlord maintains, under the stipulation in his lease, s claim for rent is a preferable debt in the sequestration, to the amount value of the crop, and maintains also that he has sufficient support for that tion in the fact that the trustee, being free to adopt or to reject the lease, to adopt it, and that therefore this claim is good against him, which it y might not have been in other circumstances. The Lord Ordinary n his note the grounds why he is against the landlord on the former of leas, but in his favour on the second. I agree with the Lord Ordinary former point, and differ from him on the second.

landlord is exactly in the position of a creditor for a debt to the amount rent. The debt has been incurred, although the period of payment has ived. Before the change of the law in 1880, landlords were in a very able position as regards such debts, for they had security over their s' property of which these debtors retained possession, or even after a rence by the debtor in pursuance of a bona fide contract with a third party. law held. But after 1880, the landlord came to be in the same position other creditor. The law does not allow to any creditor security by con- over property which is allowed to remain in the debtor's possession. fore, in my view, the landlord is by this covenant in no more favourable n than any creditor would be to whom the tenant had given security over p of 1890. He could not do that without giving possession. I therefore with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary on the first question.

on the second question I feel constrained to differ. The Lord Ordi- opinion is put on this, that the trustee is put to his election to or to repudiate the lease. I am of opinion that he is put to no n. I am of opinion that it is his statutory duty to realise the debtor's to ingather it, and expend it in payment of his debts. The crop he tenant's property. He may have been under contracts with respect He was under this contract with the landlord. But the crop was his rty and passed to the trustee, he being bound of course to implement any cts which were binding on him. This contract was not binding on him. is the first point again. His duty was clear, to realise the property, and l no more. I cannot assent to the view that he adopted the lease. The Ordinary, by his answer to the second question, negatives his answer to rst question, for he says, if you take this crop, which you must take, you the lease, and then, it seems, the landlord will prevail.

[1] Elder v. Allen, July 5, 1833, 11 S. 902, 5 Scot. Jur. 518.

No. 121.
Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Gavin v. Sturrock's Trustee.

I cannot agree with that view. My opinion on both questions is adverse to the landlord. I think that he has no preferable claim.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—On the first question I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I am satisfied with the reasons which he has given.

On the second question I differ from his Lordship. I do not think the trustee adopted the lease. He has done nothing more than realise the property of the bankrupt.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the clause in the lease referred to on record, which provides that the rent payable for the last crop should be seizable before the crop was removed from the ground, is one which cannot be enforced as against creditors, being merely, at least in effect, an attempt to create a security over moveables in the possession of the debtor. Taking that view of the legal effect of the clause, it is unnecessary to consider whether, having regard to the terms in which it is expressed, the clause (as was argued by the trustee) is inapplicable to a lease for one year, which this lease had come to be at the date of the tenant's sequestration. But I am unable to concur in the view of the Lord Ordinary, in respect of which he has pronounced the judgment reclaimed against, that the trustee in the sequestration has adopted the lease and thereby become bound for payment of the rent. The lease came to an end by the bankruptcy of the tenant, who, however, by the express terms of the lease was entitled to remain in possession of the farm until the term of Martinmas thereafter. Until that term arrived the tenant, or his trustee as vested in his right, was entitled to remain on the farm to the effect of reaping, securing, and removing the crop. The trustee did nothing more. He took possession of the farm only to the effect and for the purpose of ingathering and realising the bankrupt estate, not as for the bankrupt but as for his creditors. His doing so did not, in my opinion, infer any liability for the rent, for which the complainer must rank on the sequestrated estate.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that at the date of the sequestration the crop of 1890 was the property of the tenant, and by the sequestration passed to his trustee in bankruptcy, who is entitled to realise the same for behoof of the creditors in the sequestration: Therefore recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, repel the reasons of suspension and interdict," &c.

HENRY & SCOTT, W.S.—DAVID MILNE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 122.
Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Intosh v. Waite.

ROBERT M'INTOSH, Appellant.—Shaw.
WILLIAM WAITE, Officer of Inland Revenue, Respondent.—Asher—Young.

Administration of justice—Second trial where conviction on first trial "null and void"—Public-house—7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53, sec. 68.—A person was convicted before two Justices of retailing spirits without having a licence. One of the Justices was a person employed in the collection of certain duties of excise, and the proceedings were therefore declared by sec. 68 of the above Act to be utterly null and void to all intents and purposes.* On the attention of the pre-

* 7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53, sec. 68,—"It shall not be lawful . . . for any officer of excise or person employed in the collection or management of the revenue of excise to act as a Justice of the Peace in any part of the United

No. 122.

Feb. 27, 1891.

M'Intosh v. Waite.

secutor being called to this fact he repaid the penalty which had been imposed in respect of the conviction. A new complaint for the same offence was brought, and a conviction again followed, in spite of a plea that this second proceeding was incompetent. An appeal having been taken to the Quarter Sessions against the second conviction, a case was stated for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer. Held that a decree by a competent Court was necessary to declare the statutory nullity, that the Justices had no jurisdiction to pronounce any such decree, were not at liberty to disregard the fact of a conviction having been already obtained for the same offence, and therefore could not entertain the second complaint.

2D DIVISION. Quarter Sessions of Aberdeenshire. M.

ON 19th June 1890 Robert M'Intosh, grocer at the Cabrach, Aberdeenshire, was convicted before James Lawson and Adam Dunbar, two Justices of the Peace, of selling whisky without a licence, and thereby infringing the provisions of 6 Geo. IV. cap. 81, as amended by 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 67. He was fined £25.

This penalty he paid, and on 21st June lodged an appeal to the Quarter Sessions.

On 15th July 1890 Robert M'Intosh appeared before James Lawson and George Park Wilson, two Justices of the Peace for the county of Aberdeen, to answer to a new complaint, containing precisely the same charges as those contained in the first complaint. Along with the second complaint the prosecutor presented to the Justices a minute, setting forth, inter alia, that Adam Dunbar, one of the Justices who heard the first complaint, was at that time a person employed to collect certain duties of excise by means of excise licences; that, as such a person was disqualified from acting as a Justice in said complaint, and had acted as a Justice therein, all the proceedings under the said complaint were, by the Statute, 7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53, sec. 68, "declared to be utterly null and void to all intents and purposes"; and that the previous proceedings being utterly null and void, the proceedings under the new complaint were rendered necessary. The said minute farther set forth that the fine of £25 had been repaid, and there was produced to the Court the receipt of M'Intosh therefor.

At the hearing of the second complaint on 15th July 1890 M'Intosh pleaded in bar of trial,—(1) That Mr Lawson was disqualified, as he sat at the former trial; (2) that the complaint was incompetent on the ground that the respondent had already been tried and convicted of the offences libelled, and had paid the penalty, and that the case was under appeal; and (3) that the respondent did not admit Mr Dunbar's disqualification.

It was proved that Mr Dunbar was a person employed to collect certain duties of excise by means of excise licences, and that the penalty imposed by the conviction of 19th June 1890,—viz., £25,—was repaid on the 4th day of July 1890.

The Justices, on proof of Mr Dunbar's disqualification, and after the examination of witnesses for the prosecution and witnesses for the defence, repelled the objections in bar of trial, and convicted the respondent, fining him £25. He at once appealed to Quarter Sessions.

The appeals in both cases came up before the Statutory Court of Quarter Sessions held at Aberdeen on 28th October 1890, when M'Intosh Kingdom in the execution of any of the powers, authorities, clauses, matters, or things contained in this Act, or in any other Act or Acts of Parliament relating to the revenue of excise, . . . and if any such officer or person employed as aforesaid, . . . shall presume to act as a Justice of the Peace contrary to the true intent and meaning of this Act, all proceedings in that behalf shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be, utterly null and void to all intents and purposes."

---

No. 122.
Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Intosh v. Waite.

stated that he did not insist on the appeal in the first complaint, that in the second complaint the preliminary objections now insisted on were,—(1) That the first conviction could only be set aside by decree of reduction of a competent Court; and (2) whether so set aside or not, the respondent could not be tried a second time for the same offences, as he had already tholed a trial; and he craved the Court to state a case for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer, in terms of the Act.

The Court of Quarter Sessions resolved to state a case accordingly, and adjourned the farther consideration of the case to the next statutory meeting of Quarter Sessions to enable them to get the opinion and direction of said Court.

A case was accordingly stated, the foregoing facts being set forth, and the following questions submitted, viz.:—"(1) On proof of the disqualification of the Justice Adam Dunbar, is the conviction of 19th June 1890 ipso facto 'utterly null and void to all intents and purposes,' by virtue of the declaratory words contained in the Act 7 and 8 George IV., chapter 53, section 68, or is a decree of reduction by a competent Court necessary? and (2) Whether, being ipso facto null or set aside, is a second trial barred by M'Intosh having been already tried and convicted under the first complaint?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) In spite of the declaration of the statute, there must be some procedure to get rid of the former conviction. It was true that it was described as "null and void," but in the law of obligations, where certain obligations were void and others were voidable, both kinds stood until they were set aside by reduction. The appellant here could not have refused to pay the fine, resisting all procedure to enforce it by a plea that the conviction was null. [LORD TRAYNER.—I think he could. He could have suspended any proceedings to enforce the decree, but I doubt if a reduction was necessary.] That was a merely formal distinction. The conviction must be taken out of the way by some Court with jurisdiction to do so. The language of the Bankruptcy Statute of 1621, c. 18, was very broad,* as broad as that of the statute in question here, and yet the transactions therein struck at had to be removed by judicial procedure. (2) But even if the former conviction were null, the appellant had tholed an assize, and should not be "twice reduced to so anxious and humiliating a condition."[1] Where a mistake had been made in the designation of the victim of whose murder a pannel had been acquitted, the acquittal proceeding on the error in the designation, it was held that he could not be tried again for the murder of the person now in a second indictment rightly designated.[2] Then the first trial was plainly null, yet there could be no second trial.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The terms of the section were peculiar. They could not be broader. The attempted analogy of the Bankruptcy Statute failed, its purview being to make reduction competent ope exceptionis. The Justices were competent to deal with this complaint. They must be competent to deal with a plea in bar. It would be absurd if a Court, on a plea in bar being proponed, could do nothing till another Court had disposed of that plea. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—That must depend upon the foundation of the plea in bar.] Admitted

* "The Lordes of Council and Session . . . statutes, ordaines, and declares that they will decreete and decerne all alienations, &c. . . . have beene from the beginning, and to be in all times comming, null and of none avail, force, nor effect . . . by way of action, exception, or reply without further declarator."

[1] Hume, ii. 465.

[2] See Hume, ut cit., case of John Hannah, July 23 and Nov. 4, 1806.

But this plea depended on a simple question of fact, viz., did the Justice of the Peace sell stamps? It was a fact in the case now stated that that fact had been proved. Was it to be said that a declarator of that fact was to be brought in the Court of Session? It would have been objected to such a declarator that it was abstract, and led to no practical conclusion. Would it have been any better if a conclusion had been added that the proceedings were therefore null? The Judges of the Supreme Court would at once have said, "Why bring to us a question so plain as that, which the statute answers for you in so many words?" (2) The pannel could never plead that he had tholed an assize where the proceedings were null, and where nothing could have followed on them,[1]—e.g., where a juryman was a minor.[2] [LORD YOUNG.—But that consideration would apply to any number of abortive trials. Could you—supposing your present conviction should turn out to be null, try this man a third time, or ten times?] Certainly. For no one of these so-called trials would in truth have been a trial. They would have been wiped out vi statuti. While such procedure would have been competent, it could not be supposed that any such abuse was likely to happen.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case sent to this Court by the Quarter Sessions of Aberdeenshire for an opinion on a point of law. The case arises under the Inland Revenue Acts, Robert M'Intosh having upon the 19th of June 1890 been brought before two Justices of the Peace for a breach of the excise law, and adjudged to pay a sum of £25 of penalty, with an alternative of imprisonment. M'Intosh paid the penalty, and entered an appeal to the Quarter Sessions against the conviction. It was discovered afterwards that Adam Dunbar, one of the Justices who heard the case at the Petty Sessions, was a person employed to collect certain duties of excise in the neighbourhood, and that, in accordance with the Act 7 and 8 George IV., c. 53, sec. 68, the proceedings would be—if so declared by a competent Court—null and void to all intents and purposes. Upon that discovery being made the prosecutor in the case returned the fine which had been paid, got a receipt for it, and then proceeded to raise a second complaint before the Petty Sessions on 15th July for the same offence. The accused appeared at the bar and stated objections to the trial proceeding, on the ground that the case had already been tried, and that there was a judgment standing against him in the other case. He stated two pleas—1st, that one of the Justices was disqualified, he having sat at the former trial; and 2d, that the complaint was incompetent, on the ground that the respondent had already been tried and convicted of the offences libelled, and had paid the penalty, and that the case was under appeal. Thirdly, he stated what apparently there was nothing to support, that he did not admit the disqualification of the Justice in the former case, for I think it is quite plain according to the law that the Justice was disqualified. The prosecutor, on the other hand, maintained that

[1] Allison, ii. 618; Hume, ii. 468.

[2] Case of Menzies, Dec. 1790, reported by Hume, ut cit. The reporter notes that at a sitting of the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow on 26th December 1887, in the trial of James Stevenson, charged with the crime of theft, after the jury had returned a verdict of guilty, it was discovered that one of the jurymen, who had objections to taking an oath, had not stood up with the rest of the jury when they were sworn, and had not taken the oath. Lord Rutherfurd Clark, after consultation with Lord M'Laren, swore the fourteen jurymen again, and allowed the fifteenth to affirm. The witnesses were recalled and re-examined, and the jury again returned a verdict of guilty.

No. 122.

Feb. 27, 1891.
M'Intosh v. Waite.

the proceedings at the previous trial were absolutely null and void, and must be held as having no existence, and that therefore the two Justices sitting were perfectly entitled to proceed with the case. This view was adopted by the two Justices sitting in Petty Sessions, and they proceeded to hear the case out, again convicted the accused, and again fined him. Against that he appealed to the Quarter Sessions, and the Quarter Sessions have sent the case to this Court in order to get instructions as to how they should deal with it.

Now, as I have said already, there cannot be a doubt that at the first trial one of the Justices who sat, though a competent Justice to sit in ordinary cases before the Petty Sessions, was not a competent Judge to sit in that particular case; and accordingly there can be no doubt that the proceedings in that prosecution, if competently brought up before a competent Court, ought to be declared utterly null and void to all intents and purposes. But that is not the question which we have to decide here. Nor is the question before us whether the appellant has tholed an assize. The question here is, whether there being on the books of the Justices of Peace sitting in Petty Sessions a standing conviction for a particular offence, that can be declared null and void by two other Justices sitting in Petty Sessions, so that they can set it aside as if it had no existence and proceed with a new trial? I am of opinion that two Justices sitting in Petty Sessions have no such power, and that although this first conviction must be set aside and got rid of, if it be brought upon appeal or otherwise before a Court competent to set it aside, they have no power to do so. And upon these grounds I have come to be of opinion that the answer we must give to the Quarter Sessions is that the appeal must be sustained against the subsequent proceedings taken before the two new Justices, and that they had no right in the circumstances to proceed as they did.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion.

Every statute is to be construed with reference to the rules of the common law. There is no exception to that as a general proposition. The particular rules of the common law may be made by the statute inapplicable to the particular case, but in so far as they are not made inapplicable they do not require to be enacted. The rules of the common law apply here to the statutory provision declaring that a conviction or any proceedings before Justices under certain circumstances shall be null and void. That is subject to this rule of the common law, that the fact must be ascertained and declared, and made applicable to the particular case, the general declarator being unavailing until that is done. I am of opinion therefore, upon the ordinary rules of the common law, that the conviction must be set aside by a Court of competent jurisdiction before the man can be tried over again. Whether he can be tried over again after it has been set aside is a question upon which I am not required to form or to express an opinion.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the conviction of 15th July 1890 is bad, in respect of the previous conviction for the same offence of 19th June 1890, which the Justices sitting on 15th July had not jurisdiction to set aside, and were not at liberty to disregard."

DOUGLAS & MILLER, W.S.—DAVID CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Agents.

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH AND QUEENSBERRY, First Party.—Murray—P. J. Blair.
FREDERIC JOHN WILLIAM JOHNSTONE, Baronet, Second Party.—Ure—Craigie.

rior and Vassal—Entry—Casualty—Composition—Relief—Trust.—By r vivos trust-disposition dated in 1810 a proprietor (not entered with the r) of lands inherited from a deceased ancestor who was a singular succes- the last entered vassal and who held an a me infeftment unconfirmed, d the lands to trustees for the following purposes, viz., (1st) for pay- f the expenses attending the execution of the trust; (2d) for pay- o himself during his life and the subsistence of the trust of a free annuity of £3000, of which £400 was to be paid to his wife during and the subsistence of the trust; (3d) for payment of all the just and debts then owing by him; and (4th) in the event of his death, for the of carrying into effect the provisions of any deed of settlement executed executed by him in favour of his wife and children or any other person ons. Power was granted to the trustees (with the truster's written con- sell any part of the lands disponed to them, and the proceeds of the f any, so sold were directed to be applied in the payment of all the just ful debts due by the truster, and any residue of money in their hands was to be paid to the truster's heirs and assignees, secluding executors. The ed further provided that the trustees should reconvey the remainder of lands and estates and other heritable property which should not have sposed of when the debts had been fully paid off, or if required by under the hand of the truster, should so reconvey the lands to the t Martinmas 1814 whether the debts had been paid off or not. The died in 1811. In 1815 the trustees having obtained decree of adjudica- mplement against the truster's heir, and having been infeft thereon, were with the superior, but as trustees for the uses and purposes of the trust- ly, by charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation, which recited the of the trustees' right, and confirmed the dispositions and unconfirmed in- ts since the date of the last vassal's entry. The trustees paid composition. In 1860 they granted a conveyance of such of the lands as they had to the truster's heir-at-law, who was infeft thereon, and was thereby in tered with the superior in virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4. t surviving trustee died in 1863. The vassal tendered relief-duty; the demanded composition.

(diss. Lord Young, dub. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the cases of Stuart on, 17 R. 851, Duke of Athole v. Stewart, 17 R. 724, and Duke of Athole ies, 17 R. 733, did not apply, and that the heir was liable in payment of tion, (a) in respect that the entry of the trustees created a new investi- d was not a mere burden on the former investiture, and (b) in respect n if it did not create a new investiture, the heir was not the heir of an ure recognised by the superior, as his ancestor had not been entered in ime, and as the subsequent confirmation by the superior operated retro the effect of confirming prior conveyances and unconfirmed infeftments missions necessary to complete the title of the vassal in whose favour irmation was granted.

rust-disposition, dated 10th December 1810, Sir John Lowther one, of Westerhall, Baronet, on the narrative that he was anxious his affairs in a regular train of management for the security of his rs, disponed all the lands and heritages belonging to him in Scotland, ter alia, the lands of Axletreewell, Dornock, and others, and the lands eckhill and others, to trustees, and gave the trustees power to sell, is written consent, such parts of the lands as he and they should oper. The purposes of the trust were, first, for payment of the e attending the execution of the trust; second, for payment to the during his life and the subsistence of the trust of a free yearly 2D DIVISION. M.

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

annuity of £3000, of which annuity £400 was to be paid to his wife during her life and the subsistence of the trust; third, for payment of all just and lawful debts then owing by the truster; fourth, "in the event of my death, the said trustees shall be bound to carry into effect the provisions contained in the deeds of disposition and settlement executed or to be executed by me in favour of the said Dame Charlotte Johnstone, my wife, and my children, or any other person or persons; . . . And It is hereby provided and declared that these presents are granted for and to this special end and effect, that the said trustees may apply the prices of such lands and others above disponed if sold, and rents thereof preceding the purchaser's entry, and whole other funds, heritable and moveable, hereby disponed and assigned, after deduction of the public burdens affecting the said estates, and after deduction of all necessary charges to be disbursed by them in preparing this trust right and executing the trust thereby committed to them, and of such salaries or gratifications as they shall give to factors, lawyers, arbiters, or others who shall be employed with relation to the management of this present trust, and other suitable gratifications to the said trustees themselves, in the payment of all the just and lawful debts due by me at the date hereof, both principals and interests that may become due upon such principals thereafter, in such order as the circumstances of the case may require: It being hereby expressly understood and conditioned that after payment of my debts as said is, my said trustees shall make payment to me, my heirs or assignees, secluding executors, of the residue of the money or other moveable property in their hands falling under or arising from this trust, any shall remain; and shall, when the said debts are fully paid off, at the term of Martinmas 1814, convey and redispone to me and my foresaids the whole of the remainder of my said lands and estates and other heritable property which shall not have been disposed of, with warrandice from fact and deed only: And which reconveyance, if required by me by writing under my hand, shall take place at the said term of Martinmas 1814, whether my debts are then paid off or not: It being hereby expressly provided that the said trust and the whole powers vested in the said trustees shall subsist and continue ay and until the said trustees shall be relieved of all advances of money and obligations whatsoever they may either jointly or individually be under on my account, and the said trustees shall be entitled to hold the whole subjects hereby disponed and made over till they are relieved accordingly: And declaring that in the event of my death before the said reconveyance shall take place, and my heir being a minor, the said trust shall subsist and continue as to the whole subjects, both lands and others, till my whole debts are paid, subject always to such allowance to my minor heir as I shall direct or appoint by a writing under my hand at any time in my life." The deed further contained an obligation to infeft by two several infeftments in manners of holding, and also a procuratory of resignation.

At the date of the trust-disposition, Sir John Lowther Johnstone had a personal right only to the lands above mentioned,* and at that date the last entered vassals in the lands of Axletreewell, Dornock, and others were James Douglas, of Dornock, in liferent, and Archibald Douglas, younger of Dornock, in fee, and the last entered vassal in the lands of Torbeckie and others was Margaret Graham, of Crowdieknow. The state of the title was then as follows:—

* The special case after mentioned, which incorporated the various deeds, stated that Sir J. L. Johnstone was "duly infeft," but the deeds shewed that he had only a personal right.

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891. Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

letreewell and Others.—In 1768, William Alexander, merchant in burgh, obtained a decreet of sale and adjudication of these lands st James and Archibald Douglas, in implement of which Archibald las granted a disposition of the lands in favour of Alexander, with nt to infeft a me and precept of sasine, which was followed by ment of sasine recorded in 1773. In 1775 Alexander granted a ition and assignation of the lands and the decreet to Sir William ney, Baronet, uncle of Sir John Lowther Johnstone, with obligation eft a me and precept of sasine, which was followed by instrument of recorded in the same year. On Sir William Pulteney's death, Sir John ner Johnstone was served heir of line in special to him, and this ser- vas Sir John's title to the lands at the date of the trust-disposition.

beckhill and Others.—In 1765 Margaret Graham, in implement of a ct of sale, granted a disposition of these lands to David Armstrong. 90, in a ranking and sale against Armstrong, Sir William Pulteney ed a decree of sale and adjudication of the lands and foresaid dis- on; and on Sir William's death, his daughter and only child, the ess of Bath, acquired right to the decree, disposition, and lands, by l service as heiress of her father. On her death shortly thereafter, usin, Sir J. L. Johnstone, served heir in general special to her, which e was his title to the lands at the date of the trust-disposition.

John Lowther Johnstone died in 1811 without having made any ion in the titles.

16th November 1814 the trustees obtained a decree of adjudication plement against Sir Frederick George Johnstone, the only son and f the truster, as charged to enter nearest and lawful heir in general granduncle, Sir William Pulteney, which decree adjudged the of Axletreewell and others from him, and declared them to "belong bly and irredeemably to the said trustees for the uses and purposes said trust-disposition, and to their successors and assignees, and that plement of the foresaid trust-disposition to them by the said Sir Lowther Johnstone, and ordained them to be infeft and seased in id lands: To be holden of the immediate lawful superiors of the as he the said Sir Frederick George Johnstone held or could have the same." Of this decreet of adjudication in implement an abbre- was recorded on 12th January 1875.

27th March 1815, the commissioner for the superior, the Duke of sberry, granted a charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation in of the trustees, whereby he disponed and confirmed to the trustees, trust always for the uses and purposes of the trust, which were ed, the lands of Axletreewell and others. The charter then deduced ght confirmed by reciting (1) the rights of the Douglases; (2) the t of sale in favour of Alexander; (3) the disposition and assigna- y Alexander in favour of Sir William Pulteney; (4) the service of hn Lowther Johnstone, as heir of line to his uncle Sir William ney; and (5) the adjudication led by the trustees against Sir Fre- George Johnstone. It then confirmed the disposition of the lands chibald Douglas to Alexander, the instrument of sasine following n in favour of Alexander, the disposition by Alexander to Sir m Pulteney, the instrument of sasine following thereon in favour William Pulteney, "to be holden the foresaid respective lands by id David Cathcart, Lord Alloway, and Masterton Ure, the trustees id, and the survivor of them, and his or their successors, and assig- of and under the said Charles William, Duke of Queensberry, &c., is heirs and successors, as immediate lawful superiors of the same, -farm, fee, and heritage for ever."

J. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891. Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

The trustees paid composition in respect of this entry.

As regarded the lands of Torbeckhill and others, on 14th February 1827, the trustees obtained a decree of adjudication against Sir Frederic George Johnstone, as lawfully charged to enter heir in general special to the Countess of Bath, cousin-german of his father; on 27th November they obtained a decree of adjudication in implement against the heir of Margaret Graham, and on 15th February 1828 they obtained a charter of adjudication in implement from the superior, the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry. They also paid composition for this entry.

In 1856, Sir Frederic John William Johnstone, the grandson of Sir John Lowther Johnstone, with consent of his curator, raised an action of declarator, implement, count, reckoning, and payment against Masterton Ure, the surviving trustee acting under his grandfather's trust-disposition, concluding, inter alia, that upon the said Masterton Ure receiving a discharge from him and his curator, he was bound to convey and dispone generally the whole heritable estates and property in Scotland then remaining vested in him under said trust-disposition, or to which he had right as trustee foresaid, to and in favour of him, the pursuer, as having right thereto under the disposition and settlement of his grandfather, and to the heirs substituted to him in the said disposition and settlement. The parties were ordained by the Court to prepare and execute the necessary deeds for closing the trust, and accordingly Masterton Ure, as sole surviving trustee foresaid, upon the 16th day of March 1860, granted a disposition of, inter alia, the lands of Axletreewell, Torbeckhill, and others (with the exception of certain portions thereof which had been sold by the trustees), in favour of Sir F. J. W. Johnstone, the pursuer, whom failing, the heirs and substitutes called after him to the succession under the trust-disposition. Sir F. J. W. Johnstone was infeft in the said lands by recording the foresaid disposition in his favour on 27th September 1860.

Masterton Ure died in 1863.

Sir F. J. W. Johnstone having been impliedly entered with the superior in virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 4, the question arose whether he was liable in payment of a composition or in relief only.

This special case was accordingly presented, the superior, the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, being the first party, and Sir F. J. W. Johnstone the second party.

The foregoing facts were stated in the case, and the following were the questions of law:—"(1) Whether the second party is liable to the first party in the sum of £671, 6s. 2d., being the composition in lieu of the casualty due by a singular successor on his entry to said lands? or, Whether the second party is liable to the first party in the sum of £13s. $8\frac{6}{12}$d. sterling, being the heir's relief, or the casualty due by an heir on his entry to the said lands?"

The case was originally heard before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and Lord Lee, and was taken to avizandum. Lord Lee prepared a written opinion, which was not delivered, in consequence of his Lordship's death before the case was advised. It was again heard of new.

The argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.[1]

---

[1] Authorities cited.—Grindlay v. Hill, Jan. 18, 1810, F. C.; M'Millan v. Campbell, March 4, 1831, 9 S. 551, June 28, 1832, 7 W. and S. 106; Duke of Hamilton v. Earl of Hopetoun, March 8, 1839, 1 D. 689; Adv.-General v. Swinton, Jan. 30, 1854, 17 D. 21; Lamont v. Rankine's Trustees, Feb. 28, 1857, 6 R. 739, Feb. 27, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 10; Heriot's Hospital v. Carnegys, Oct. 3

At advising,—

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891. Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

LORD TRAYNER.—In order to determine the question submitted to us, it is not necessary to consider the state of the titles to the lands in question prior to the year 1810. In that year Sir John Lowther Johnstone was vested in the lands. He was a singular successor, and unentered with the superior. By trust-disposition, dated 10th December 1810, Sir John disponed the lands in question to trustees for the following purposes, viz. :—(First), for payment of the expenses attending the execution of the trust; (second), for payment to himself, during his life and the subsistence of the trust, of a free yearly annuity of £3000, of which £400 was to be paid to his wife during her life and the subsistence of the trust; (third), for payment of all the just and lawful debts then owing by him; and (fourth), in the event of his death, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of any deed of settlement executed or to be executed by him in favour of his wife and children, or any other person or persons. Power was granted to the trustees (with Sir John's written consent) to sell any part of the lands disponed to them, and the proceeds of the lands, if any, so sold were directed to be applied "in the payment of all the just and lawful debts due by" the truster. The trust-deed further provided that the trustees should reconvey the remainder of the "said lands and estates and other heritable property which shall not have been disposed of" when said debts had been fully paid off, or, if required by writing under the hand of the truster, should so reconvey the lands to the truster at Martinmas 1814, whether the debts had been paid off or not. Upon this trust-deed the trustees were duly infeft, and they some years thereafter (as regards part of the lands in 1815, and the remainder in 1828) entered with the superior, making payment to him of a composition of a year's rent in respect of their entry. These entries were taken after Sir John's death, which happened in 1811. In execution of the trust purposes, some portions of the lands conveyed in trust were sold by the trustees, and the remainder were conveyed by the sole surviving trustee, Mr Masterton Ure, to Sir Frederic Johnstone (the second party to this case). In March 1860, Sir Frederic took infeftment by recording the conveyance in his favour, and, by virtue of the provisions of the Act of 1874, now stands entered with the superior.

The question now is, what is he bound to pay the superior in respect of such entry? Is it composition as a singular successor, or relief as heir of the last entered vassal?

From the state of the title as I have described it, it appears that the last entered vassal in the lands in question was Mr Masterton Ure, and Sir Frederic Johnstone does not claim to be his heir. So far therefore as regards the form in which the title has been made up, it seems plain enough that Sir Frederic, not being the heir of the last entered vassal, must as a singular successor be liable in respect of his entry in payment of composition. But it is maintained on his behalf that the trust-conveyance to Mr Ure, and his entry with the superior, did not create a new investiture, because the trust was either a trust for creditors or for behoof of the heir, or both, leaving the radical title in Sir John, whose heir Sir Frederic is. Having regard to certain recent decisions, which must be regarded, in the meantime at least, as sound, I think it must be conceded 1884, 12 R. 30; Marquis of Huntly v. Earl of Fife, July 20, 1887, 14 R. 1091; Stuart v. Jackson, Nov. 15, 1889, 17 R. 85; Duke of Athole v. Menzies, March 20, 1890, 17 R. 733; Duke of Athole v. Stewart, March 20, 1890, 17 R. 724.

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

that the implied entry (under the Statute of 1874) of trustees in whose favour a conveyance has been granted for behoof of creditors, or the implied entry of testamentary trustees who hold for behoof of the heir, does not create a new investiture, and in saying "implied entry," I do not intend to distinguish between the implied entry under the statute and the entry more formally given by the superior according to the law and practice as it existed prior to 1874, for the Act of 1874 put the two forms of entry on the same footing, and gives them the same effect. But making these concessions, it does not follow that the entry of Mr Ure did not create a new investiture. The trust-conveyance in favour of Mr Ure was not merely for behoof of creditors or for behoof of the truster's heir. It was a trust, in some measure, for behoof of the truster himself and his wife; it was a trust also (or might become so) for behoof of "any other person or persons" whom the truster might desire to favour by his settlement, and these might have been strangers. But, even disregarding these features of the trust conveyance, it is possible to suggest other reasons for regarding Mr Ure's entry as the creation of a new investiture. In the first place, it appears to me that Mr Ure's entry with the superior (Sir John, the truster, never having entered) was necessary to enable him to hold the trust lands conveyed to him on a valid title, and to enable him to give to the purchaser of that part of the lands which he sold such a title as the purchaser was entitled to demand, and was only bound to accept. The investiture of Mr Ure was necessary to enable him validly to carry out the trust purposes, if it was necessary for that end to sell any part of the truster's lands. In the second place, no one who acquired the trust lands or part thereof, from Mr Ure could be called on by the superior to enter or pay a casualty so long as Mr Ure survived. Why? Because during Mr Ure's lifetime the fee was full, and was full because of the investiture created by his entry. There was, in fact, no other investiture existing which the superior had recognised. I am of opinion that the entry of Mr Ure did create a new investiture, and that to hold so in the circumstances of this case is not going contrary to any of the recent decisions to which I have alluded. If the entry of Mr Ure created a new investiture, then, as I have said, Sir Frederic is liable in composition, because he is not the heir of that investiture.

But assume now that the entry of Mr Ure did not create a new investiture, what is the position of Sir Frederic? Claiming to enter as heir on payment merely of relief-duty, he must shew himself the heir of some investiture recognised by the superior. There is no such investiture. Sir John Lowther Johnstone (whose heir Sir Frederic is) was himself a singular successor in the lands, and was never entered, and (if Mr Ure's entry is set aside as not being a new investiture) the last entered vassals were persons entered much more than a century ago, whose heir Sir Frederic is not, and does not pretend to be. The case therefore comes to this, that Sir Frederic is neither the heir of Mr Ure, the last entered vassal, nor the heir of the vassal last before entered. He is not the heir of any investiture recognised by the superior. This fact distinguishes the present case broadly and essentially from the recent cases of Stuart v. Jardine (17 R. 85), Duke of Athole v. Menzies (17 R. 733), and Duke of Athole v. Stewart (17 R. 724). In all these cases the person claiming to be entered as heir was in point of fact, the heir of the last entered vassal, if (as was done) the intervening title of trustees was disregarded. Here, however, to disregard the title of Mr Ure does not enable Sir Frederic to connect himself as heir with any other investiture whatever.

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

vas maintained on behalf of Sir Frederic, however, that the superior's nation of Mr Ure's title had the effect of confirming all previous convey- nd infeftments, and that this operated as a confirmation of Sir John's title. deduced from this that Sir John's title having been thus confirmed, Sir c was now entitled to an entry as Sir John's heir on payment of relief. ite true that a superior's confirmation of a vassal's title has a retrospective All the conveyances granted, and infeftments taken, prior to the date charter of confirmation, are thereby confirmed, but they are confirmed transmissions, and to the effect of completing the title of the vassal in favour the confirmation is granted. The superior, by his subsequent ation, is debarred from stating any objection to such transmissions, on und that they were transmissions of lands held a me, to which his had not been given, or on any other ground. But I never heard it ed until now that such subsequent confirmation of prior transmissions and ents had the effect of enfranchising the different series of heirs, to whom, hose transmissions, the property had been destined or might have ed. There is no authority for such a view. Indeed, the retroactive such confirmation, and the limit of that effect, cannot be better stated the words of the 115th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation d) Act, 1868, which provides that "Every charter or writ (i.e., confirma- hether from the Crown or from a subject-superior, of whatever description, erate a confirmation of the whole prior deeds or conveyances necessary nfirmed in order to complete the investiture of the person obtaining it or charter." This was no new enactment; it was a declaration of the t then stood. The effect of the confirmation then being confined to what sary to the completion of the new investiture, there is no room, any an there is authority, for the view that such confirmation has the effect nchising the heirs under all or any of the previous transmissions. Such nisement is in no way necessary to "complete the investiture of the btaining the charter." If such enfranchisement did not follow as a ence of the charter of confirmation in favour of Mr Ure, Sir Frederic can benefit from that confirmation in the present question. It follows hat I have said that whether the entry of Mr Ure with the superior a new investiture or not, the position of Sir Frederic is not different. ot the heir of any investiture recognised by the superior, and must, e, as a singular successor, pay a composition.

RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Irrespective of the cases of the Duke of Athole rt, and the Duke of Athole v. Menzies, I should have no hesitation in this question in favour of the first party.

ifficulty has arisen entirely from these cases. I understood them to n the rule that, when trustees held for the heir of the truster, and dis- he estate to him in obedience to the directions of the trust-deed, the s not bound to pay more than relief-duty, provided that the title of the had been completed with the superior. Here the title of the truster was npleted with the superior during his lifetime. But inasmuch as the entered with the superior under a charter of confirmation, the base title h the truster held was confirmed, and of course confirmed as from its It appeared to me, therefore, that the present case might be brought he rule of the cases to which I have referred, in respect that the title of

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

the truster was completed with the superior, though not till after his death; for the charter of confirmation would draw back to the date of the base infeftment which it confirmed. But as one of the Judges who formed the majority of the Court thinks that we shall do no violence to these cases in deciding in favour of the Duke of Buccleuch, I conceive that I am entitled to proceed on my own view of the law, and in my opinion the vassal is liable for composition. I need not state the grounds of my opinion. They are sufficiently expressed in the case of the Duke of Athole v. Stewart.

LORD YOUNG.—The course of this case has been remarkable. It was originally heard in the month of July last, when Lord Lee was a Judge in this Division of the Court, and when I happened to be absent on Circuit. It was very fully heard, and then taken to avizandum. Our lamented brother wrote an opinion which I have had the advantage of seeing—as all your Lordships had—and it is in accordance with the view which Lord Rutherfurd Clark says he also held upon the reported cases. It is in favour of the second party. I concur in that opinion which I think it would be only fair to communicate to the parties.*

---

* "OPINION of the late LORD LEE.—The question in this case is, whether the Frederic Johnstone is liable in composition, or only in payment of the casualty of relief, in respect of his entry to certain subjects held of the Duke of Buccleuch and which may be described shortly as (1) Axletreewell, and (2) Torbeckhill.

"The form of his title to the subjects is a disposition executed by the last surviving trustee of his grandfather, Sir John Lowther Johnstone of Westerhall in his favour, as heir-male to his grandfather, and therefore the heir entitled to succeed under the trust-settlements therein recited.

"The trust-deed in favour of Sir John Lowther Johnstone's trustees was executed in 1810, and the purposes of it, so far as material, were (1) to pay debts, and with power to the trustees, with Sir John's consent, to sell such part of the lands as he and they should see proper; (2) in the event of Sir John's decease, to act as his trustees and executors, and to carry into effect the provisions contained in a deed of disposition and settlement executed by him in favour of his wife and children; (3) for reconveyance of the remaining lands 'when said debts are fully paid off, or at the term of Martinmas 1814,' but subject to a declaration that, in the event (which happened) of Sir John dying before a reconveyance, and his heir being a minor, the trust should continue till the debts were paid off. This deed contained an obligation to infeft, by the several infeftments and manners of holding, and also a procuratory of resignation, and the trustees obtained entry under it, in the manner after mentioned on payment of composition.

"Sir John Lowther Johnstone was not infeft in the subjects in question, either at the date of this trust-disposition, or at the date of his death, which took place in 1811.

"At these dates, the last entered vassals in the lands of Axletreewell, being the subjects No. 1, were James Douglas in liferent, and Archibald Douglas in fee; and the last entered vassal in the subjects (Torbeckhill and others) was Margaret Graham.

"It appears, however, from the case, that Sir John had a personal right to both subjects—(Firstly), as regards Axletreewell, as heir served to his uncle William Pulteney, and thereby in right of a decreet of sale and adjudication obtained in 1768 by William Alexander against James and Archibald Douglas and of a disposition and assignation of the lands and decreet, granted in 177[illegible] the said William Alexander in favour of the said Sir William Pulteney, his heirs and assignees whatsoever; and (secondly), as regards the Torbeckhill subjects, as heir of his cousin, Henrietta Laura Pulteney, Countess of Bath, the daughter and only child of the said Sir William Pulteney, and the

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

case raises, as was intended, a general question of considerable interest, is, I think, proper that I should state, as clearly as I can, my own views t of a decreet of sale and adjudication obtained by Sir William Pulteney 0 against Margaret Graham's disponee.

is set forth in the case that the trustees of Sir John Lowther Johnstone ntered with the superior in the first subjects by a charter of adjudication nfirmation, of date 27th March 1815; and in the other subjects by ter of adjudication in implement, of date 1828; and these deeds are l in the appendix; and it is one of the facts of the case that the trustees case paid a composition.

t it was contended for the superior that Sir Frederic Johnstone, acquir- ht by disposition from the trustees, must be regarded as a stranger to the ture, and was therefore liable in composition.

y opinion is, that this argument is ill founded, and that the superior is led from dealing with Sir Frederic Johnstone as a stranger to the investi- the charters granted to the trustees.

ese not only give entry to the trustees, as trustees, for the purpose (after nt of debts) of conveying the lands to Sir John Lowther Johnstone's heir, ey also confirmed the rights vested in Sir William Pulteney and his er, the Countess of Bath, and acknowledged the right of Sir John r Johnstone and his eldest son (Sir Frederic's father) to take up the suc- as heirs to Sir William Pulteney and his daughter. It is in respect of ht that Sir John's trust-disposition is confirmed by the two charters.

w, the effect of a confirmation (though we were not favoured with any ty on the subject) is well settled. It is thus stated by Professor Menzies, hen confirmation is obtained, it operates retro, validating the infeftment s date, and the superior is therefore excluded from demanding casualties may have fallen due between the date of the sasine and the confirmation, h before confirming he could have claimed these.' After giving certain ties and illustrations, he adds,—'The confirmation necessarily accreses y prior infeftment flowing from the author whose sasine is confirmed.'

is is supported by the doctrine of Stair (ii. 3, 15). 'Charters of confir- do deduce the rights to be confirmed. . . . These charters of con- on, whensoever granted, are drawn back to the date of the charters ed, which were absolutely null till confirmation, unless there be medium mentum, as a prior infeftment by confirmation, or upon resignation by the r; yea, though the infeftment by confirmation be after the death of the of the charter to be confirmed, if the superior do confirm it the confir- is drawn back, and will import the superior's passing from any casualty by the death of the author, unless these be reserved.' (See also Stair ii. and the authorities given in Ross' Leading Cases, Land Rights, vol. ii., 134.)

rd President Campbell's Session Papers, in the case of M'Dowall v. on, contain a note of his opinion thus: 'Can he claim as apparent heir his father was never publicly infeft? Will the charter of confirmation, so late as 1789, being after old Aikenhead's death, supply the defect? nfirmation draws back and makes the possession public from the begin- The intermediate death of the party infeft does not prevent the on of it. The objection, therefore, seems to me not to be good.'

ow, in the present case, I take by way of illustration the charter of cation and confirmation granted in 1815. It is not said that the other had any different or lesser effect in the question of casualties.

ter confirming the trust-disposition and the right of the trustees (but in lways for the uses and purposes specified), it deduces the right confirmed iting (1) the rights of the Douglases; (2) a decreet of sale in favour of m Alexander; (3) a disposition and assignation by Alexander in favour William Pulteney and his heirs and assignees; (4) the service of Sir Lowther Johnstone, as heir of line to his uncle, Sir William Pulteney; 5) the adjudication led by the trustees against Sir Frederic George

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

upon it, which I shall do more briefly by confining my remarks to the lands mentioned in the third paragraph of the special case. These lands I shall for brevity call by the single name of "Dornock."

In 1768 Dornock (using the name as that of the lands) belonged to James Douglas in liferent, and to his son Archibald in fee, and was held by them as vassals of the Duke of Buccleuch. In that year it was, by a decree of sale and adjudication, acquired by a creditor (William Alexander), who subsequently (in 1775) conveyed it to Sir William Pulteney and his heirs. On Sir William Pulteney's death, Sir John Lowther Johnstone expede a special service to him as his heir of line. The service is dated 1809, and was duly retoured to Chancery. These details are perhaps immaterial, and the general statement in the special case sufficient, viz.,—"Upon the death of the said Sir William Pulteney, he was succeeded in said lands (Dornock) by Sir John Lowther Johnstone of Westerhall, Bart., who was duly infeft therein."

It thus appears that Dornock passed out of the Douglas family (the Buccleuch vassals) in 1768, into the Pulteney family in 1775, that Sir John Lowther Johnstone of Westerhall was the heir of line of that family from 1809 till his death, which occurred in 1811, and that, as such, he possessed Dornock as proprietor. It does not appear when Archibald Douglas died. While he lived, the Duke of Buccleuch had no right to either casualty or relief-duty. On his death, if his heir was willing to enter, the Duke was entitled to relief-duty only, which, being only a few shillings, was not worth asking. If not, the Duke on the one hand was entitled to demand casualty (a year's rent), and Sir John Lowther Johnstone on the other was entitled, in return for the casualty

---

Johnstone, only lawful son and heir of Sir John, and as decerned, to enter himself as nearest and lawful heir in special to the said Sir William Pulteney, and it then confirms—(Firstly), the disposition of the lands by Archibald Douglas to William Alexander, 1769; (secondly), instrument of sasine following thereon in favour of William Alexander; (thirdly), disposition by William Alexander to the aforesaid Sir William Pulteney, 1775; (fourthly), an instrument of sasine following thereon in favour of the said Sir William Pulteney dated 2d May 1775, and registered in the General Register of Sasines the 8th June thereafter.

"The effect of this charter was to confirm the infeftment of Sir William Pulteney, and the adjudication led against Sir Frederic George Johnstone, as lawfully charged in the character of Sir John Johnstone's heir and representative; to procure himself served as nearest and lawful heir in special to the said Sir William Pulteney, as well as the trust-disposition in favour of the trustees and in virtue of which they completed their right.

"The adjudication so led against Sir Frederic George Johnstone, and followed by charter, was equivalent to a disposition by Sir William Pulteney in favour of Sir Frederic George Johnstone, as Sir John Johnstone's heir; and I think it impossible now to represent his son and heir, Sir Frederic Johnstone as a stranger to the investiture, or to distinguish the case from that of the trustees having obtained a disposition in trust from the last entered vassal, from his heir duly infeft.

"I therefore think that the case is ruled by the case of The Advocate-General v. Swinton (17 D. 21), and other cases in which it has been held that, if a composition be paid for a new investiture, the intervention of a trust to execute an entail, or to convey in a certain destination, will not render the disponee (being heir of the investiture) liable to pay composition as a singular successor.

"Sir Frederic Johnstone is only in form a singular successor, and, in my opinion, is entitled to obtain entry as an heir.

"I therefore answer the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative."

No. 123.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

year's rent, to demand an entry from the Duke, which should confirm the of his ancestor Sir William Pulteney, and make himself the entered vassal ne Duke, so that his heirs of line should be entitled in succession to take ock on payment of relief-duty only, that is, a few shillings. And this is lly true with respect to Sir John Lowther Johnstone's heir of line, viz., ldest son Sir Frederic Johnstone. The Duke, in short, was entitled, on ailure of the heir of Archibald Douglas to enter, to demand a casualty from eir for the time of the Pulteneys, who acquired the estate in 1775, and one lty only so long as Dornock remained in the Pulteney family, and did not pass to strangers.

l that I have said is, I think, too clear to be dwelt upon, irrespective of act which I have not yet adverted to, that Sir John Lowther Johnstone, ly before his death, executed a trust for behoof of creditors. Whether act, taken along with the manner in which the trustees made up their and ultimately divested themselves, so as to terminate the trust, entitles Duke to two casualties, is the general question in the case.

e trust is a very ordinary trust by an embarrassed proprietor to pay his out of surplus income, after making allowance for his maintenance, and sale if necessary, and in the end to restore the property to himself or his or as he might direct. There was no sale, at least of Dornock, and so, at ermination of the trust, it fell to be restored. It must, of course, have been ed to the truster himself had he lived, or to his eldest son, Sir Frederic, e survived. It happened that both were dead, and that the restoration o be made, and was in fact made, so long ago as 1860, to his grandson rederic John William Johnstone (the second party), who was then and is his heir-male, and so also the heir-male of Sir William Pulteney, who red Dornock in 1775. For thirty years after 1860 he possessed Dornock ut it having occurred to the Duke of Buccleuch or his advisers that he did herwise than as the heir-male of his father and grandfather (whose baronetcy herited), and so also of Sir William Pulteney, and that he was in truth a ger and singular successor. He was of course a stranger and singular suc- to Archibald Douglas; but that he was so to his own father and grand- seems an absurd proposition, and I am not surprised that for thirty years urred to no one as stateable.

the Duke has not been paid a casualty of a year's rent in respect of this of Dornock having been conveyed away from Archibald Douglas and his to Sir William Pulteney and his heirs, his present demand is well founded irected against the proper party, viz., the heir-male of Sir William Pul- now in possession, and otherwise I think it is as unfounded as his advisers irty years thought it was.

ave already pointed out that when Sir John Lowther Johnstone succeeded ornock, and entered on possession as heir of Sir William Pulteney, the of Buccleuch was entitled to demand a casualty (if Archibald Douglas's was unwilling to enter, which I shall assume he was), and that Sir John her Johnstone, on his part, was absolutely entitled (without any reference chibald Douglas's heir) to insist that, on payment of a casualty, he should ne the Duke's vassal with confirmation of his own title and that of his cessor, whose heir he was,—Sir William Pulteney. So standing the s of the Duke and Sir John hinc inde, the latter executed the trust-deed 810, and the trustees under it, acting in execution of the trust, and with the trust money, satisfied the Duke's claim to a casualty, and also the truster's right to be entered as vassal with confirmation of his own and Sir William Pulteney's title, with all the consequences attaching thereto. They thus, with the truster's money, and in pursuance of the trust, satisfied the Duke's claim and the truster's right. It is true, but I think immaterial, that the casualty was paid and the confirmation taken in 1815—four years or so after the truster's death. The Duke got the truster's money, and it is well settled that confirmation operates retro. Would it have affected the Duke's right on the succession of the second party in 1860 that the truster had survived the payment and confirmation of 1815, and died, say, in 1816?

No. 123.

Feb. 28, 1891. Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

But the trustees, quite superfluously, as I think, took in addition a confirmation of the trust-deed and their title under it. Lord Trayner has spoken as if this was necessary to enable them to give a title to a purchaser if it had so happened that they had occasion to sell. I cannot conceive any reason for thinking so. If the truster's title was confirmed as that of a vassal under the Duke, or indeed, whether or not, the trust-deed was good and valid, requiring no assent or recognition from the Duke, and any conveyance by the trustees in the due execution of it would be valid.

Let me put the case, a very possible one,—that the truster had survived the execution of the whole trust purposes, and thereupon demanded and obtained the reconveyance of Dornock to himself. Would he have taken it as a stranger heir and singular successor to his own trustees, who had it only temporarily by his voluntary deed in order to execute certain purposes of his and then restore it to him? It is said that the exigencies of the trust might have required the trustees to sell the land and convey it to a stranger, or that the truster might have altered his deed of April 1810 so as to require the trustees to convey it to strangers instead of to himself or to his heirs-at-law. How these possibilities bear on the case I fail to see. Had the land been conveyed to a stranger, whether by the trustees in execution of their trust, or in obedience to a lawful order of the truster, or by the truster or his heir on the termination of the trust, the superior would no doubt have enforced his rights as existing in that case.

Had the truster, before the execution of the trust, himself paid the casualty and got his title confirmed so as to be entered with the superior, or had the trustees done so, whether in his lifetime or after his death, and whether making up a title in the person of his heir (as they might have done) or not, it is, I think, clear that the superior could have no concern with the trust or its execution or the title of the trustees. Further, when the purposes of the trust were fulfilled, and, the land being unsold, the trustees denuded of it in favour of the truster, if alive, or his heir, as coming in his place, if dead, I think this could not be rationally regarded as an alienation of the land to strangers. Then does it make a difference that the trustees—superfluously or not (I think quite superfluously)—had their own trust-title confirmed at the same time? The superior was not, and could not be, thereby prejudiced, or anyone thereby benefited to his loss or possible loss. Lord Trayner has, I think, suggested that the entry of the trustees was necessary to enable them to hold the lands and give a good title to a purchaser. But this, I think very clearly, is not so, and I can imagine no reason for the suggestion. Further, it is said that a purchaser could not have been called on to pay a casualty while the survivor of the trustees lived. But a purchaser from trustees is assuredly much better protected against a demand for a casualty by the truster or his heir (the real seller although by the instru-

No. 123.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Duke of Buccleuch v. Johnstone.

tality of trustees) being entered. There has been, I think, throughout the ment of the first party some misapprehension or forgetfulness of the nature legal character of a trust such as we have here to deal with. It is merely inery created by the true owner of the land for his own legitimate purposes, who, in all the trustees do, is using them as his instruments. His owner- does not cease while he lives, and it passes to his heir, or according to his when he dies, notwithstanding of the trust, although subject to it while it . On the termination of the trust, the land not alienated in the execution must be restored to the original owner or his heir, legal or voluntary, un- ened of the trust, and so as to be exactly of the character and quality it before the trust existed. The legal character of the second party's right in to have the lands conveyed to him cannot be estimated except with ence to the truster's right had he survived, for his only right was that of ruster's heir-at-law, which he was. He had no other. Then what was the er's right—that is, would have been had he survived? I should say the ership of the lands, which he held subject only to the burden of the trust h he had executed, and so to be ended eventually by the divestiture of the ees. That accordingly was the second party's position in 1860. Lord ner says he was not the heir of Mr Ure, the last entered vassal. True, but er was the truster, whose right (and only whose right) he had. A truster ot be the heir of his own trustee when the trust terminates, and neither is (the truster's) heir. The language is inapplicable. He takes not as the of his trustee, but as owner of the lands with his ownership about to be rdened of the trust which has been executed. Of course neither was he eir of the vassal last entered before Mr Ure, if you mean Mr Archibald las. But he was the heir of the truster, and if the truster had, either nally, or through the instrumentality of his trustees, paid the casualty due spect of the lands passing to him and his heirs from Archibald Douglas and eirs,—there could be no claim upon him as the truster's heir, any more upon the truster himself, to pay it over again on the termination of the . The opinion which I have expressed, and the reasons for it, are obviously cable to all the lands specified in the case, and the conclusion is that, in udgment, the first question ought to be answered in the negative, and the d in the affirmative.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion h Lord Trayner has just delivered, and I concur with it in every respect. the present case been on all-fours with the cases of the Duke of Athole, hould of course have followed their authority. But it appears to me that, he reasons which Lord Trayner has stated, they are quite distinguishable. judgment of the Court will therefore be in favour of the first party.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative, and found and declared accordingly.

ROBERT STRATHERN, W.S.—WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 124.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Gilchrist v. Morrison.

AGNES KINNAIRD OR GILCHRIST AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers). —Dickson—Salvesen.

JANE GOODLET OR MORRISON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents). —Murray—Brodie-Innes.

itle to Sue—Reduction—Proving of the tenor.—Where the heir-at-law and next of kin of a person deceased brought an action for reduction of certain

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

testamentary deeds executed by the deceased on the ground of facility and circumvention, and for declarator that the succession of the deceased was to be regulated by a prior testamentary deed under which they were residuary legatees, the pursuers did not produce the prior deed founded on, and the defenders alleged that it had been destroyed animo revocandi. The pursuers then added an averment that they were respectively heir-at-law and next of kin of the deceased. Held that having the alternative title of heirs ab intestato and disponees under the deed alleged to have been revoked, they had a title to sue a reduction of later deeds granted to their prejudice, and that the validity of these deeds fell to be decided in the first place (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood (Ordinary) who had sisted process in order that a proving of the tenor of the prior deed might be brought).

1st Division. Ld. Wellwood. C.

ON 1st July 1890 Mrs Agnes Kinnaird or Gilchrist, widow, and William and Jane Alexander Gilchrist, children, of the late John Gilchrist, Leith, brought an action against Mrs Jane Goodlet or Morrison, Leith, sole executor and universal legatory under a last will and testament bearing to be executed on 6th February 1890 by Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy, and general disponee and donee under disposition and deed of gift bearing to be executed on 6th February by the said Mrs Purdy, and also against William Rew, merchant, Leith, and William Asher S.S.C., Leith, trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement bearing to be executed by Mrs Purdy on 20th January 1890, concluding for reduction of the said three deeds, for declarator that a trust-disposition and settlement executed on 16th December 1889 by the said Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy was the deed by which the succession to the means and estate left by the said deceased Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy fell to be regulated, and that the pursuers were entitled to the provisions made in their favour by the said last mentioned trust-disposition and settlement; and for decree ordaining Mrs Morrison to count and reckon for her intromissions with the estate on that footing.

The pursuers stated (cond. 5), that Mrs Purdy, the deceased, was the elder daughter of the said John Gilchrist, the husband of the first named pursuer and father of the other pursuers. (Cond. 10) "About the middle of December [1889] she sent for the family law-agent, Mr Asher, and gave him instructions to make a fresh will, as she knew her illness was incurable, and she wished to make a final settlement of her affairs in prospect of an early death. Mr Asher accordingly prepared a trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by her on the 16th day of December 1889, and by which she conveyed her whole means and estate to Mr Asher and his managing clerk, Mr John Rose, whom she appointed her trustees and executors." The substance of the will was payment of debts, &c., and of certain legacies, including one of £500 to the defender Mrs Morrison, and of the residue to the pursuer Mrs Gilchrist in liferent, and to the other pursuers in fee. "The said will was carefully prepared by the instructions of Mrs Purdy, and it was fully considered by her before she signed it. The said deed contained the real wishes of the testatrix with regard to the disposal of her estate after her death. A copy of the said trust-disposition and settlement is herewith produced." The pursuers then set forth the grounds of reduction of the deeds libelled (under which the pursuers were entirely excluded from the succession), which were facility and circumvention.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The deeds sought to be reduced not being the deeds of the late Mrs Purdy, ought to be set aside, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) Separatim, The said deeds ought to be reduced, in respect that at the dates when the same were executed the deceased Mrs Purdy was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, and that the said Mrs Morrison and John Goodlet, or one or other of them, taking advantage of her said weakness and facility, did by fraud or circumvention impetrate the said deeds from Mrs Purdy to her lesion. (3) The trust-disposition and settlement of 16th December 1889, being the deed regulating the succession to the deceased Mrs Purdy's means and estate, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders lodged answers in which they denied the facility and circumvention alleged, and in answer to cond. 10 averred;—(Ans. 10) "The pursuers are called on to produce this deed or to prove that any such deed was executed and retained by Mrs Purdy as the final expression of her testamentary intentions. It is explained that on the 28th January 1890, the testatrix being then of sound disposing mind, and fully understanding and comprehending the legal results of such action, sent for Mr Peter Peterson Slater, solicitor and law-agent, and after requesting him to act as her agent, explained to him that the said trust-disposition and settlement in the said condescendence mentioned had been in fact revoked by the will prepared by Mr Asher, and executed on the 20th January, as mentioned in condescendence 13, and desired Mr Slater to destroy the same in her presence as useless and as not expressing her will, which Mr Slater accordingly did. Such destruction was deliberately done animo revocandi, and the said trust-disposition and settlement is not now in existence."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

The pursuers at adjustment made this addition to cond. 10;—"With reference to the statement in answer, the pursuers have no knowledge whether the will in question was destroyed, or by whom it was destroyed. If Mrs Purdy destroyed it as stated by the defender, she did so in consequence of the defender having by fraud or circumvention induced her to do so while she was weak and facile and easily imposed upon. On the deeds under reduction being reduced, the pursuers will, if necessary, bring a proving of the tenor of the will in question."

The pursuers also made the following addition to their cond. 5;—"The pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law, and the pursuer Jane Alexander Gilchrist is one of her next of kin."

On 15th January the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sists process in hoc statu in order that the pursuers may, if so advised, raise an action of proving the tenor of the trust-disposition and settlement executed on 16th December 1889 by Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy, upon which they found; meantime reserves all questions of expenses." *

---

* "OPINION.—This action is laid entirely on the footing that the deed by which the succession to the means and estate of the deceased Mrs Purdy falls to be regulated is a trust-disposition and settlement dated 16th December 1889, under which the pursuers are beneficiaries to a large extent. The pursuers claim as beneficiaries under that deed, and the conclusions of the summons and the statements on record, especially those in condescendence 10, shew that that deed is the title on which they rely. It is true that they now state that the pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law; but so little was that in view when the action was raised that the fact was not stated in the original condescendence.

"Now the deed of 16th December 1889 is not forthcoming. It is stated by the defender, and there is little reason to doubt the truth of the statement so far, that it was destroyed on the 28th of January 1890, about a week after the execution by Mrs Purdy of a trust-disposition and settlement dated 20th January 1890, which is the first in date of the deeds under reduction. In these circumstances, I think it is necessary for the pursuers to prove the tenor of the deed

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had a double title, as disponees under the deed alleged to have been destroyed, and as heirs of the deceased ab intestato. They were entitled to plead these titles alternatively to the effect of insisting on this reduction. That took the present case out of the principle of Shaw[1] referred to by the Lord Ordinary, for there the pursuer's only title was the lost deed. A proving of the tenor was not a suitable way of trying what would virtually be an issue of facility and circumvention, for the question in the proving would be the state of the mind of the deceased at the date of the alleged revocation. Such a question ought to be tried by a jury upon an issue in the usual terms. The proper course was to dispose of the validity of the deeds sought to be reduced first, for if they should be reduced the interest of the present parties was reversed, as Mrs Morrison was a beneficiary under the deed alleged to have been destroyed, and the pursuers as heirs ab intestato would have an interest to reduce that deed.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was laid upon a deed which was not in existence, and a proving of the tenor was an essential preliminary to any action on a lost document.[2] It could not be founded on as giving a title to sue. Nor could the pursuers plead their alleged title as heirs, for the title of heir became active only if there was no deed to displace it; under the former law, the heir could not have sued a reduction ex capite lecti if the effect of reduction was to set up a prior deed. The whole scheme of the present summons was that there was such a prior deed. The question whether a testamentary deed had been destroyed by the deceased animo revocandi could quite satisfactorily be disposed of in a proving of the tenor.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—In this case there is no question that the averments on record are sufficient to sustain the reductive conclusions. The only question is as to whether the pursuers have a title to sue. There is no doubt that when the action was brought into Court the pursuers thought the deed of 16th December 1889 was still in existence, or at least did not know whether it was destroyed or not, and there can be no doubt that that was the title on which the action was originally brought, and that accounts for the

---

of 16th December 1889 on which they found. In doing this, they will have to prove the casus amissionis; and, if it is true that the will was destroyed by the orders of Mrs Purdy, to prove that she was not then in such a state of mind as to be capable of effectually cancelling or revoking it. The question to be tried in the action of proving the tenor will therefore practically be the same as that sought to be raised in this action. But an action of proving the tenor proceeds in the Inner-House; and therefore the present process must be sisted until the pursuers take steps to set up the deed of 16th December 1889—Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, and Bonthrone v. Ireland, 10 R. 779.

"The pursuers strongly maintain that William Gilchrist, being heir-at-law, and entitled to succeed to the heritage left by Mrs Purdy if she died intestate, he is, in any case, entitled to sue the action, and challenge the deeds under reduction. As I have already indicated, the summons is so framed that I do not think it can proceed as an action at the instance of the heir. But, further, if the pursuers' averments are true, William Gilchrist, as heir-at-law, was cut out by the deed of 16th December 1889, and the parties really entitled to challenge the subsequent deeds are the disponees or beneficiaries under that deed."

[1] Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, June 13, 1876, 3 R. 813.

[2] Gordon v. Robertson, Oct. 28, 1873, 11 S. L. R. 35.

[3] Bonthrone v. Ireland, March 15, 1883, 10 R. 779.

No. 124.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Gilchrist v. Morrison.

laratory and accounting conclusions. However, when the case was ught into Court this explanation was made by the defenders,—"It is lained that on the 28th January 1890 the testatrix, being then of sound posing mind, and fully understanding and comprehending the legal results uch action, sent for Mr Peter Peterson Slater, solicitor and law-agent, and r requesting him to act as her agent, explained to him that the said trust- osition and settlement in the said condescendence mentioned had been in revoked by the will prepared by Mr Asher, and executed on the 20th uary as mentioned in condescendence 13, and desired Mr Slater to destroy same in her presence as useless, and as not expressing her will, which Mr er accordingly did. Such destruction was deliberately done animo revoc-, and the said trust-disposition and settlement is not now in existence." reply made to that by the pursuers was this,—"With reference to the ment in answer, the pursuers have no knowledge whether the will in ques- was destroyed, or by whom it was destroyed. If Mrs Purdy destroyed it ated by the defender, she did so in consequence of the defender having by d or circumvention induced her to do so while she was weak and facile and y imposed upon." Upon these averments being made by the defender on rd as to the destruction of this deed, which the pursuers supposed to be in ence when they brought this action, and which they do not now admit to estroyed, this averment was put on record,—"The pursuer William Gilchrist rs Purdy's heir-at-law, and the pursuer Jane Alexander Gilchrist is one of next-of-kin"; and that averment is not disputed in point of fact.

ow, from what I have read of the record it is obvious that the real question sue between the parties here is the state of the testatrix Mrs Purdy's mind e date 20th January, when the first of the deeds sought to be reduced was uted, and on 6th February, when the two other deeds were executed. That e real question at issue between the parties—whether or not these three s ought to be reduced on the ground stated. That is the real question with h we have to deal, and I think also that no one could doubt that that tion would best be tried in the usual way before a jury with the issue, her the deed has been obtained by fraud and circumvention in the usual s. I think that unless there be some strong ground to the contrary, that d be the proper way to try the question at issue between the parties in this unless indeed the pursuer has no title to sue. I think that the case would uch better so tried than as the course indicated by the Lord Ordinary d point at, namely, incidentally merely in course of a proving of the tenor, h would go to shew the state of Mrs Purdy's mind on 28th January, when s said to have destroyed the deed in question, and which, if that fact were lished, would no doubt indicate her state of mind at or about the time these deeds were destroyed, and might afford inference one way or other, would not decide the question between the parties to this case, for it is not tate of mind on 28th January that is the question, but the state of mind 0th January.

think it is clear also that the pursuers have a double title to insist in this n. It is obvious and set forth in this record—and perfectly sufficiently orth in this record—that the pursuer William Gilchrist is the heir-at-law, that the pursuer, Miss Gilchrist, his sister, is one of the next of kin of Mrs y. That being so, if the deed of 16th December is not in existence clear that they have a good title to try this case. That is quite clear, and if the deed of 16th December has not been destroyed—and the pursuers do not know whether it is destroyed or not—and if it is produced before the trial, they have a perfectly good title. The other is the title of heir-at-law, but they have a perfectly good title on which to try the question here. If the first deed had been the only title upon which the pursuers had to rely, I should on the authority of the case of Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, and on the principle of it, have had no doubt whatever that the course pursued by the Lord Ordinary was the right one, namely, that if that had been the sole title it would have been necessary to bring a proving of the tenor—either to produce it, or, if not recoverable, to proceed by way of proving the tenor first before they could go on with the action. But that is not the state of the title, for as I have already pointed out, the only effect of this first deed is not to destroy the pursuers' title to sue but to give another and equally good title to sue. If it is not produced or not proved, then they are respectively heir-at-law and next of kin.

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

That being so, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered. I think in this case the pursuers have a perfectly good title to try the question here on issues in the usual form. It may be that after the leading conclusions of the action are decided in one way or another, it may be necessary for the further progress of this action then to have a proving of the tenor. That may be quite possible. If it should be that these deeds are set aside by the verdict of a jury, then it may be that the pursuers will not be enabled to go on with the declaratory and accounting conclusions without putting themselves in a position to insist in these. But if the main question is settled in one way or another, I think that will clear the way for the proper disposal of the remainder. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor should be altered, and the case tried by a jury.

Lord M'Laren.—If there had been no averment in this action as to the pursuers, that one of them stands in the relation of heir-at-law, and the other in that of next of kin to the defunct, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary that this action could not proceed without a proving of the tenor of the lost deed. position, for I think no one can pursue a reduction founding on the title of his ponee without being liable to be called upon as a condition of prosecuting the case to produce the deed which he asserts to be his title. Admittedly the pursuers are not in a condition to produce the deed which they libel, because it has been destroyed—they say destroyed under circumstances which do not affect its validity, but that is a matter which I think would have to be investigated as a condition of establishing the title to sue in the character of disponee. Now when the summons was originally brought into Court, the character of disponee was the only title alleged by the pursuers. Since then they have apparently without objection amended their condescendence by asserting a title of heir-at-law and next of kin. I confess it would have been more satisfactory to my mind if that amendment had been made by leave of the Court, by minute of amendment and interlocutor following upon it. There has been an amendment of that nature made already, but that does not touch this question; it is an amendment having relation to the character of the defenders. But as I should at anyrate have been prepared to consent to such an amendment if it had been asked for, and as I understand your Lordships think it is within the power of the pursuer on revisal to make such an addition to his condescendence.

I am quite satisfied to deal with the case as one in which the pursuers now found on the double title of disponees and also of heirs ab intestato. In the second of these characters they are clearly entitled to follow out this action, because the title of heir and next of kin is always a good title to challenge any deed whatsoever alleged to be granted by a deceased person, and challengeable on these grounds. Therefore, while sympathising with the Lord Ordinary's desires to enforce strictness of pleading in matters of title, I think that the objection that seemed to his Lordship to be insuperable may be got over, and that this action ought to be allowed to proceed. I concur with Lord Adam in thinking that if it turns out that the real interests of the pursuers rest upon anything in the deed, it would then be necessary to set up the deed by some subsequent procedure before operative effect could be given to it.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that if the only title of the pursuers of this action had been that of disponees under the destroyed deed, the course which the Lord Ordinary has adopted would have been the right one, because until that deed was either produced or the tenor of it proved, they could not come to Court at all with a title to challenge what has been done. But the character of heir-at-law on the part of one pursuer, and that of one of the next of kin on the part of another, removes that difficulty altogether, because whether the destroyed deed is to be set up again or not, they are quite entitled to have the deed which has been granted by the deceased to their prejudice set aside if they can make out that the testatrix was not of sound disponing mind at the date of the deed, or was in a state of facility and was circumvented by the defender. The effect of a verdict setting aside the deeds made by the testatrix will be merely this, that these deeds will have no effect whatever; but that will not settle the question whether the deed which is said to have been destroyed, and of which the tenor is sought to be proved, is to be set up or not; but the parties, when decree of reduction has been pronounced, will be in a position then to reconsider their interest in the two events of the destroyed deed being set up, or of their acquiescing in its destruction. We do not know exactly what the interests of the pursuers are under that original destroyed disposition, but if there are interests created by that disposition which are adverse to the interest of the heir and next of kin it will then be a question whether the proving of the tenor might not settle the question between the parties; and therefore I think the logical order of the proceeding is to settle in the first place whether the testatrix was of sound disponing mind, or was circumvented in the granting of the deeds which are now maintained and set up by the defenders. And I therefore come to exactly the same conclusion as Lord Adam, that it is quite unnecessary to consider at present what the effect of a decree of reduction may be.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remit to adjust issues to try the question whether the deeds of 20th January and 6th February 1890 were not the deeds of the testatrix, or whether she was in a state of facility and weakness and was circumvented by the defender."

STUART & STUART, W.S.—SNODY & ASHER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

GEORGE TAIT, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—M'Lennan.
JOHN JOHNSTON, Respondent.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Process—Citation—Statute 1592, cap. 141—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 77), secs. 3, 4.—A service copy of a petition in a Sheriff Court was sent by registered letter to the defender, with a citation bearing to be executed by A B, a law-agent, but it was not signed by A B, but by C D, another law-agent, for A B. The execution returned upon the petition was in the statutory form, and was signed by A B.

In a suspension of a decree in absence obtained against the defender, he pleaded that the citation was invalid.

Held that as the execution returned upon the petition had not been reduced, the defender was barred from objecting to the citation.

Opinion (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the citation was valid.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Process—Union of several counties into one sheriffdom—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 92), sec. 4—Sheriffs Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 86), secs. 4, 5, 6, 12.—In a sheriffdom in which several counties are combined the granting of a warrant to cite a defender to appear at a Court in a county which is not the county of his domicile, is a matter within the discretion of the Sheriff.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

ON 7th August 1890 John Johnston, joiner, Innerleithen, raised an action for £50, 17s. 3d., as the amount of the balance of an account, against George Tait, Woodside Cottage, Innerleithen, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

A warrant to cite, dated 7th August 1890, was pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh (Orphoot), ordaining Tait, if he intended to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge appearance with the Clerk of Court at Edinburgh.

A copy of the petition and warrant was sent by post to Tait, with a schedule of citation bearing to be executed by Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., law-agent, and to be signed for him by T. H. Lang Guthrie, solicitor. An execution in terms of the statutory schedule, written upon the principal petition, was signed by Marcus J. Brown.*

On 12th September 1890 decree in absence was taken against Tait, who had received the citation and had corresponded with Johnston's agent with regard to the claim, but had lodged no defences.

A charge on the decree was given.

On 13th October 1890 Tait brought a suspension of the decree and charge, on the grounds set forth in his pleas in law, which were;—1. The complainer having no residence or place of business within the county of Midlothian, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the

* The Citation Amendment Act, 1882, enacts by sec. 3, " . . . In any civil action any summons or warrant of citation of any person . . . may be executed . . . . by an enrolled law-agent by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant or judicial intimation is to be served, . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons, . . . with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, and such posting shall constitute a valid and legal citation."

Section 4 enacts, inter alia,—"(3) The execution to be returned by the officer or law-agent shall be accompanied by the post-office receipt for the registered letter: The execution returned by a law-agent shall for all purposes be equivalent to an execution by any officer of Court: The execution may be in the form contained in the first schedule hereto."

The schedule bears,—"This summons . . . executed by me, . . . law-agent . . . (Signature of Agent.)"

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

Lothians and Peebles or his Substitutes sitting at Edinburgh as Judges of the Sheriff Court of the county of Midlothian, and, separatim, in the circumstances stated, a citation to the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh was not a citation which the complainer was bound to obey. (2) The proceedings complained of being incompetent and inept, in respect of no jurisdiction over the complainer, suspension and interdict should be granted as craved, with expenses. (3) Separatim, The complainer never having been cited to the said Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, the decree pronounced against him is inept, and the same, with all that has followed thereon, should be suspended as craved.

He denied that he was indebted to Johnston in the sum sued for.

The respondent pleaded that the statements of the complainer were irrelevant, and that the decree and proceedings following thereon were regular and formal.

On 7th February 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first, second, and third pleas in law for the complainer: Repels the reasons of suspension," &c.* The statutes cited at the debate are quoted in the opinion of his Lordship.

---

* "OPINION.— . . . . The statute does not expressly require that the law-agent who serves the summons shall sign the schedule of citation. But it was maintained that this is required by the Statute 1592, cap. 141, which requires that 'all copies of summounds and letters quhilkes sall be delivered to ony party be subscrived by the officer executor thereof.'

"It would appear that the documents to which this Act refers are the schedules of citation, and not the principal writs themselves—Izatt v. Robertson, 25th January 1840, 2 D. 476, 12 Scot. Jur. 303, and Bruce v. Hall there referred to. But I am under the apprehension that before 1882 (except in the cases to which the Act 34 and 35 Vict. cap. 42 applies) the formalities of citation on summonses in the Sheriff Court were not regulated by that Act, but by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 119, sec. 23, and the relative Act of Sederunt, 10th July 1839, sec. 13. There is no statutory form of a schedule of citation, and its signature by the officer is not required expressly by either of these enactments, although, perhaps, such a requirement may be implied in the section of the statute, while the presence of a witness at the execution and the signature of the officer on each page of the summons is expressly required by the Act of Sederunt.

"That requirement is not repeated in the Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882, and, of course, there is no room for a witness in the case of service by registered letter, and I am not at present prepared to hold that the signature of the law-agent, who is said in the schedule to make the service, is a statutory requirement. If it be, I should think it a very loose and dangerous practice to find a schedule signed by one law-agent for another, and should have great difficulty in holding that the schedule of citation in this case was signed by Mr Brown.

"But I think it is not necessary to decide that point absolutely, because no objection has been taken to the agent's execution, which, by the Citation Act, is equivalent to an officer's execution; and it appears to be still in accordance with our practice to refuse to entertain an objection to the schedule of citation when the execution is in form and unreduced—Calder v. Calder, 20th December 1825, 4 S. 331; Ramsay v. Pettigrew, 13th December 1828, 7 S. 193; Macqueen v. Clyne's Trustees, 20th May 1834, 12 S. 610, 6 Scot. Jur. 332. I think, therefore, that this ground of suspension cannot be sustained.

"II. The complainer by his first plea, as originally drawn, and by his second plea objects to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff when sitting as Judge of the Sheriff Court of the county of Midlothian.

"I am of opinion that the plea of no jurisdiction cannot be sustained. The question depends on the provisions of the statutes by which certain counties have been united into one sheriffdom. One or two of the counties in Scotland have been united as one sheriffdom for a long time back, but there have been

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The question raised was not merely one of jurisdiction. The complainer (assuming the jurisdic-

only two statutes recently passed on the subject. The first is the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 92, by which the union of various counties is provided for when vacancies should occur, and sec. 4 provides that when a vacancy should occur in the sheriffdom of Peebles it should be united with the county of Midlothian into one sheriffdom. The later Act, which is the Act directly applicable, is the Sheriffs Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86. By secs. 4, 5, and 6 provision is made for the union of the counties of Midlothian, Linlithgow, Haddington, and Peebles into one sheriffdom, to be called the Sheriffdom of the Lothians and Peebles; and by sec. 12 it is enacted, that every union of counties into one sheriffdom 'shall be deemed to be a complete union to all intents and purposes, in so far as regards the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of procurators before the Courts of the Sheriff: And the several counties of any such united sheriffdom shall not be thereafter regarded as separate sheriffdoms or jurisdictions, in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and the procurators of the Sheriff Court.'

"In the face of these absolute and comprehensive words it seems impossible to deny the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles in this case. Counsel for the complainer referred to sec. 6 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70, which provides that a person having a place of business in a county shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff thereof, although domiciled in another county, if cited personally, or at his dwelling-place, with power to the Sheriff to remit such action 'to the Court of the defender's domicile in another sheriffdom,' and to sec. 12, which, by its first subsection, provides for citation in such cases.

"The argument, as I understood it, was, that because the word county was used and not sheriffdom it was to be inferred that but for the Act the Sheriff in one county, forming part of a united sheriffdom, would not have had jurisdiction over a defender who had a place of business in another county, forming part of the same sheriffdom. But I think the inference inadmissible. The statute does not profess to do more than confer jurisdiction. It says nothing about the seat of the Court at which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. It confers jurisdiction in language which is not a whit more clear or absolute than that of sec. 12 of the Act of 1870. I do not think it applies to the jurisdiction of a Sheriff over the divisions of a united county at all. If it does, it adds nothing in language or in substance to his power, and I think that the use of the word 'sheriffdom' at the close of the section shews that there was no intention of drawing any distinction between a county and a sheriffdom.

"Reference was made to Edwards v. The Inverness and Aberdeen Railway Company, 24th April 1862, 4 Irv. 185, where the Sheriff, sitting in the Small Debt Court at Banff, dismissed an action of damages against the railway company on the ground of no jurisdiction. The statutory domicile of the railway company was Inverness, but it had been cited at Keith, in Banffshire. The pursuer appealed to the Circuit Court at Inverness, and seems to have argued that there was jurisdiction because Keith was a principal station. The appeal was dismissed. The grounds of judgment do not appear quite clearly. But it was pointed out that Lords Neaves and Ardmillan both indicated that there might have been a difference had the action been brought in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, in which county the injury happened; and it was argued that, as Elgin and Banff were united counties, it could, if the respondent's argument were sound, have made no difference as to the question of jurisdiction whether the action was brought at Banff or at Elgin. It does not appear, however, that the attention of the Judges was called to the point at all, and they do not purport to decide it, nor, indeed, allude to it.

"III. The further question is this, whether, admitting the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, it was competent to convene the defender to the Sheriff Court at

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.

Tait v. Johnston.

tion) maintained that the only proper place at which to cite him was Peebles, the head burgh of his county, and that there only was he bound

Edinburgh, and entertain a cause against him in that Court, or, whether the complainer is now entitled to say that he was only bound to attend the Court of the Sheriff at Peebles, the head burgh of the county in which he was resident?

"This is not a question of jurisdiction exactly, but rather about the conditions of its exercise, and especially about the Court at which it can be competently exercised. It is not in this case complicated by any question as to the power of the Sheriff-clerk to sign the warrant of citation, because the warrant is signed by the Sheriff-substitute, about whose power there is no question. The point appears a difficult one, and there is, so far as I have been able to discover, hardly any authority in our books on the subject. The only similar reported case, so far as I am aware, is Dowie v. Douglas, 30th May 1817, Fac. Coll., which it may be worth while merely to refer to, but as I do not see that it can be used as an authority either way it is not necessary to advert to it further. I may refer also to Ersk. i. 4, 5, where he treats of the exercise of a Sheriff's jurisdiction at the head burgh of a county, or of the division of a county, and he gives as an example and illustration 'the shire of Clydesdale,' which in his time had been separated into three divisions, but he does not affirm that it would be incompetent to exercise jurisdiction at the head burgh of one division over an inhabitant of another division.

"Allusion may also be made to the Act for the regulation of the Commissary Courts, 1823, 4 Geo. IV. cap. 97, which by sec. 6 provides that where two counties are under the jurisdiction of one Sheriff they shall constitute one commissariot; and to 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 26, which authorises the Sheriff of two counties to hold Commissary Courts in both counties if he shall think proper. The inference is legitimate that he could, if he chose, exercise his jurisdiction, at least as commissary, in one of the counties over persons resident in another, and that seems simply in consequence of two commissariots being united.

"It is argued, on the one hand, that before the union of the counties it was the right of the defender to be convened at the Sheriff Court in his own county, and that there are no words in the statute to deprive him of that right; that the object of establishing resident Sheriff-substitutes and local Courts was just to make this right effectual; and that although there might be no great hardship in this case still there was some hardship, and the hardship would be very great if in some of the northern counties it were held to be in the power of a pursuer to compel a defender to come from one county to another in the same sheriffdom.

"On the other hand, it was maintained that, seeing the complainer resided within the territory of the Sheriff, he was bound to obey his citation judicially given, and that there was neither principle nor authority for denying to the Sheriff the power to convene any person within his territory to any established seat of his Court; that it was within the power of a Sheriff, by an order of Court, to determine to what seat of Court persons resident in the different districts of his sheriffdom should be convened; that this was a matter safely left to his discretion and not vested in any other authority, and that that power of the Sheriff had been exercised in various cases in which more than one seat of the Court had been established in a county; that the intention of the statute was to abolish all distinctions between the different counties united into one sheriffdom so far as the administration of the law was concerned.

"Having regard to the very comprehensive language of the statute uniting the counties, I am unable to sustain the complainer's contention, or to restrict the Sheriff in the exercise of his jurisdiction without some definite authority, statutory, judicial, or institutional. It is true that it would be highly inconvenient if a pursuer were allowed to call a defender to the Court in a united sheriffdom most convenient to himself, without regard to the residence of the defender, but it is not necessary to hold that a pursuer has that power. The matter is under the control of the Sheriff, who can regulate it by an order of Court, and can, if he thinks fit, refuse to issue his warrant of citation against a defender more suitably amenable to another Court, or can perhaps deal with to answer the citation.[1] Were it otherwise, a pursuer who resided in Shetland might convene a defender also residing there to appear at Wick. A defender was not bound to submit to that. (2) A citation must be made by the agent who returned the execution, and by no other. Here it was not so, and this was so plainly a null citation that no reduction was necessary.

No. 125. Feb. 28, 1891. Tait v. Johnston.

Counsel for respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When a statute enacts that certain counties named are to be united into one sheriffdom, and are not thereafter to be regarded as separate sheriffdoms or jurisdictions, it is perfectly clear on the face of it that a citation by the Sheriff to the head burgh of the principal of the counties united cannot be bad, although it may be inconvenient for a defender residing in another part of the jurisdiction to be cited there. At the same time, no one can doubt that the Sheriff, upon a representation being made to him that it would seriously inconvenience the defender to defend the action in the place to which he has been cited, would consider that objection and dispose of it. It is not to be assumed that the Sheriff exercises his powers in an unreasonable manner. If all the business of Edinburgh were attempted to be removed to Peebles or Linlithgow, some means would speedily be found for putting an end to such an outrage of public decency. The public trusts the Sheriff to conduct the business of his Courts properly.

Here the defender never asked the Sheriff to remit the whole case to Peebles. I think the first plea in law bad. As to the second plea of not being properly cited, I am of opinion that as the execution bears that the defender was duly cited, and no steps have been taken to set aside execution, it also falls to be repelled. I consider the whole proceedings in this case idle.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion, but I would like to state further that I see no objection to the citation in this case.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordship upon all the grounds stated.

THE COURT adhered.

ANDREW TOSH, S.S.C.—MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 126. Mar. 3, 1891. Barbour v. Chalmers & Co.

A. H. F. BARBOUR AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—M'Kechnie Howden.

D. & J. CHALMERS & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—Jameson—Crole.

Process—Appeal—Removing—Act 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 1[illegible] sec. 44.—Where a landlord obtained decree of removal against a tenant, on ground that he had no title to possess, an objection was taken to the competency of an appeal, on the ground that suspension in terms of the 44th section of Judicature Act was the only competent remedy. Objection repelled.

any question of the kind by an award of expenses. If he have such power, alleged inconvenience may prove more theoretical than actual. In this case Sheriff-substitute has himself granted warrant to cite the defender to lodge defences with the Sheriff-clerk at Edinburgh, and has decerned against because he did not appear, and I have not been able to discover any rea which appears to me sufficient for denying his right to exercise his undoul jurisdiction and power in that manner."

[1] Ersk. i. 4, 5.

No. 126.

Mar. 3, 1891.

Barbour v. Chalmers & Co.

Lease—Proof of—Constitution—Period of endurance—Validity.—In an action praying for the removal of a tenant, on the ground that he had no title of possession, the defender founded on a written lease granted by a former proprietor, in which the term of endurance was mentioned only in a clause added at the end of the testing-clause, and on receipts for rent granted by the landlord, shewing that the defender had been in possession of the subjects.

Held that to instruct a valid contract of lease it was sufficient for the defender to prove that the writing had been delivered to him by the landlord in its present form, and that he was entitled to prove this pro ut de jure.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians. M.

A PETITION was presented in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians by A. H. F. Barbour and Mrs Whyte, heritable proprietors of certain subjects in the Canongate, Edinburgh, praying for warrant "summarily to remove and eject" therefrom Messrs D. & J. Chalmers, and David Chalmers junior, the only known partner of the firm, on the ground that without right or title they were occupying the premises.

The defenders in answer produced a lease, dated 3d June 1885, between David Chalmers senior, who was then proprietor of the subjects, and the defenders. The body of the lease did not mention the term of endurance, but, following the testing-clause, there was this declaration:—"But declaring the term of lease to be for the term of nineteen years complete from the date hereof." The rent specified in the lease was £20, and receipts from David Chalmers for the half-yearly rents down to May 1889 were produced. It was stated that the lease had been intimated to the pursuers' authors, who had entered into possession of the subjects as heritable creditors under a bond, and to the pursuers themselves when they purchased the subjects from the heritable creditors in 1889 at a public sale. Further, the lease in question was produced at that sale.

The pursuers stated in answer that the alleged lease was null and void, in respect that it contained no clause specifying a period of endurance. They further stated that a peace-warning had been served upon the defenders on 10th March 1890, requiring them to flit and remove.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(5) No period of endurance being specified in the said lease, . . . it cannot be pleaded as a burden on the title of singular successor in the subjects.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The defenders being in possession under a valid current lease burdening the proprietors' title, the tenants are not liable to be summarily removed and ejected. (7) Even if the lease were defective, it has been validated by homologation and rei interventu.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton), on 7th July 1890, sustained the fifth plea in law for the pursuers, repelled the defences, and granted warrant summarily to eject and remove the defenders.*

The Sheriff (Crichton), on 21st July 1890, dismissed an appeal.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

The pursuers objected to the competency of the appeal, and the objection was heard along with the merits.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The appeal was competent. This was not a case of removing a tenant whose lease had come to an end. The pursuers' position here was that the defenders had not, and never had had, any title to possess the subjects. In such circumstances an appeal had been allowed.[1] (2) The fact that the declaration regarding the term of

* "NOTE.—A glance at the document is sufficient to shew that it is not a good lease, no period of endurance being therein specified. That being so, the whole defence falls to the ground."

[1] Clark v. Clarkes, June 28, 1890, 17 R. 1064.

No. 126.
Mar. 3, 1891.
Barbour v. Chalmers & Co.

the lease was not in the body of the deed, but was only to be found at the end of the testing-clause, did not invalidate the contract, provided it was inserted with consent of the granter of the deed and the deed was delivered. The opinions of the Judges of the First Division in the case of Chambers,[1] to the effect that the insertion of a substantial provision in the testing-clause was ineffectual, and that it could not be regarded as part of the deed, had been doubted when that case came to the House of Lords. Previous cases in which the validity of such a declaration had been sanctioned[2] were approved by Lord Gordon in that case. Further, even assuming that the lease was informal, the possession which had followed upon it and the actings of parties gave the declaration validity, and made the contract binding even upon singular successors like the pursuers.[3]

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The appeal was incompetent. The only way of bringing up the judgment of an inferior Court in an action of removing was by suspension. This was clear from the terms of the 44th section of the Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), and from many decisions following upon it.[4] It was true that there was here a conclusion for ejection as well as for removal, but, on the other hand, removal, and not ejection, was the appropriate remedy, the lease being prima facie bad as against the pursuers, who had accordingly executed a peace-warning. (2) The duration of the lease was not specified in the contract, and this was fatal to it. It might have been different if the clause had been one which varied or qualified the provisions of the deed, but where as here it was an essential term of the contract which was added,—binding on both or on neither party,—it could not receive any effect.[5]

Lord President.—The petition in the Sheriff Court prayed the Court to grant a warrant summarily to remove and eject the defenders from the subjects in question, on the ground that the defenders had no title whatever to possess the subjects, and that they never had any—the lease under which they profess to possess having been defective in an essential particular, and not, therefore, being pleadable by the defenders. An objection has been taken to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the only remedy which the defenders had was by way of suspension in terms of the 44th section of the Judicature Act, 1825. I think it is only necessary to say that that section has no application to the circumstances of the present case. That section is intended to meet the case of a tenant whose lawful tenure of the subjects has come to an end, and who seeks to retain possession notwithstanding a warning to quit. The proceedings in the present case entirely exclude the application of that section.

The question which the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have decided on the merits is, as the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor bears, "Sustains the fifth plea in law for the pursuers: Repels the defences, and grants warrant to officers

[1] Chambers' Trustees v. Smith, Nov. 9, 1877, 5 R. 97, revd. April 15, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 151, Lord Gordon, p. 168.

[2] Johnstone v. Coldstream, June 30, 1843, 5 D. 1297, 15 Scot. Jur. 541; Dunlop v. Greenlees' Trustees, Nov. 2, 1863, 2 Macph. 1, 36 Scot. Jur. 5, affd. June 1865, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 46.

[3] Rankine on Leases, p. 101; M'Leod v. Urquhart, 1808, Hume's Decns. 84; Russell v. Freen, May 14, 1835, 13 S. 752, 7 Scot. Jur. 351; Wilson v. Mair, March 2, 1876, 3 R. 527.

[4] Ross v. Brims, March 14, 1878, 15 S. L. R. 438; Fletcher v. Davidson, Nov. 3, 1874, 2 R. 71; Roy v. Lord Wemyss, July 7, 1840, 2 D. 1345, 12 Scot. Jur. 622; Gibson v. Scott, Jan. 28, 1826, 4 S. 404.

[5] Arnott v. Calder, March 6, 1835, 13 S. 619, 7 Scot. Jur. 351, affd. July 1840, 1 Rob.'s Apps. 183.

No. 126.

Mar. 3, 1891.
Barbour v. Chalmers & Co.

Court summarily to eject and remove the defenders as craved, and decerns." The Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment is stated in a very short note, which is in these terms:—"A glance at the document is sufficient to shew that it is not a good lease, no period of endurance being therein specified. That being so, the whole defence falls to the ground." The Sheriff adopted the same view, and dismissed an appeal against the Sheriff-substitute's judgment. The fifth plea in law is, "No period of endurance being specified in the said lease . . . it cannot be pleaded as a burden on the title of a singular successor in the subjects." The matter of fact stands thus. In the ordinary place in which the term of endurance would fall to be inserted in the lease, there is no mention of it, but at the end of the testing-clause it is declared that the term of endurance is to be for nineteen years, and the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff hold that this being the sole evidence of the term of endurance of the lease, it cannot be supplemented in any way, and that there therefore being no term fixed in the lease, the lease necessarily becomes a nullity.

I cannot agree with the Sheriffs. On the contrary, it appears to me that the duration of the lease, although writing is necessary as evidence of the contract, may be established by other modes of proof. That there was to be a lease is clear from the form of the document, in which the subject, the rent, and the terms of payment are all specified. The only thing which is awanting is the term of endurance. If a document of that kind was delivered by the landlord to the tenant, and was delivered in the condition in which it has now been produced by the tenant,—which has not been denied,—that would constitute on the part of the landlord an act confirmatory of the document, as a whole, including the addition to testing-clause, and accordingly would incorporate the term of endurance. The record is perhaps not well framed to bring out the matter of fact, but it is sufficiently clear to this extent, that the tenant obviously made a point of publishing to the world the fact that he held a lease. He made that known when the estate was brought to sale, and there is nothing alleged to the effect that the document is different now from what it was when delivered to his hands. In these circumstances, I think it is competent to the tenant to prove by parole that the term of endurance was inserted in the lease prior to it being delivered.

I am therefore of opinion that we ought to recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff, and allow the defenders to prove that the lease was delivered to them in its present state.

LORD ADAM.—The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff seem to have thought that this was a clear case. I agree with them in this, but I am led to an opposite conclusion from that to which they came, and I approve of the judgment which your Lordship proposes to pronounce.

The defenders were in possession of the subjects at the date of the action, which was brought for the purpose of having them removed and ejected therefrom. The ground upon which it was brought is thus stated by the pursuers, "The defenders, without right or title, occupy and possess the coach-houses and stables immediately below the tenement of houses lying at the foot of the Whitehorse Close, Canongate, belonging to the pursuers, and they refuse to quit possession," and when the case came before the Sheriff-substitute he granted warrant "summarily to eject and remove the defenders," and on appeal the Sheriff adhered.

No. 124.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Gilchrist v. Morrison.

and if the deed of 16th December has not been destroyed—and the pursuers do not know whether it is destroyed or not—and if it is produced before the trial, they have a perfectly good title. The other is the title of heir-at-law, but they have a perfectly good title on which to try the question here. If the first deed had been the only title upon which the pursuers had to rely, I should, on the authority of the case of Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, and on the principle of it, have had no doubt whatever that the course pursued by the Lord Ordinary was the right one, namely, that if that had been the sole title it would have been necessary to bring a proving of the tenor—either to produce it, or, if not recoverable, to proceed by way of proving the tenor first before they could go on with the action. But that is not the state of the title, for as I have already pointed out, the only effect of this first deed is not to destroy the pursuers' title to sue but to give another and equally good title to sue. If it is not produced or not proved, then they are respectively heir-at-law and next of kin.

That being so, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered. I think in this case the pursuers have a perfectly good title to try the question here on issues in the usual form. It may be that after the leading conclusions of the action are decided in one way or another, it may be necessary for the further progress of this action then to have a proving of the tenor. That may be quite possible. If it should be that these deeds are set aside by the verdict of a jury, then it may be that the pursuers will not be enabled to go on with the declaratory and accounting conclusions without putting themselves in a position to insist in these. But if the main question is settled in one way or another, I think that will clear the way for the proper disposal of the remainder. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor should be altered, and the case tried by a jury.

Lord M'Laren.—If there had been no averment in this action as to the pursuers, that one of them stands in the relation of heir-at-law, and the other in that of next of kin to the defunct, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary that this action could not proceed without a proving of the tenor of the lost deed. position, for I think no one can pursue a reduction founding on the title of disponee without being liable to be called upon as a condition of prosecuting the case to produce the deed which he asserts to be his title. Admittedly the pursuers are not in a condition to produce the deed which they libel, because it has been destroyed—they say destroyed under circumstances which do not affect its validity, but that is a matter which I think would have to be investigated as a condition of establishing the title to sue in the character of disponee. Now when the summons was originally brought into Court, the character of disponee was the only title alleged by the pursuers. Since then they have apparently without objection amended their condescendence by asserting a title of heir-at-law and next of kin. I confess it would have been more satisfactory to my mind if that amendment had been made by leave of the Court, by minute of amendment and interlocutor following upon it. There has been an amendment of that nature made already, but that does not touch this question; it is an amendment having relation to the character of the defenders. But as I should at anyrate have been prepared to consent to such an amendment if it had been asked for, and as I understand your Lordships think it is within the power of the pursuer on revisal to make such an addition to his condescendence, law allows great indulgence. There is no class of writing where the granter is so much held bound by unwritten evidence of consent as in the case of a lease. If there had been here no attestation clause, and at the end of the deed these words had occurred, "period of endurance, nineteen years," evidence of possession under the lease would have been sufficient to confirm it. The question is whether when such a declaration is found in the body of the testing-clause, it is to have less weight given to it. I do not think it should be less favourably dealt with on that account. The deed in my view belongs to the class of informal documents which are held to be confirmed by interventus rei.

No. 126.
Mar. 3, 1891.
Barbour v. Chalmers & Co.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it necessary to determine whether this document by itself constitutes a complete and binding contract. If it were necessary to decide that point, it would probably require consideration, having regard to the observations of Lord Gordon in the House of Lords in the case of Smith v. Chambers' Trustees. But it is very familiar law that although a contract of lease for a period of years may not have been constituted by writing, but by a verbal bargain, it may still be perfectly effectual if the terms of the verbal bargain can be proved by writing, and if possession has followed. If a document such as that now before us has been subscribed by the landlord and the tenant, and has been delivered by the landlord to the tenant as a title of possession, that may or may not be a formal lease, but it is very good evidence in writing that a lease has been granted for nineteen years. If possession has followed, the declaration in the lease is to my mind conclusive evidence in writing of the term of endurance. If there be any question as to whether the declaration was inserted before or after subscription, I think this should be remitted to probation. But where the tenant produces the lease, and the landlord makes no allegation that the words in question have been inserted after delivery, or without his knowledge, it does not appear to me that there can be any room for doubt.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriffs: Find that the delivery of the lease by the landlord to the tenant in its present state may be competently proved pro ut de jure: Find the appellants entitled to expenses in this Court, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed."

WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—EDWARD NISH, Solicitor—Agents.

TRUSTEES FOR THE RELIANCE MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).— D.-F. Balfour—Jameson.
FRANCIS A. BRINGLOE (Halkett's Judicial Factor), Defender (Respondent). —Johnston—Sym.

No. 127.
Mar. 4, 1891.
Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor.

Husband and Wife—Marriage-contract provision—Trust.—By antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed her whole estate to trustees, inter alia, for payment to herself of the free income during the marriage, "such payment being made exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration" of her husband, "and her own receipt being a sufficient discharge." The wife became a party to a bond and assignation granted by her husband in security of a loan, binding herself to the extent of her "own separate estate and effects all jointly and severally" to repay it.

In answer to an action by the creditors in the bond for payment of the free annual income of the wife's estate, it was pleaded that she could not validly convey it away to her own prejudice stante matrimonio. Held (rev. judgment

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

GEORGE TAIT, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—M'Lennan.
JOHN JOHNSTON, Respondent.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Process—Citation—Statute 1592, cap. 141—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 77), secs. 3, 4.—A service copy of a petition in a Sheriff Court was sent by registered letter to the defender, with a citation bearing in gremio to be executed by A B, a law-agent, but it was not signed by A B, but by C D, another law-agent, for A B. The execution returned upon the petition was in the statutory form, and was signed by A B.

In a suspension of a decree in absence obtained against the defender, he pleaded that the citation was invalid.

Held that as the execution returned upon the petition had not been reduced, the defender was barred from objecting to the citation.

Opinion (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the citation was valid.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Process—Union of several counties into one sheriffdom—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 92), sec. 4—Sheriffs Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 86), secs. 4, 5, 6, 12.—In a sheriffdom in which several counties are combined the granting of a warrant to cite a defender to appear in a Court in a county which is not the county of his domicile, is a matter within the discretion of the Sheriff.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

ON 7th August 1890 John Johnston, joiner, Innerleithen, raised an action for £50, 17s. 3d., as the amount of the balance of an account against George Tait, Woodside Cottage, Innerleithen, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

A warrant to cite, dated 7th August 1890, was pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh (Orphoot), ordaining Tait, if he intended to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge appearance with the Clerk of Court at Edinburgh.

A copy of the petition and warrant was sent by post to Tait, with a schedule of citation bearing to be executed by Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., law-agent, and to be signed for him by T. H. Lang Guthrie, solicitor. An execution in terms of the statutory schedule, written upon the principal petition, was signed by Marcus J. Brown.*

On 12th September 1890 decree in absence was taken against Tait, who had received the citation and had corresponded with Johnston's agent with regard to the claim, but had lodged no defences.

A charge on the decree was given.

On 13th October 1890 Tait brought a suspension of the decree and charge, on the grounds set forth in his pleas in law, which were;—1. The complainer having no residence or place of business within the county of Midlothian, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the

* The Citation Amendment Act, 1882, enacts by sec. 3, " . . . In any civil action any summons or warrant of citation of any person . . . may be executed . . . . by an enrolled law-agent by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant or judicial intimation is to be served, . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons, . . . with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, and such posting shall constitute a valid and legal citation."

Section 4 enacts, inter alia,—"(3) The execution to be returned by the officer or law-agent shall be accompanied by the post-office receipt for the registered letter: The execution returned by a law-agent shall for all purposes be equivalent to an execution by any officer of Court: The execution may be in the form contained in the first schedule hereto."

The schedule bears,—"This summons . . . executed by me, . . . law-agent . . . (Signature of Agent.)"

No. 127.

Mar. 4, 1891.
Reliance Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Halkett's Factor.

contract estate, Colonel and Mrs Halkett being also called for their interest.

The summons concluded, in the first place, for declarator that the pursuers had acquired right from 3d October 1889, when the assignation was intimated, to the whole sums of money, as well capital as income, as were or might become payable to Colonel and Mrs Halkett under the marriage-contract; and in the second place the judicial factor was called upon to account for and pay to the pursuers the income of the trust-estate from 3d October 1889 annually until the whole sums due to them were paid off.

The whole sum alleged to be due to the pursuers at Martinmas 1890 amounted to £1665, 16s. 4d.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The interests of the defenders Frederick John Colin Halkett and Mrs Helen Margaret Fisher or Halkett under the marriage-contract having been validly transferred to and vested in the pursuers, decree should be granted as craved. (2) The defender Francis A Bringloe having intromitted with the funds of the estate transferred to the pursuers, and having such funds in his hands, he is bound to count and reckon with the pursuers therefor, in terms of the second conclusion of the summons.

Defences were lodged for the judicial factor and for Mrs Halkett, to whom a curator ad litem was appointed. They pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The estate of the defender Mrs Halkett having been conveyed to trustees for her protection, in terms of the antenuptial marriage-contract referred to, she could not validly and effectually convey away the same stante matrimonio to her own prejudice; and separatim, she could not do so in security of her husband's debts. (3) The defender F. A. Bringloe, as representing the trustees under said marriage-contract, is not entitled to act upon said bond and assignation in security and intimation thereof.

The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 5th February 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the second and third pleas in law for the defenders; assoilzies the defender Bringloe from the petitory conclusions of the summons: Quoad ultra dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . It was explained that the question which the pursuers wished to have determined in the present action is their right, as Mrs Halkett's assignees, to the income of the trust-estate during the subsistence of the marriage. This was the only question argued before me.

"It was contended for the defenders that the provision in the second purpose of the trust, that the income of the trust-estate should be paid to Mrs Halkett during the subsistence of the marriage, was a proper contract provision, which she had no power either to renounce, or abandon, or assign while the marriage subsisted.

"The pursuers, on the other hand, contended that the income of the trust funds constitutes separate estate of the wife, with which she can deal in any way she chooses.

"There are three classes of cases in which the rights of a wife under an antenuptial marriage-contract have been defined by the Court.

"(1) If the wife's provision is not secured by a trust, she can deal with it as she pleases. For example, if she is infeft in a liferent of her husband's heritage, she can renounce or assign the liferent—(Standard Property Investment Company v. Cowe, 4 R. 695). It is clear that the present case does not fall under this category.

"(2) The mere fact of a wife having conveyed her portion to trustees under an antenuptial contract of marriage does not divest her of her rights as proprietor, unless the trustees are directed to hold and apply it for proper matrimonial purposes—(Ramsay, 10 Macph. 120, 44 Scot. Jur. 77, Laidlaw, 11 R. 481).

"(3) If, however, the wife's estate is conveyed to trustees for the purpose of

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The question raised was not merely one of jurisdiction. The complainer (assuming the jurisdic-

only two statutes recently passed on the subject. The first is the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 92, by which the union of various counties is provided for when vacancies should occur, and sec. 4 provides that when a vacancy should occur in the sheriffdom of Peebles it should be united with the county of Midlothian into one sheriffdom. The later Act, which is the Act directly applicable, is the Sheriffs Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86. By secs. 4, 5, and 6 provision is made for the union of the counties of Midlothian, Linlithgow, Haddington, and Peebles into one sheriffdom, to be called the Sheriffdom of the Lothians and Peebles; and by sec. 12 it is enacted, that every union of counties into one sheriffdom 'shall be deemed to be a complete union to all intents and purposes, in so far as regards the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of procurators before the Courts of the Sheriff: And the several counties of any such united sheriffdom shall not be thereafter regarded as separate sheriffdoms or jurisdictions, in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and the procurators of the Sheriff Court.'

"In the face of these absolute and comprehensive words it seems impossible to deny the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles in this case. Counsel for the complainer referred to sec. 6 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70, which provides that a person having a place of business in a county shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff thereof, although domiciled in another county, if cited personally, or at his dwelling-place, with power to the Sheriff to remit such action 'to the Court of the defender's domicile in another sheriffdom,' and to sec. 12, which, by its first subsection, provides for citation in such cases.

"The argument, as I understood it, was, that because the word county was used and not sheriffdom it was to be inferred that but for the Act the Sheriff in one county, forming part of a united sheriffdom, would not have had jurisdiction over a defender who had a place of business in another county, forming part of the same sheriffdom. But I think the inference inadmissible. The statute does not profess to do more than confer jurisdiction. It says nothing about the seat of the Court at which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. It confers jurisdiction in language which is not a whit more clear or absolute than that of sec. 12 of the Act of 1870. I do not think it applies to the jurisdiction of a Sheriff over the divisions of a united county at all. If it does, it adds nothing in language or in substance to his power, and I think that the use of the word 'sheriffdom' at the close of the section shews that there was no intention of drawing any distinction between a county and a sheriffdom.

"Reference was made to Edwards v. The Inverness and Aberdeen Railway Company, 24th April 1862, 4 Irv. 185, where the Sheriff, sitting in the Small-Debt Court at Banff, dismissed an action of damages against the railway company on the ground of no jurisdiction. The statutory domicile of the railway company was Inverness, but it had been cited at Keith, in Banffshire. The pursuer appealed to the Circuit Court at Inverness, and seems to have argued that there was jurisdiction because Keith was a principal station. The appeal was dismissed. The grounds of judgment do not appear quite clearly. But it was pointed out that Lords Neaves and Ardmillan both indicated that there might have been a difference had the action been brought in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, in which county the injury happened; and it was argued that, as Elgin and Banff were united counties, it could, if the respondent's argument were sound, have made no difference as to the question of jurisdiction whether the action was brought at Banff or at Elgin. It does not appear, however, that the attention of the Judges was called to the point at all, and they do not purport to decide it, nor, indeed, allude to it.

"III. The further question is this, whether, admitting the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, it was competent to convene the defender to the Sheriff Court at

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

tion) maintained that the only proper place at which to cite him was Peebles, the head burgh of his county, and that there only was he bound

Edinburgh, and entertain a cause against him in that Court, or, whether the complainer is now entitled to say that he was only bound to attend the Court of the Sheriff at Peebles, the head burgh of the county in which he was resident?

"This is not a question of jurisdiction exactly, but rather about the conditions of its exercise, and especially about the Court at which it can be competently exercised. It is not in this case complicated by any question as to the power of the Sheriff-clerk to sign the warrant of citation, because the warrant is signed by the Sheriff-substitute, about whose power there is no question. The point appears a difficult one, and there is, so far as I have been able to discover, hardly any authority in our books on the subject. The only similar reported case, so far as I am aware, is Dowie v. Douglas, 30th May 1817, Fac. Coll., which it may be worth while merely to refer to, but as I do not see that it can be used as an authority either way it is not necessary to advert to it further. I may refer also to Ersk. i. 4, 5, where he treats of the exercise of a Sheriff's jurisdiction at the head burgh of a county, or of the division of a county, and he gives as an example and illustration 'the shire of Clydesdale,' which in his time had been separated into three divisions, but he does not affirm that it would be competent to exercise jurisdiction at the head burgh of one division over an inhabitant of another division.

"Allusion may also be made to the Act for the regulation of the Commissary Courts, 1823, 4 Geo. IV. cap. 97, which by sec. 6 provides that where two counties are under the jurisdiction of one Sheriff they shall constitute one commissariot; and to 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 26, which authorises the Sheriff of two counties to hold Commissary Courts in both counties if he shall think proper. The inference is legitimate that he could, if he chose, exercise his jurisdiction, at least as commissary, in one of the counties over persons resident in another, and that seems simply in consequence of two commissariots being united.

"It is argued, on the one hand, that before the union of the counties it was a right of the defender to be convened at the Sheriff Court in his own county, and that there are no words in the statute to deprive him of that right; that the object of establishing resident Sheriff-substitutes and local Courts was just to make this right effectual; and that although there might be no great hardship in any case still there was some hardship, and the hardship would be very great if some of the northern counties it were held to be in the power of a pursuer to compel a defender to come from one county to another in the same sheriffdom.

"On the other hand, it was maintained that, seeing the complainer resided within the territory of the Sheriff, he was bound to obey his citation judicially given, and that there was neither principle nor authority for denying to the Sheriff the power to convene any person within his territory to any established seat of his Court; that it was within the power of a Sheriff, by an order of Court, to determine to what seat of Court persons resident in the different districts of his sheriffdom should be convened; that this was a matter safely left to his discretion and not vested in any other authority, and that that power of the Sheriff had been exercised in various cases in which more than one seat of Court had been established in a county; that the intention of the statute was to abolish all distinctions between the different counties united into one sheriffdom so far as the administration of the law was concerned.

"Having regard to the very comprehensive language of the statute uniting counties, I am unable to sustain the complainer's contention, or to restrict the Sheriff in the exercise of his jurisdiction without some definite authority, statutory, judicial, or institutional. It is true that it would be highly inconvenient if a pursuer were allowed to call a defender to the Court in a united sheriffdom most convenient to himself, without regard to the residence of the defender, but it is not necessary to hold that a pursuer has that power. The matter is under the control of the Sheriff, who can regulate it by an order of Court, and can, if he thinks fit, refuse to issue his warrant of citation against a defender more suitably amenable to another Court, or can perhaps deal with

No. 124.
Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

testamentary deeds executed by the deceased on the ground of facility and circumvention, and for declarator that the succession of the deceased was to be regulated by a prior testamentary deed under which they were residuary legatees, the pursuers did not produce the prior deed founded on, and the defenders alleged that it had been destroyed animo revocandi. The pursuers then added an averment that they were respectively heir-at-law and next of kin of the deceased. Held that having the alternative title of heirs ab intestato and disponees under the deed alleged to have been revoked, they had a title to sue a reduction of later deeds granted to their prejudice, and that the validity of these deeds fell to be decided in the first place (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood (Ordinary), who had sisted process in order that a proving of the tenor of the prior deed might be brought).

1st Division. Ld. Wellwood. C.

On 1st July 1890 Mrs Agnes Kinnaird or Gilchrist, widow, and William and Jane Alexander Gilchrist, children, of the late John Gilchrist, Leith, brought an action against Mrs Jane Goodlet or Morrison, Leith, sole executor and universal legatory under a last will and testament bearing to be executed on 6th February 1890 by Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy, and general disponee and donee under disposition and deed of gift bearing to be executed on 6th February by the said Mrs Purdy, and also against William Rew, merchant, Leith, and William Asher S.S.C., Leith, trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement bearing to be executed by Mrs Purdy on 20th January 1890, concluding for reduction of the said three deeds, for declarator that a trust-disposition and settlement executed on 16th December 1889 by the said Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy was the deed by which the succession to the means and estate left by the said deceased Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy fell to be regulated, and that the pursuers were entitled to the provisions made in their favour by the said last mentioned trust-disposition and settlement; and for decree ordaining Mrs Morrison to count and reckon for her intromissions with the estate on that footing.

The pursuers stated (cond. 5), that Mrs Purdy, the deceased, was the elder daughter of the said John Gilchrist, the husband of the first named pursuer and father of the other pursuers. (Cond. 1) "About the middle of December [1889] she sent for the family law-agent, Mr Asher, and gave him instructions to make a fresh will, as she knew her illness was incurable, and she wished to make a final settlement of her affairs in prospect of an early death. Mr Asher accordingly prepared a trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by her on the 16th day of December 1889, and by which she conveyed her whole means and estate to Mr Asher and his managing clerk, Mr John Rew, whom she appointed her trustees and executors." The substance of the will was payment of debts, &c., and of certain legacies, including one of £500 to the defender Mrs Morrison, and of the residue to the pursuer Mrs Gilchrist in liferent, and to the other pursuers in fee. "The said will was carefully prepared by the instructions of Mrs Purdy, and it was fully considered by her before she signed it. The said deed contained the real wishes of the testatrix with regard to the disposal of her estate after her death. A copy of the said trust-disposition and settlement is herewith produced." The pursuers then set forth the grounds of reduction of the deeds libelled (under which the pursuers were entirely excluded from the succession), which were facility and circumvention.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The deeds sought to be reduced not being the deeds of the late Mrs Purdy, ought to be set aside, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) Separatim, The said deeds ought to be reduced, in respect that at the dates when the same were executed the deceased Mrs Purdy was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, and that the said Mrs Morrison and John Goodlet, or one or other them, taking advantage of her said weakness and facility, did by fraud or circumvention impetrate the said deeds from Mrs Purdy to her lesion. (3) The trust-disposition and settlement of 16th December 1889, being the deed regulating the succession to the deceased Mrs Purdy's means and estate, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders lodged answers in which they denied the facility and circumvention alleged, and in answer to cond. 10 averred;—(Ans. 10) "The pursuers are called on to produce this deed or to prove that any such deed was executed and retained by Mrs Purdy as the final expression of her testamentary intentions. It is explained that on the 28th January 1890, the testatrix being then of sound disposing mind, and fully understanding and comprehending the legal results of such action, sent for Mr Peter Peterson Slater, solicitor and law-agent, and after requesting him to act as her agent, explained to him that the said trust-disposition and settlement in the said condescendence mentioned had been in fact revoked by the will prepared by Mr Asher, and executed on the 20th January, as mentioned in condescendence 13, and desired Mr Slater to destroy the same in her presence as useless and as not expressing her will, which Mr Slater accordingly did. Such destruction was deliberately done animo revocandi, and the said trust-disposition and settlement is not now in existence."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

The pursuers at adjustment made this addition to cond. 10;—"With reference to the statement in answer, the pursuers have no knowledge whether the will in question was destroyed, or by whom it was destroyed. If Mrs Purdy destroyed it as stated by the defender, she did so in consequence of the defender having by fraud or circumvention induced her to do so while she was weak and facile and easily imposed upon. On the deeds under reduction being reduced, the pursuers will, if necessary, bring a proving of the tenor of the will in question."

The pursuers also made the following addition to their cond. 5;—"The pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law, and the pursuer Jane Alexander Gilchrist is one of her next of kin."

On 15th January the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sists process in hoc statu in order that the pursuers may, if so advised, raise an action of proving the tenor of the trust-disposition and settlement executed on 16th December 1889 by Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy, upon which they found; meantime reserves all questions of expenses." *

---

* "OPINION.—This action is laid entirely on the footing that the deed by which the succession to the means and estate of the deceased Mrs Purdy falls to be regulated is a trust-disposition and settlement dated 16th December 1889, under which the pursuers are beneficiaries to a large extent. The pursuers claim as beneficiaries under that deed, and the conclusions of the summons and the statements on record, especially those in condescendence 10, shew that that deed is the title on which they rely. It is true that they now state that the pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law; but so little was that in view when the action was raised that the fact was not stated in the original condescendence.

"Now the deed of 16th December 1889 is not forthcoming. It is stated by the defender, and there is little reason to doubt the truth of the statement so far, that it was destroyed on the 28th of January 1890, about a week after the execution by Mrs Purdy of a trust-disposition and settlement dated 20th January 1890, which is the first in date of the deeds under reduction. In these circumstances, I think it is necessary for the pursuers to prove the tenor of the deed

No. 124.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Gilchrist v. Morrison.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had a double title, as disponees under the deed alleged to have been destroyed, and as heirs of the deceased ab intestato. They were entitled to plead these titles alternatively to the effect of insisting on this reduction. That took the present case out of the principle of Shaw[1] referred to by the Lord Ordinary, for there the pursuer's only title was the lost deed. A proving of the tenor was not a suitable way of trying what would virtually be an issue of facility and circumvention, for the question in the proving would be the state of the mind of the deceased at the date of the alleged revocation. Such a question ought to be tried by a jury upon an issue in the usual terms. The proper course was to dispose of the validity of the deeds sought to be reduced first, for if they should be reduced the interest of the present parties was reversed, as Mrs Morrison was a beneficiary under the deed alleged to have been destroyed, and the pursuers as heirs ab intestato would have an interest to reduce that deed.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was laid upon a deed which was not in existence, and a proving of the tenor was an essential preliminary to any action on a lost document.[2] It could not be founded on as giving a title to sue. Nor could the pursuers plead their alleged title as heirs, for the title of heir became active only if there was no deed to displace it; under the former law, the heir could not have sued a reduction ex capite lecti if the effect of reduction was to set up a prior deed. The whole scheme of the present summons was that there was such a prior deed. The question whether a testamentary deed had been destroyed by the deceased animo revocandi could quite satisfactorily be disposed of in a proving of the tenor.[3] of 16th December 1889 on which they found. In doing this, they will have to prove the casus amissionis; and, if it is true that the will was destroyed by the orders of Mrs Purdy, to prove that she was not then in such a state of mind as to be capable of effectually cancelling or revoking it. The question to be tried in the action of proving the tenor will therefore practically be the same as that sought to be raised in this action. But an action of proving the tenor proceeds in the Inner-House; and therefore the present process must be sisted until the pursuers take steps to set up the deed of 16th December 1889—Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, and Bonthrone v. Ireland, 10 R. 779.

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—In this case there is no question that the averments on record are sufficient to sustain the reductive conclusions. The only question is as to whether the pursuers have a title to sue. There is no doubt that when the action was brought into Court the pursuers thought the deed of 16th December 1889 was still in existence, or at least did not know whether it was destroyed or not, and there can be no doubt that that was the title on which the action was originally brought, and that accounts for the

---

"The pursuers strongly maintain that William Gilchrist, being heir-at-law, and entitled to succeed to the heritage left by Mrs Purdy if she died intestate, he is, in any case, entitled to sue the action, and challenge the deeds under reduction. As I have already indicated, the summons is so framed that I do not think it can proceed as an action at the instance of the heir. But, further, if the pursuers' averments are true, William Gilchrist, as heir-at-law, was cut out by the deed of 16th December 1889, and the parties really entitled to challenge the subsequent deeds are the disponees or beneficiaries under that deed."

[1] Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, June 13, 1876, 3 R. 813.

[2] Gordon v. Robertson, Oct. 28, 1873, 11 S. L. R. 35.

[3] Bonthrone v. Ireland, March 15, 1883, 10 R. 779.

declaratory and accounting conclusions. However, when the case was brought into Court this explanation was made by the defenders,—"It is explained that on the 28th January 1890 the testatrix, being then of sound disposing mind, and fully understanding and comprehending the legal results of such action, sent for Mr Peter Peterson Slater, solicitor and law-agent, and after requesting him to act as her agent, explained to him that the said trust-disposition and settlement in the said condescendence mentioned had been in fact revoked by the will prepared by Mr Asher, and executed on the 20th January as mentioned in condescendence 13, and desired Mr Slater to destroy the same in her presence as useless, and as not expressing her will, which Mr Slater accordingly did. Such destruction was deliberately done animo revocandi, and the said trust-disposition and settlement is not now in existence." The reply made to that by the pursuers was this,—"With reference to the statement in answer, the pursuers have no knowledge whether the will in question was destroyed, or by whom it was destroyed. If Mrs Purdy destroyed it as stated by the defender, she did so in consequence of the defender having by fraud or circumvention induced her to do so while she was weak and facile and easily imposed upon." Upon these averments being made by the defender on record as to the destruction of this deed, which the pursuers supposed to be in existence when they brought this action, and which they do not now admit to be destroyed, this averment was put on record,—"The pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law, and the pursuer Jane Alexander Gilchrist is one of her next-of-kin"; and that averment is not disputed in point of fact.

Now, from what I have read of the record it is obvious that the real question at issue between the parties here is the state of the testatrix Mrs Purdy's mind at the date 20th January, when the first of the deeds sought to be reduced was executed, and on 6th February, when the two other deeds were executed. That is the real question at issue between the parties—whether or not these three deeds ought to be reduced on the ground stated. That is the real question with which we have to deal, and I think also that no one could doubt that that question would best be tried in the usual way before a jury with the issue, whether the deed has been obtained by fraud and circumvention in the usual terms. I think that unless there be some strong ground to the contrary, that would be the proper way to try the question at issue between the parties in this case, unless indeed the pursuer has no title to sue. I think that the case would be much better so tried than as the course indicated by the Lord Ordinary would point at, namely, incidentally merely in course of a proving of the tenor, which would go to shew the state of Mrs Purdy's mind on 28th January, when she is said to have destroyed the deed in question, and which, if that fact were established, would no doubt indicate her state of mind at or about the time when these deeds were destroyed, and might afford inference one way or other, but would not decide the question between the parties to this case, for it is not the state of mind on 28th January that is the question, but the state of mind on 20th January.

I think it is clear also that the pursuers have a double title to insist in this action. It is obvious and set forth in this record—and perfectly sufficiently set forth in this record—that the pursuer William Gilchrist is the heir-at-law, and that the pursuer, Miss Gilchrist, his sister, is one of the next of kin of Mrs Purdy. That being so, if the deed of 16th December is not in existence it is clear that they have a good title to try this case. That is quite clear,

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Gilchrist v. Morrison.

and if the deed of 16th December has not been destroyed—and the pursuers do not know whether it is destroyed or not—and if it is produced before the trial, they have a perfectly good title. The other is the title of heir-at-law, but they have a perfectly good title on which to try the question here. If the first deed had been the only title upon which the pursuers had to rely, I should, on the authority of the case of Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, and on the principle of it, have had no doubt whatever that the course pursued by the Lord Ordinary was the right one, namely, that if that had been the sole title it would have been necessary to bring a proving of the tenor—either to produce it, or, if not recoverable, to proceed by way of proving the tenor first before they could go on with the action. But that is not the state of the title, for as I have already pointed out, the only effect of this first deed is not to destroy the pursuers' title to sue but to give another and equally good title to sue. If it is not produced or not proved, then they are respectively heir-at-law and next of kin.

That being so, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered. I think in this case the pursuers have a perfectly good title to try the question here on issues in the usual form. It may be that after the leading conclusions of the action are decided in one way or another, it may be necessary for the further progress of this action then to have a proving of the tenor. That may be quite possible. If it should be that these deeds are set aside by the verdict of a jury, then it may be that the pursuers will not be enabled to go on with the declaratory and accounting conclusions without putting themselves in a position to insist in these. But if the main question is settled in one way or another, I think that will clear the way for the proper disposal of the remainder. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor should be altered, and the case tried by a jury.

Lord M'Laren.—If there had been no averment in this action as to the pursuers, that one of them stands in the relation of heir-at-law, and the other in that of next of kin to the defunct, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary that this action could not proceed without a proving of the tenor of the lost disposition, for I think no one can pursue a reduction founding on the title of disponee without being liable to be called upon as a condition of prosecuting the case to produce the deed which he asserts to be his title. Admittedly the pursuers are not in a condition to produce the deed which they libel, because it has been destroyed—they say destroyed under circumstances which do not affect its validity, but that is a matter which I think would have to be investigated as a condition of establishing the title to sue in the character of disponee. Now, when the summons was originally brought into Court, the character of disponee was the only title alleged by the pursuers. Since then they have apparently without objection amended their condescendence by asserting a title of heir-at-law and next of kin. I confess it would have been more satisfactory to my mind if that amendment had been made by leave of the Court, by minute of amendment and interlocutor following upon it. There has been an amendment of that nature made already, but that does not touch this question; it is an amendment having relation to the character of the defenders. But as I should at anyrate have been prepared to consent to such an amendment if it had been asked for, and as I understand your Lordships think it is within the power of the pursuer on revisal to make such an addition to his condescendence, the first set of conclusions in the summons; and (third) the goods mentioned in the summons, other than those referred to in the preceding pleas, having remained undelivered at the date of the sequestration, no valid security over them was constituted, and the pursuer is in right of them as trustee on James Cumming & Company's sequestrated estate.

No. 128.

Mar. 4, 1891.

Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (6) The goods in question were, in the circumstances, validly delivered by the bankrupts to the defenders by means of the said delivery-orders and entries in the warehouse register following thereon, and were thereafter in the custody of the officers of excise for behoof of, and subject to the exclusive control of the defenders. (7) The defenders having obtained corporeal possession of the goods in question, so far as removed by them from said warehouse within sixty days of Cumming & Company's bankruptcy, without the necessity of any act, voluntary or otherwise, on the part of the bankrupts, and, separatim, in implement of antecedent obligations undertaken by the bankrupts much more than sixty days before bankruptcy, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (8) The goods still remaining in the said warehouse having been duly sold and transferred to the defenders, they are entitled to deal with the same as their own property.

At a proof Rhind deponed as to the transaction in question. Being shewn the invoice sent on 3d August—"That is the invoice which I sent. I am satisfied that that was a loan by the defenders to me against the security of goods. They never got the goods in that invoice out of my warehouse. Only part of the bill was repaid. When I required any of the goods I sent a cheque for them to the defenders, and took them out of bond; and then, when a renewal of the bill became due, those goods were deducted from the amount. I did not deal with those goods as the owner. The defenders held them for the money advanced to me. They removed some of the goods. . . . Cross.— . . . If I had been selling these goods to the defenders the transaction would just have taken the same form. (Q.) So in form the transaction was just that of an out-and-out sale? (A.) Yes, but the agreement was that it was not an out-and-out sale."

Mr Wightman deponed,—"We gave these advances on getting delivered to us in the ordinary way, by invoices and delivery-orders, certain stocks of spirits and wines. And these have remained the same throughout, with the exception of certain quantities which were given back by delivery-orders signed by our firm to Mr Rhind to enable him to use them in his trade, he paying for them in cash. Less these, and what we got in June, the balance remained in the warehouse at the time of the bankruptcy. It was on the faith of the documents I have spoken of that we made these advances to Mr Rhind. We believed we were getting a valid security, and that we were entitled to remove the goods when we pleased."

Evidence was led as to the practice of excise officers in charge of bonded warehouses. The outcome of that evidence is stated by the Lord Ordinary, but no argument was based on it by either side in the Inner-House.

On 13th November 1890, Lord Stormonth Darling (Ordinary) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the defenders have no right of security over the goods mentioned in the summons which remained in the warehouse at the date of Robert Rhind's sequestration, in respect that the said Robert Rhind retained possession of the said goods down to the date of his sequestration; and (2) that as regards the goods mentioned in the summons, of which actual delivery was obtained by the defenders within sixty days of the said Robert Rhind's bankruptcy, the said delivery

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

GEORGE TAIT, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—M'Lennan.
JOHN JOHNSTON, Respondent.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Process—Citation—Statute 1592, cap. 141—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 77), secs. 3, 4.—A service copy of a petition in a Sheriff Court was sent by registered letter to the defender, with a citation bearing to be gremio to be executed by A B, a law-agent, but it was not signed by A B, but by C D, another law-agent, for A B. The execution returned upon the petition was in the statutory form, and was signed by A B.

In a suspension of a decree in absence obtained against the defender, he pleaded that the citation was invalid.

Held that as the execution returned upon the petition had not been reduced, the defender was barred from objecting to the citation.

Opinion (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the citation was valid.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Process—Union of several counties into one sheriffdom—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 92), sec. 4—Sheriffs Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 86), secs. 4, 5, 6, 12.—In a sheriffdom in which several counties are combined the granting of a warrant to cite a defender to appear at a Court in a county which is not the county of his domicile, is a matter within the discretion of the Sheriff.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

ON 7th August 1890 John Johnston, joiner, Innerleithen, raised an action for £50, 17s. 3d., as the amount of the balance of an account, against George Tait, Woodside Cottage, Innerleithen, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

A warrant to cite, dated 7th August 1890, was pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh (Orphoot), ordaining Tait, if he intended to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge appearance with the Clerk of Court at Edinburgh.

A copy of the petition and warrant was sent by post to Tait, with a schedule of citation bearing to be executed by Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., law-agent, and to be signed for him by T. H. Lang Guthrie, solicitor. An execution in terms of the statutory schedule, written upon the principal petition, was signed by Marcus J. Brown.*

On 12th September 1890 decree in absence was taken against Tait, who had received the citation and had corresponded with Johnston's agent with regard to the claim, but had lodged no defences.

A charge on the decree was given.

On 13th October 1890 Tait brought a suspension of the decree and charge, on the grounds set forth in his pleas in law, which were;—1. The complainer having no residence or place of business within the county of Midlothian, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the

* The Citation Amendment Act, 1882, enacts by sec. 3, " . . . In any civil action any summons or warrant of citation of any person . . . may be executed . . . . by an enrolled law-agent by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant or judicial intimation is to be served, . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons, . . . with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, and such posting shall constitute a valid and legal citation."

Section 4 enacts, inter alia,—" (3) The execution to be returned by the officer or law-agent shall be accompanied by the post-office receipt for the registered letter: The execution returned by a law-agent shall for all purposes be equivalent to an execution by any officer of Court: The execution may be in the form contained in the first schedule hereto."

The schedule bears,—"This summons . . . executed by me, . . . law-agent . . . (Signature of Agent.)"

No. 128.

Mar. 4, 1891.
Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—This was not in truth a sale, but it was so in form. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Can you claim the benefit of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act without being the true buyer?] Yes, on the authority of Allan's Trustees v. Gunn & Co.[1] [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But what we held there was that the contract though suspicious was a contract of sale.] Again there was constructive if not transfer. But it is declared by the General Order of 10th August 1888 that 'the provisions of the General Order of the 18th March 1887 are not intended to affect the direct responsibility of the warehouse-keeper for the due security of goods deposited, or for the duties on such goods, as provided for by code, par. 73, nor to impose any responsibility upon the Crown as to the delivery to the proper owner of such goods when cleared from warehouse'; and par. 73 of the code is in these terms,—'The warehouse-keeper is alone answerable to the owner of any goods deposited in his warehouse for their safe custody, and for their proper delivery. He is also answerable to the Crown for the duties on such goods.' Such being the true position of the warehouse-keeper, it seems to me impossible to hold that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue assume any duty or responsibility towards the transferree of goods (who may or may not be the true owner), merely because, for the sake of convenience, transfers are recognised and entered in the officer's books. Moreover, I think when it is found that one of the necessary keys of the warehouse remained throughout in the hands of Rhind, enough has been established to shew that he never, in any real or effective sense, parted with the possession of the goods. This is brought out very forcibly by the fact that when the defenders obtained actual delivery of some of the goods in June 1889, they did so by the instrumentality of Rhind.

---

"It was urged for the defenders that formerly at all events goods bonded in the seller's own warehouse could be effectually sold although they remained in the warehouse, by the transfer being entered in a book to be kept for that purpose by the officer in charge; and reference was made to Bell's P., secs. 1306 and 1378. It is worthy of note that the Acts of 4 Geo. IV. c. 24, and 6 Geo. IV. c. 112, which contained these provisions, related exclusively to bona fide sales; and in any case, these Acts have been repealed. I cannot help thinking that now, at all events, the functions of excise officers are limited to the securing of the excise duties, as indicated by the Lord President in the case of the Distillers' Company, Feb. 9, 1889, at p. 486 of 16 R., and that, if the defenders' view of their functions had been correct, it would have formed an argument for the unsuccessful party in that case. It is true that the warehouse in question there was not 'a general warehouse,' but it is what is called a 'distillers' bonded warehouse,' and it is in evidence by Mr Charles F. Watson, and not, I think, disputed, that transfers are allowed in such warehouses.

"The second question between the parties relates to the parcels of wines and spirits which were actually delivered to the defenders on 15th June 1889. That was a date undoubtedly within sixty days of Rhind's bankruptcy, and the pursuer says that the delivery was therefore null under the Act 1696, c. 5. The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that the delivery was unobjectionable, because it was made in implement of an antecedent obligation. I think this agreement really depends on whether the transaction was truly a sale; for, if it was not, it cannot be said that the agreement provided for the actual delivery of any of the goods. I have already expressed the opinion that the transaction was not a sale. There may have been cases (like Lindsay v. Shield, March 19, 1862, 24 D. 821, 34 Scot. Jur. 416, and Allan's Trustees v. Gunn & Company, June 20, 1883, 10 R. 997), in which the transactions, though held to be sales, had a perilous similarity to securities, but the decisions in these cases proceeded on the footing that they were sales and not securities, and the present case seems to me to resemble much more nearly that of Stiven v. Scott & Simson, already cited, in which the transaction was held to be a security, and the delivery to be struck at by the Act 1696. On both questions, therefore, my opinion is in favour of the pursuer."

[1] 10 R. 997.

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

GEORGE TAIT, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—M'Lennan.
JOHN JOHNSTON, Respondent.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Process—Citation—Statute 1592, cap. 141—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 77), secs. 3, 4.—A service copy of a petition in a Sheriff Court was sent by registered letter to the defender, with a citation bearing in gremio to be executed by A B, a law-agent, but it was not signed by A B, but by C D, another law-agent, for A B. The execution returned upon the petition was in the statutory form, and was signed by A B.

In a suspension of a decree in absence obtained against the defender, he pleaded that the citation was invalid.

Held that as the execution returned upon the petition had not been reduced, the defender was barred from objecting to the citation.

Opinion (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the citation was valid.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Process—Union of several counties into one sheriffdom—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 92), sec. 4—Sheriffs Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 86), secs. 4, 5, 6, 12.—In a sheriffdom in which several counties are combined the granting of a warrant to cite a defender to appear at a Court in a county which is not the county of his domicile, is a matter within the discretion of the Sheriff.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

ON 7th August 1890 John Johnston, joiner, Innerleithen, raised an action for £50, 17s. 3d., as the amount of the balance of an account, against George Tait, Woodside Cottage, Innerleithen, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

A warrant to cite, dated 7th August 1890, was pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh (Orphoot), ordaining Tait, if he intended to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge appearance with the Clerk of Court at Edinburgh.

A copy of the petition and warrant was sent by post to Tait, with a schedule of citation bearing to be executed by Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., law-agent, and to be signed for him by T. H. Lang Guthrie, solicitor. An execution in terms of the statutory schedule, written upon the principal petition, was signed by Marcus J. Brown.*

On 12th September 1890 decree in absence was taken against Tait, who had received the citation and had corresponded with Johnston's agent with regard to the claim, but had lodged no defences.

A charge on the decree was given.

On 13th October 1890 Tait brought a suspension of the decree and charge, on the grounds set forth in his pleas in law, which were;—1. The complainer having no residence or place of business within the county of Midlothian, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the

* The Citation Amendment Act, 1882, enacts by sec. 3, " . . . In any civil action any summons or warrant of citation of any person . . . may be executed . . . . by an enrolled law-agent by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant, or judicial intimation is to be served, . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons, . . . with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, and such posting shall constitute a valid and legal citation."

Section 4 enacts, inter alia,—"(3) The execution to be returned by the officer or law-agent shall be accompanied by the post-office receipt for the registered letter: The execution returned by a law-agent shall for all purposes be equivalent to an execution by any officer of Court: The execution may be in the form contained in the first schedule hereto."

The schedule bears,—"This summons . . . executed by me, . . . law-agent . . . (Signature of Agent.)"

No. 128.

Mar. 4, 1891.
Rhind's Trustee v. Robertson & Baxter.

the purpose of enabling him to protect the interests of the excise. In these circumstances there was no valid security created in favour of the defenders, the goods having remained in the possession of the debtor.

A certain part of the goods, however, were actually delivered to the defenders on the 15th June, that is, within sixty days of Rhind's bankruptcy. Such delivery was I think a delivery of goods struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5. It was a voluntary delivery of goods in satisfaction of a prior debt. There was no obligation on Rhind to give the defenders any security for their advances beyond that which had been arranged or stipulated for when the advances were made, and that merely amounted to this, that the goods should remain in Rhind's warehouse in the defenders' name and subject to their orders. On this part of the case, therefore, I think the pursuer is also entitled to prevail.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree on both points. As to whether there was delivery, there is no question at all. As regards the question under the Act 1696, I think we are bound to follow Stiven v. Scott.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

No. 129.

Mar. 5, 1891.
National Bank of Australasia v. Turnbull & Co.

NATIONAL BANK OF AUSTRALASIA, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Guthrie Smith—A. S. D. Thomson.
GEORGE V. TURNBULL & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Asher—Deas.

Bill of Exchange—Proof—Parole—Competency—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 100.—The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 100, enacts,—"In any judicial proceeding in Scotland, any fact relating to a bill of exchange, bank-cheque, or promissory-note, which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence."

The National Bank of Australasia, holders of a bill of exchange for value drawn upon Phipps, Turnbull, & Company of Melbourne, which Phipps, Turnbull, & Company had refused to accept, and which had been protested against the drawers for non-payment, brought an action on the bill against the drawers. The defenders averred that for many years prior to 1881 they had acted as agents in this country for Phipps, Turnbull, & Company for the purpose of procuring and forwarding consignments of such goods as Phipps, Turnbull, & Company desired for the Australian markets, and that all transactions were financed by bills drawn by the defenders upon Phipps, Turnbull, & Company under arrangement with the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, who agreed to discount all bills drawn by the defenders upon the said Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, on receiving indorsed the bills of lading of the various consignments, and to look to Phipps, Turnbull, & Company alone for payment; that in 1881 Phipps, Turnbull, & Company made similar arrangements with the pursuers' London office, and "explained to the pursuers that Phipps, Turnbull, & Company were alone to be liable on any bills discounted by the pursuers drawn by the defenders on them, on receipt of the bills of lading endorsed, which the pursuers agreed to. . . . At the date of said arrangement the defenders were wholly unknown to the pursuers. . . . Though the bills libelled bear to be drawn by the defenders, they personally received no value for them. It was a fact well known to the pursuers that the defenders were to act merely as the agents of Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, and it was agreed to by them that Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, on whom they relied solely for payment, were alone to be liable under the bills condescended on."

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The question raised was not merely one of jurisdiction. The complainer (assuming the jurisdic-

only two statutes recently passed on the subject. The first is the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 92, by which the union of various counties is provided for when vacancies should occur, and sec. 4 provides that when a vacancy should occur in the sheriffdom of Peebles it should be united with the county of Midlothian into one sheriffdom. The later Act, which is the Act directly applicable, is the Sheriffs Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86. By secs. 4, 5, and 6 provision is made for the union of the counties of Midlothian, Linlithgow, Haddington, and Peebles into one sheriffdom, to be called the Sheriffdom of the Lothians and Peebles; and by sec. 12 it is enacted, that every union of counties into one sheriffdom 'shall be deemed to be a complete union to all intents and purposes, in so far as regards the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of procurators before the Courts of the Sheriff: And the several counties of any such united sheriffdom shall not be thereafter regarded as separate sheriffdoms or jurisdictions, in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and the procurators of the Sheriff Court.'

"In the face of these absolute and comprehensive words it seems impossible to deny the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles in this case. Counsel for the complainer referred to sec. 6 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70, which provides that a person having a place of business in a county shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff thereof, although domiciled in another county, if cited personally, or at his dwelling-place, with power to the Sheriff to remit such action 'to the Court of the defender's domicile in another sheriffdom,' and to sec. 12, which, by its first subsection, provides for citation in such cases.

"The argument, as I understood it, was, that because the word county was used and not sheriffdom it was to be inferred that but for the Act the Sheriff in one county, forming part of a united sheriffdom, would not have had jurisdiction over a defender who had a place of business in another county, forming part of the same sheriffdom. But I think the inference inadmissible. The statute does not profess to do more than confer jurisdiction. It says nothing about the seat of the Court at which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. It confers jurisdiction in language which is not a whit more clear or absolute than that of sec. 12 of the Act of 1870. I do not think it applies to the jurisdiction of a Sheriff over the divisions of a united county at all. If it does, it adds nothing in language or in substance to his power, and I think that the use of the word 'sheriffdom' at the close of the section shews that there was no intention of drawing any distinction between a county and a sheriffdom.

"Reference was made to Edwards v. The Inverness and Aberdeen Railway Company, 24th April 1862, 4 Irv. 185, where the Sheriff, sitting in the Small-Debt Court at Banff, dismissed an action of damages against the railway company on the ground of no jurisdiction. The statutory domicile of the railway company was Inverness, but it had been cited at Keith, in Banffshire. The pursuer appealed to the Circuit Court at Inverness, and seems to have argued that there was jurisdiction because Keith was a principal station. The appeal was dismissed. The grounds of judgment do not appear quite clearly. But it was pointed out that Lords Neaves and Ardmillan both indicated that there might have been a difference had the action been brought in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, in which county the injury happened; and it was argued that, as Elgin and Banff were united counties, it could, if the respondent's argument were sound, have made no difference as to the question of jurisdiction whether the action was brought at Banff or at Elgin. It does not appear, however, that the attention of the Judges was called to the point at all, and they do not purport to decide it, nor, indeed, allude to it.

"III. The further question is this, whether, admitting the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, it was competent to convene the defender to the Sheriff Court at

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.

Tait v. Johnston.

ion) maintained that the only proper place at which to cite him was 'eebles, the head burgh of his county, and that there only was he bound dinburgh, and entertain a cause against him in that Court, or, whether the complainer is now entitled to say that he was only bound to attend the Court of the heriff at Peebles, the head burgh of the county in which he was resident?

"This is not a question of jurisdiction exactly, but rather about the conditions of its exercise, and especially about the Court at which it can be competently exercised. It is not in this case complicated by any question as to the power of the Sheriff-clerk to sign the warrant of citation, because the warrant is igned by the Sheriff-substitute, about whose power there is no question. The oint appears a difficult one, and there is, so far as I have been able to discover, ardly any authority in our books on the subject. The only similar reported ase, so far as I am aware, is Dowie v. Douglas, 30th May 1817, Fac. Coll., hich it may be worth while merely to refer to, but as I do not see that it can e used as an authority either way it is not necessary to advert to it further. I ay refer also to Ersk. i. 4, 5, where he treats of the exercise of a Sheriff's jurisiction at the head burgh of a county, or of the division of a county, and he ives as an example and illustration 'the shire of Clydesdale,' which in his time ad been separated into three divisions, but he does not affirm that it would be ncompetent to exercise jurisdiction at the head burgh of one division over an nhabitant of another division.

"Allusion may also be made to the Act for the regulation of the Commissary Courts, 1823, 4 Geo. IV. cap. 97, which by sec. 6 provides that where two counties are under the jurisdiction of one Sheriff they shall constitute one commissariot; and to 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 26, which authorises the Sheriff of two counties to hold Commissary Courts in both counties if he shall think proper. The inference is legitimate that he could, if he chose, exercise his jurisdiction, t least as commissary, in one of the counties over persons resident in another, nd that seems simply in consequence of two commissariots being united.

"It is argued, on the one hand, that before the union of the counties it was he right of the defender to be convened at the Sheriff Court in his own county, nd that there are no words in the statute to deprive him of that right; that he object of establishing resident Sheriff-substitutes and local Courts was just to ake this right effectual; and that although there might be no great hardship in he case still there was some hardship, and the hardship would be very great if some of the northern counties it were held to be in the power of a pursuer to ompel a defender to come from one county to another in the same sheriffdom.

On the other hand, it was maintained that, seeing the complainer resided in the territory of the Sheriff, he was bound to obey his citation judicially en, and that there was neither principle nor authority for denying to the riff the power to convene any person within his territory to any established of his Court; that it was within the power of a Sheriff, by an order of rt, to determine to what seat of Court persons resident in the different dise of his sheriffdom should be convened; that this was a matter safely left his discretion and not vested in any other authority, and that that power of Sheriff had been exercised in various cases in which more than one seat of Court had been established in a county; that the intention of the statute to abolish all distinctions between the different counties united into one riffdom so far as the administration of the law was concerned.

Having regard to the very comprehensive language of the statute uniting counties, I am unable to sustain the complainer's contention, or to restrict Sheriff in the exercise of his jurisdiction without some definite authority, atory, judicial, or institutional. It is true that it would be highly inconient if a pursuer were allowed to call a defender to the Court in a united riffdom most convenient to himself, without regard to the residence of the fender, but it is not necessary to hold that a pursuer has that power. The tter is under the control of the Sheriff, who can regulate it by an order of rt, and can, if he thinks fit, refuse to issue his warrant of citation against a fender more suitably amenable to another Court, or can perhaps deal with

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

testamentary deeds executed by the deceased on the ground of facility and circumvention, and for declarator that the succession of the deceased was to be regulated by a prior testamentary deed under which they were residuary legatees, the pursuers did not produce the prior deed founded on, and the defenders alleged that it had been destroyed animo revocandi. The pursuers then added an averment that they were respectively heir-at-law and next of kin of the deceased. Held that having the alternative title of heirs ab intestato and disponees under the deed alleged to have been revoked, they had a title to sue a reduction of later deeds granted to their prejudice, and that the validity of these deeds fell to be decided in the first place (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood (Ordinary), who had sisted process in order that a proving of the tenor of the prior deed might be brought).

1st Division. Ld. Wellwood. C.

On 1st July 1890 Mrs Agnes Kinnaird or Gilchrist, widow, and William and Jane Alexander Gilchrist, children, of the late John Gilchrist, Leith, brought an action against Mrs Jane Goodlet or Morrison, Leith sole executor and universal legatory under a last will and testament bearing to be executed on 6th February 1890 by Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy, and general disponee and donee under disposition and deed of gift bearing to be executed on 6th February by the said Mrs Purdy, and also against William Rew, merchant, Leith, and William Asher S.S.C., Leith, trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement bearing to be executed by Mrs Purdy on 20th January 1890, concluding for reduction of the said three deeds, for declarator that a trust-disposition and settlement executed on 16th December 1889 by the said Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy was the deed by which the succession to the means and estate left by the said deceased Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy fell to be regulated, and that the pursuers were entitled to the provisions made in their favour by the said last mentioned trust-disposition and settlement; and for decree ordaining Mrs Morrison to count and reckon for her intromissions with the estate on that footing.

The pursuers stated (cond. 5), that Mrs Purdy, the deceased, was the elder daughter of the said John Gilchrist, the husband of the first named pursuer and father of the other pursuers. (Cond. 1) "About the middle of December [1889] she sent for the family law-agent, Mr Asher, and gave him instructions to make a fresh will, as she knew her illness was incurable, and she wished to make a final settlement of her affairs in prospect of an early death. Mr Asher accordingly prepared a trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by her on the 16th day of December 1889, and by which she conveyed her whole means and estate to Mr Asher and his managing clerk, Mr John Rew, whom she appointed her trustees and executors." The substance of the will was payment of debts, &c., and of certain legacies, including one of £500 to the defender Mrs Morrison, and of the residue to the pursuer Mrs Gilchrist in liferent, and to the other pursuers in fee. "The said will was carefully prepared by the instructions of Mrs Purdy, and it was fully considered by her before she signed it. The said deed contained the real wishes of the testatrix with regard to the disposal of her estate after her death. A copy of the said trust-disposition and settlement is herewith produced." The pursuers then set forth the grounds of reduction of the deeds libelled (under which the pursuers were entirely excluded from the succession), which were facility and circumvention.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The deeds sought to be reduced not being the deeds of the late Mrs Purdy, ought to be set aside, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) Separatim, The said deeds ought to be reduced, in respect that at the dates when the same were executed the deceased Mrs Purdy was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, and that the said Mrs Morrison and John Goodlet, or one or other of them, taking advantage of her said weakness and facility, did by fraud or circumvention impetrate the said deeds from Mrs Purdy to her lesion. (3) The trust-disposition and settlement of 16th December 1889, being the deed regulating the succession to the deceased Mrs Purdy's means and estate, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders lodged answers in which they denied the facility and circumvention alleged, and in answer to cond. 10 averred;—(Ans. 10) "The pursuers are called on to produce this deed or to prove that any such deed was executed and retained by Mrs Purdy as the final expression of her testamentary intentions. It is explained that on the 28th January 1890, the testatrix being then of sound disposing mind, and fully understanding and comprehending the legal results of such action, sent for Mr Peter Peterson Slater, solicitor and law-agent, and after requesting him to act as her agent, explained to him that the said trust-disposition and settlement in the said condescendence mentioned had been in fact revoked by the will prepared by Mr Asher, and executed on the 20th January, as mentioned in condescendence 13, and desired Mr Slater to destroy the same in her presence as useless and as not expressing her will, which Mr Slater accordingly did. Such destruction was deliberately done animo revocandi, and the said trust-disposition and settlement is not now in existence."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

The pursuers at adjustment made this addition to cond. 10;—"With reference to the statement in answer, the pursuers have no knowledge whether the will in question was destroyed, or by whom it was destroyed. If Mrs Purdy destroyed it as stated by the defender, she did so in consequence of the defender having by fraud or circumvention induced her to do so while she was weak and facile and easily imposed upon. On the deeds under reduction being reduced, the pursuers will, if necessary, bring a proving of the tenor of the will in question."

The pursuers also made the following addition to their cond. 5;—"The pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law, and the pursuer Jane Alexander Gilchrist is one of her next of kin."

On 15th January the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sists process in hoc statu in order that the pursuers may, if so advised, raise an action of proving the tenor of the trust-disposition and settlement executed on 16th December 1889 by Mrs Jemima Gilchrist or Purdy, upon which they found; meantime reserves all questions of expenses." *

---

* "OPINION.—This action is laid entirely on the footing that the deed by which the succession to the means and estate of the deceased Mrs Purdy falls to be regulated is a trust-disposition and settlement dated 16th December 1889, under which the pursuers are beneficiaries to a large extent. The pursuers claim as beneficiaries under that deed, and the conclusions of the summons and the statements on record, especially those in condescendence 10, shew that that deed is the title on which they rely. It is true that they now state that the pursuer William Gilchrist is Mrs Purdy's heir-at-law; but so little was that in view when the action was raised that the fact was not stated in the original condescendence.

"Now the deed of 16th December 1889 is not forthcoming. It is stated by the defender, and there is little reason to doubt the truth of the statement so far, that it was destroyed on the 28th of January 1890, about a week after the execution by Mrs Purdy of a trust-disposition and settlement dated 20th January 1890, which is the first in date of the deeds under reduction. In these circumstances, I think it is necessary for the pursuers to prove the tenor of the deed

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had a double title, as disponees under the deed alleged to have been destroyed, and as heirs of the deceased ab intestato. They were entitled to plead these titles alternatively to the effect of insisting on this reduction. That took the present case out of the principle of Shaw[1] referred to by the Lord Ordinary, for there the pursuer's only title was the lost deed. A proving of the tenor was not a suitable way of trying what would virtually be an issue of facility and circumvention, for the question in the proving would be the state of the mind of the deceased at the date of the alleged revocation. Such a question ought to be tried by a jury upon an issue in the usual terms. The proper course was to dispose of the validity of the deeds sought to be reduced first, for if they should be reduced the interest of the present parties was reversed, as Mrs Morrison was a beneficiary under the deed alleged to have been destroyed, and the pursuers as heirs ab intestato would have an interest to reduce that deed.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was laid upon a deed which was not in existence, and a proving of the tenor was an essential preliminary to any action on a lost document.[2] It could not be founded on as giving a title to sue. Nor could the pursuers plead their alleged title as heirs, for the title of heir became active only if there was no deed to displace it; under the former law, the heir could not have sued a reduction ex capite lecti if the effect of reduction was to set up a prior deed. The whole scheme of the present summons was that there was such a prior deed. The question whether a testamentary deed had been destroyed by the deceased animo revocandi could quite satisfactorily be disposed of in a proving of the tenor.[3] of 16th December 1889 on which they found. In doing this, they will have to prove the casus amissionis; and, if it is true that the will was destroyed by the orders of Mrs Purdy, to prove that she was not then in such a state of mind as to be capable of effectually cancelling or revoking it. The question to be tried in the action of proving the tenor will therefore practically be the same as that sought to be raised in this action. But an action of proving the tenor proceeds in the Inner-House; and therefore the present process must be sisted until the pursuers take steps to set up the deed of 16th December 1889—Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, and Bonthrone v. Ireland, 10 R. 779.

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—In this case there is no question that the averments on record are sufficient to sustain the reductive conclusions. The only question is as to whether the pursuers have a title to sue. There is no doubt that when the action was brought into Court the pursuers thought the deed of 16th December 1889 was still in existence, or at least did not know whether it was destroyed or not, and there can be no doubt that that was the title on which the action was originally brought, and that accounts for the

---

"The pursuers strongly maintain that William Gilchrist, being heir-at-law, and entitled to succeed to the heritage left by Mrs Purdy if she died intestate, he is, in any case, entitled to sue the action, and challenge the deeds under reduction. As I have already indicated, the summons is so framed that I do not think it can proceed as an action at the instance of the heir. But, further, if the pursuers' averments are true, William Gilchrist, as heir-at-law, was cut out by the deed of 16th December 1889, and the parties really entitled to challenge the subsequent deeds are the disponees or beneficiaries under that deed."

[1] Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, June 13, 1876, 3 R. 813.

[2] Gordon v. Robertson, Oct. 28, 1873, 11 S. L. R. 35.

[3] Bonthrone v. Ireland, March 15, 1883, 10 R. 779.

No. 129.

Mar. 5, 1891.
National Bank of Australasia v. Turnbull & Co.

is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour are duly taken."

This again is a declaration of the common law, and no novelty, and correctly defines the obligation of the drawer at the time of drawing. It shews that the obligation is unilateral, and that the payee has then no debtor under the written instrument but the drawer. But according to the contention of the defenders, the written contract may be entirely abrogated and superseded by a verbal agreement which becomes the substitute, and the only substitute, for the written contract.

It seems almost unnecessary to advert to the question how far parole evidence may be admitted to clear the question quo animo the delivery of a bill has been made. But as the Lord Ordinary has apparently attached some importance to the supposed analogy between such a case and the present, it may be as well to point out the essential distinction between the two. No written instrument containing contracts or obligations is complete until it has been delivered, i.e., until the party who is bound by the contract or obligation has transferred the actual possession to another. But delivery, whether of goods or writing, is a matter of fact, and as proof pro ut de jure is admissible to instruct that fact, it seems to follow, of necessity, that the purpose for which the delivery is made may be proved in the same way. But no such proof will vary or affect the contracts or obligations expressed in a written instrument so conditionally or unconditionally delivered.

It has also been suggested that in accommodation bills it was competent to prove before the statute by writ or oath of the party, that the person who stood ex facie of the bill true debtor was not so in fact, and that under section 100 parole evidence may now be received in place of writ or oath of party. To this I assent. But the case of accommodation bills has no true analogy to the present. If the drawer of such a bill be truly the debtor, and not, as appears on the face of the bill, the creditor, that fact can be proved, and will be given effect to in a question between the true debtor and the true creditor. But this does not alter the contract expressed in the bill. Drawer and acceptor, whatever their true relation in accounting between one another, do not cease to be drawer and acceptor respectively, and liable as such to any bona fide holder for value. But if effect were given to the contention of the defenders in the present case, the bill would cease to exist as a document of debt altogether.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and that the pursuers should have decree for the contents of the two bills, with interest.

LORD ADAM.—The bills here were drawn by the defenders in favour of the pursuers upon Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, of Melbourne, the defenders' foreign principals, but in both cases acceptance was refused by the drawees. We have in the second article of the pursuers' statement, which is not disputed, the history of these bills and how they came to be granted. They say,—"Against a shipment of wood pulp to Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, merchants in Melbourne, the defenders on 15th November 1889 drew a bill on them in favour of the pursuers for £524, 15s. 10d., payable ninety days after sight. The pursuers bought the bill, and obtained therewith the bills of lading of said shipment duly endorsed by the defenders." It appears that the price of the goods ordered by the defenders for shipment to Phipps, Turnbull, & Company was

No. 124.

Feb. 28, 1891. Gilchrist v. Morrison.

and if the deed of 16th December has not been destroyed—and the pursuers do not know whether it is destroyed or not—and if it is produced before the trial, they have a perfectly good title. The other is the title of heir-at-law, but they have a perfectly good title on which to try the question here. If the first deed had been the only title upon which the pursuers had to rely, I should, on the authority of the case of Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees, 3 R. 813, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, and on the principle of it, have had no doubt whatever that the course pursued by the Lord Ordinary was the right one, namely, that if that had been the sole title it would have been necessary to bring a proving of the tenor—either to produce it, or, if not recoverable, to proceed by way of proving the tenor first before they could go on with the action. But that is not the state of the title, for as I have already pointed out, the only effect of this first deed is not to destroy the pursuers' title to sue but to give another and equally good title to sue. If it is not produced or not proved, then they are respectively heir-at-law and next of kin.

That being so, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered. I think in this case the pursuers have a perfectly good title to try the question here on issues in the usual form. It may be that after the leading conclusions of the action are decided in one way or another, it may be necessary for the further progress of this action then to have a proving of the tenor. That may be quite possible. If it should be that these deeds are set aside by the verdict of a jury, then it may be that the pursuers will not be enabled to go on with the declaratory and accounting conclusions without putting themselves in a position to insist in these. But if the main question is settled in one way or another, I think that will clear the way for the proper disposal of the remainder. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor should be altered, and the case tried by a jury.

Lord M'Laren.—If there had been no averment in this action as to the pursuers, that one of them stands in the relation of heir-at-law, and the other is that of next of kin to the defunct, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary that this action could not proceed without a proving of the tenor of the lost disposition, for I think no one can pursue a reduction founding on the title of disponee without being liable to be called upon as a condition of prosecuting the case to produce the deed which he asserts to be his title. Admittedly the pursuers are not in a condition to produce the deed which they libel, because it has been destroyed—they say destroyed under circumstances which do not affect its validity, but that is a matter which I think would have to be investigated as a condition of establishing the title to sue in the character of disponee. Now, when the summons was originally brought into Court, the character of disponee was the only title alleged by the pursuers. Since then they have apparently without objection amended their condescendence by asserting a title of heir-at-law and next of kin. I confess it would have been more satisfactory to my mind if that amendment had been made by leave of the Court, by minute of amendment and interlocutor following upon it. There has been an amendment of that nature made already, but that does not touch this question; it is an amendment having relation to the character of the defenders. But as I should at anyrate have been prepared to consent to such an amendment if it had been asked for, and as I understand your Lordships think it is within the power of the pursuer on revisal to make such an addition to his condescendence,

No. 124.
Feb. 28, 1891.
Gilchrist v. Morrison.

I am quite satisfied to deal with the case as one in which the pursuers now found on the double title of disponees and also of heirs ab intestato. In the second of these characters they are clearly entitled to follow out this action, because the title of heir and next of kin is always a good title to challenge any deed whatsoever alleged to be granted by a deceased person, and challengeable on these grounds. Therefore, while sympathising with the Lord Ordinary's desires to enforce strictness of pleading in matters of title, I think that the objection that seemed to his Lordship to be insuperable may be got over, and that this action ought to be allowed to proceed. I concur with Lord Adam in thinking that if it turns out that the real interests of the pursuers rest upon anything in the deed, it would then be necessary to set up the deed by some subsequent procedure before operative effect could be given to it.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that if the only title of the pursuers of this action had been that of disponees under the destroyed deed, the course which the Lord Ordinary has adopted would have been the right one, because until that deed was either produced or the tenor of it proved, they could not come to Court at all with a title to challenge what has been done. But the character of heir-at-law on the part of one pursuer, and that of one of the next of kin on the part of another, removes that difficulty altogether, because whether the destroyed deed is to be set up again or not, they are quite entitled to have the deed which has been granted by the deceased to their prejudice set aside if they can make out that the testatrix was not of sound disponing mind at the date of the deed, or was in a state of facility and was circumvented by the defender. The effect of a verdict setting aside the deeds made by the testatrix will be merely this, that these deeds will have no effect whatever; but that will not settle the question whether the deed which is said to have been destroyed, and of which the tenor is sought to be proved, is to be set up or not; but the parties, when decree of reduction has been pronounced, will be in a position then to reconsider their interest in the two events of the destroyed deed being set up, or of their acquiescing in its destruction. We do not know exactly what the interests of the pursuers are under that original destroyed disposition, but if there are interests created by that disposition which are adverse to the interest of the heir and next of kin it will then be a question whether the proving of the tenor might not settle the question between the parties; and therefore I think the logical order of the proceeding is to settle in the first place whether the testatrix was of sound disponing mind, or was circumvented in the granting of the deeds which are now maintained and set up by the defenders. And I therefore come to exactly the same conclusion as Lord Adam, that it is quite unnecessary to consider at present what the effect of a decree of reduction may be.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remit to adjust issues to try the question whether the deeds of 20th January and 6th February 1890 were not the deeds of the testatrix, or whether she was in a state of facility and weakness and was circumvented by the defender."

STUART & STUART, W.S.—SNODY & ASHER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

GEORGE TAIT, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—M'Lennan.
JOHN JOHNSTON, Respondent.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.

Process—Citation—Statute 1592, cap. 141—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 77), secs. 3, 4.—A service copy of a petition in a Sheriff Court was sent by registered letter to the defender, with a citation bearing in gremio to be executed by A B, a law-agent, but it was not signed by A B, but by C D, another law-agent, for A B. The execution returned upon the petition was in the statutory form, and was signed by A B.

In a suspension of a decree in absence obtained against the defender, he pleaded that the citation was invalid.

Held that as the execution returned upon the petition had not been reduced, the defender was barred from objecting to the citation.

Opinion (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the citation was valid.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Process—Union of several counties into one sheriffdom—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 92), sec. 4—Sheriffs Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 86), secs. 4, 5, 6, 12.—In a sheriffdom in which several counties are combined the granting of a warrant to cite a defender to appear in a Court in a county which is not the county of his domicile, is a matter within the discretion of the Sheriff.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

ON 7th August 1890 John Johnston, joiner, Innerleithen, raised an action for £50, 17s. 3d., as the amount of the balance of an account against George Tait, Woodside Cottage, Innerleithen, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

A warrant to cite, dated 7th August 1890, was pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh (Orphoot), ordaining Tait, if he intended to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, to lodge appearance with the Clerk of Court at Edinburgh.

A copy of the petition and warrant was sent by post to Tait, with a schedule of citation bearing to be executed by Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., law-agent, and to be signed for him by T. H. Lang Guthrie, solicitor. An execution in terms of the statutory schedule, written upon the principal petition, was signed by Marcus J. Brown.*

On 12th September 1890 decree in absence was taken against Tait, who had received the citation and had corresponded with Johnston's agent with regard to the claim, but had lodged no defences.

A charge on the decree was given.

On 13th October 1890 Tait brought a suspension of the decree and charge, on the grounds set forth in his pleas in law, which were;—1. The complainer having no residence or place of business within the county of Midlothian, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the

---

* The Citation Amendment Act, 1882, enacts by sec. 3, " . . . In any civil action any summons or warrant of citation of any person . . . may be executed . . . . by an enrolled law-agent by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant, or judicial intimation is to be served, . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons, . . . with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, and such posting shall constitute a valid and legal citation."

Section 4 enacts, inter alia,—"(3) The execution to be returned by the officer or law-agent shall be accompanied by the post-office receipt for the registered letter: The execution returned by a law-agent shall for all purposes be equivalent to an execution by any officer of Court: The execution may be in the form contained in the first schedule hereto."

The schedule bears,—"This summons . . . executed by me, . . . law-agent . . . (Signature of Agent.)"

No. 129.

Mar. 5, 1891.
National Bank of Australasia v. Turnbull & Co.

is also an undertaking on the part of the acceptor that he will pay the sum contained in the bill. By these undertakings the parties are bound absolutely. But it does not appear on the face of the bill what is the nature of the antecedent arrangement between the drawer and the acceptor. The arrangement may be that the acceptor shall give credit to the drawer to a certain extent, and that to the agreed extent the credit may be drawn upon. Or the arrangement may be, that the drawer shall only draw against cash in the acceptor's hands. Either arrangement is consistent with the purposes for which bills of exchange are granted, and with the form of the instrument; because the bill does not affirm that the acceptor is the drawer's debtor.

Accordingly, where a drawer has paid his bill and is seeking to charge the acceptor, the question of liability generally resolves into an inquiry as to the state of the account between the drawer and the acceptor. Opinions may differ as to the best way of conducting such an inquiry. Under our customary law, evidence was confined to writ or oath. By statute parole evidence is now admissible. But in any case the proof could have no effect in restricting the obligations of the subscribing parties to a holder of the bill for value, and it is therefore distinguishable in principle from the proof which the Lord Ordinary proposes to allow. I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair as to the true principle of construction of the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, and as to the application of that principle to the facts of this case, and it follows that the pursuers are entitled to recover in terms of the bill under deduction of any sum which they may have received out of the proceeds of the sale of the goods.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with all your Lordships that the defenders' statement contains no relevant averments which can be remitted to proof. Their statement as to the way in which the bills in question came to be granted and discounted by the pursuers is clear enough. They say that there had been for fifteen or twenty years a course of business between them and their correspondents in Australia, by which the defenders were in the habit of consigning goods to the Australian firm of Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, and drawing bills upon the consignees which they discounted with a London bank. Then they say that in 1888, in accordance with the ordinary course of transactions, they consigned certain quantities of wood pulp to Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, upon their order. Payment of these they say was made by drafts on the pursuers which were met by bills drawn by the defenders on their principals Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, payable to the pursuers. They go on to say that trade in Australia having become bad their correspondents there wrote cancelling further consignments, but that before that letter had been received they had despatched two consignments for which they had drawn bills in the ordinary way. They say,—"Two consignments, however, one for fifty tons of pulp, and the other for ten tons thereof, could not be cancelled. Payment of these two consignments was made by the pursuers, which payment was made by bills drawn on Messrs Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, and payable to the pursuers in the ordinary way." Then they state the sums contained in these two bills which are the subject of this action. Now, that is an averment that the pursuers gave value to the defenders for these bills. The defenders indeed say in the next article of their statement that they personally received no value; but that is quite inconsistent with the facts as they have themselves stated them, because the

No. 125.

Feb. 28, 1891.
Tait v. Johnston.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The question raised was not merely one of jurisdiction. The complainer (assuming the jurisdic-

only two statutes recently passed on the subject. The first is the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 92, by which the union of various counties is provided for when vacancies should occur, and sec. 4 provides that when a vacancy should occur in the sheriffdom of Peebles it should be united with the county of Midlothian into one sheriffdom. The later Act, which is the Act directly applicable, is the Sheriffs Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86. By secs. 4, 5, and 6 provision is made for the union of the counties of Midlothian, Linlithgow, Haddington, and Peebles into one sheriffdom, to be called the Sheriffdom of the Lothians and Peebles; and by sec. 12 it is enacted, that every union of counties into one sheriffdom 'shall be deemed to be a complete union to all intents and purposes, in so far as regards the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of procurators before the Courts of the Sheriff: And the several counties of any such united sheriffdom shall not be thereafter regarded as separate sheriffdoms or jurisdictions, in so far as regards the powers, duties, rights, and privileges of the Sheriff and his Substitutes, and the procurators of the Sheriff Court.'

"In the face of these absolute and comprehensive words it seems impossible to deny the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles in this case. Counsel for the complainer referred to sec. 6 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70, which provides that a person having a place of business in a county shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff thereof, although domiciled in another county, if cited personally, or at his dwelling-place, with power to the Sheriff to remit such action 'to the Court of the defender's domicile in another sheriffdom,' and to sec. 12, which, by its first subsection, provides for citation in such cases.

"The argument, as I understood it, was, that because the word county was used and not sheriffdom it was to be inferred that but for the Act the Sheriff in one county, forming part of a united sheriffdom, would not have had jurisdiction over a defender who had a place of business in another county, forming part of the same sheriffdom. But I think the inference inadmissible. The statute does not profess to do more than confer jurisdiction. It says nothing about the seat of the Court at which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. It confers jurisdiction in language which is not a whit more clear or absolute than that of sec. 12 of the Act of 1870. I do not think it applies to the jurisdiction of a Sheriff over the divisions of a united county at all. If it does, it adds nothing in language or in substance to his power, and I think that the use of the word 'sheriffdom' at the close of the section shews that there was no intention of drawing any distinction between a county and a sheriffdom.

"Reference was made to Edwards v. The Inverness and Aberdeen Railway Company, 24th April 1862, 4 Irv. 185, where the Sheriff, sitting in the Small-Debt Court at Banff, dismissed an action of damages against the railway company on the ground of no jurisdiction. The statutory domicile of the railway company was Inverness, but it had been cited at Keith, in Banffshire. The pursuer appealed to the Circuit Court at Inverness, and seems to have argued that there was jurisdiction because Keith was a principal station. The appeal was dismissed. The grounds of judgment do not appear quite clearly. But it was pointed out that Lords Neaves and Ardmillan both indicated that there might have been a difference had the action been brought in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, in which county the injury happened; and it was argued that, as Elgin and Banff were united counties, it could, if the respondent's argument were sound, have made no difference as to the question of jurisdiction whether the action was brought at Banff or at Elgin. It does not appear, however, that the attention of the Judges was called to the point at all, and they do not purport to decide it, nor, indeed, allude to it.

"III. The further question is this, whether, admitting the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, it was competent to convene the defender to the Sheriff Court at tions being entered into at all, and it would appear to me to come to this, that the bank are said to have agreed with Phipps, Turnbull, & Company that they would discount bills drawn upon them upon which they alone should be liable. I cannot extract any other meaning from the statement than that. And accordingly it would appear to me that if that agreement had been carried out, and the defenders had drawn upon Phipps, Turnbull, & Company, as they might easily have done, in terms which should exclude recourse against them, the agreement would have been carried out if the London bank had discounted these bills. But the agreement was not carried out, because what was done was not to present to the bank for discount any bill which would give effect to that antecedent parole agreement. The Bills of Exchange Act enables that to be done by the provisions of the 16th section, in which it is provided that the drawer of a bill may insert an "express stipulation negativing or limiting his own liability to the holder." And therefore there would have been no difficulty in carrying out the supposed agreement if the bank and the defenders had acted upon it. But they did not present such a bill, but, on the contrary, asked the bank to discount for value a bill drawn in ordinary terms containing no restriction or limitation whatever. It would rather appear to me that if that bill had been accepted, and the action had been brought against the defenders as drawers in respect of the drawees' failure to pay, the answer the bank would have made to the defence, which would have been set up in the same terms as now, would have been conclusive, because it would have been obvious, that the whole arrangements had been displaced by written contracts passing between the parties, in the course of carrying out the transactions to which the antecedent arrangement had referred. The defence in that case would have been an attempt to displace the plain legal effect and import of a written contract by antecedent communings, not between the parties to the contract, but between one of them and somebody else. And apart altogether from any difficulty arising on the construction of the Bills of Exchange Act, I should as at present advised have great difficulty in holding that such an averment would have been relevant in an action of the kind I am supposing.

But I agree with Lord Adam that it is unnecessary to consider how an agreement of that kind would have been proved, because that is not an agreement that would go to affect the defenders' liability in this case. The meaning of the bill is that the defenders undertake that the drawee shall accept. Now, it is not alleged that there was any obligation on the part of the bank to discharge the drawers' liability if the drawees refused to accept. It is quite impossible to read the statement of the arrangements that took place between Mr Smith, on the part of the drawers, and the London bank as containing any agreement which did not assume that the drawers had undertaken liability upon the bills to which the agreement referred. It cannot possibly import an agreement that Phipps, Turnbull, & Company were to be liable, and were to be exclusively liable, upon bills to which they had refused to become parties. But that is the import which we are asked to put upon that agreement. If it did not mean that, it would be quite irrelevant to any question arising in this case. And therefore the defenders' reading of this statement comes to this, that it means that there was a contract between the payees upon these bills and the persons upon whom the bills were drawn, that if those persons should refuse to accept them, the payees should have no action against the drawers to whom they had given value for them. That would be certainly a very singular arrangement,

No. 125. Feb. 28, 1891. Tait v. Johnston.

to answer the citation.[1] Were it otherwise, a pursuer who resided in Shetland might convene a defender also residing there to appear at Wick. A defender was not bound to submit to that. (2) A citation must be made by the agent who returned the execution, and by no other. Here it was not so, and this was so plainly a null citation that no reduction was necessary.

Counsel for respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When a statute enacts that certain counties named are to be united into one sheriffdom, and are not thereafter to be regarded as separate sheriffdoms or jurisdictions, it is perfectly clear on the face of it that a citation by the Sheriff to the head burgh of the principal of the counties united cannot be bad, although it may be inconvenient for a defender residing in another part of the jurisdiction to be cited there. At the same time, no one can doubt that the Sheriff, upon a representation being made to him that it would seriously inconvenience the defender to defend the action in the place to which he has been cited, would consider that objection and dispose of it. It is not to be assumed that the Sheriff exercises his powers in an unreasonable manner. If all the business of Edinburgh were attempted to be removed to Peebles or Linlithgow, some means would speedily be found for putting an end to such an outrage of public decency. The public trusts the Sheriff to conduct the business of his Courts properly.

Here the defender never asked the Sheriff to remit the whole case to Peebles. I think the first plea in law bad. As to the second plea of not being properly cited, I am of opinion that as the execution bears that the defender was duly cited, and no steps have been taken to set aside execution, it also falls to be repelled. I consider the whole proceedings in this case idle.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion, but I would like to state further that I see no objection to the citation in this case.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordship upon all the grounds stated.

THE COURT adhered.

ANDREW TOSH, S.S.C.—MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 126. Mar. 3, 1891. Barbour v. Chalmers & Co.

A. H. F. BARBOUR AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—M'Kechnie—Howden.

D. & J. CHALMERS & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—Jameson—Crole.

Process—Appeal—Removing—Act 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 18[illegible] sec. 44.—Where a landlord obtained decree of removal against a tenant, on the ground that he had no title to possess, an objection was taken to the competency of an appeal, on the ground that suspension in terms of the 44th section of the Judicature Act was the only competent remedy. Objection repelled.

any question of the kind by an award of expenses. If he have such power, the alleged inconvenience may prove more theoretical than actual. In this case the Sheriff-substitute has himself granted warrant to cite the defender to lodge his defences with the Sheriff-clerk at Edinburgh, and has decerned against him because he did not appear, and I have not been able to discover any reason which appears to me sufficient for denying his right to exercise his undoubted jurisdiction and power in that manner."

[1] Ersk. i. 4, 5.

No. 130.

Mar. 6, 1891.

Couper v. Surveyor of Maryhill.

on either side as respondents, craving a lining and authority to take down certain buildings on his ground and to erect others in their stead. The burgh surveyor and one of the other respondents appeared, and objected.

The Dean on 29th November found that the proposed buildings were in contravention of clause 177 of the General Police and Improvement Act of 1862,* and therefore refused the petition. This judgment was pronounced without any record having been made up, but merely on an inspection of the petitioner's plans. The plans shewed that the petitioner's ground was a rectangular piece of ground between two parallel streets, Main Street and Whitelaw Street. The frontages to both streets were fully occupied by buildings, and the space between the backs of the houses facing Main Street and the backs of those facing Whitelaw Street was 124 feet.

The petitioner proposed to interject a row of houses consisting of four tenements, to be occupied as sixteen dwellings of one apartment, and twenty-four dwellings each containing one room and kitchen, in all forty dwellings, parallel to the other streets, with a vacant space 40 feet in width between them and the back of Main Street, and a vacant space 35 feet in width between them and the back of Whitelaw Street. The plans shewed that the pursuer proposed to rebuild the houses fronting Main Street, leaving a space at the end 6 feet in width as an entrance to the back houses.

The grounds on which the magistrates proceeded, as stated in the note appended to their judgment, were two, viz.:—(1) That the 177th section would be transgressed in respect that the width of the proposed court, measuring to the back of the tenements in Main Street, would only be 40 feet, whereas, according to that section, as there were forty houses, i.e., dwellings, in the block, there must be a width of 47 feet, 15 feet for the first eight houses, plus an additional width of 1 foot for each of the remaining thirty-two houses, making a total width of 47 feet. (2) That the entrance must also be 47 feet in width, whereas the only entrance, so long as the existing houses fronting Main Street and Whitelaw Street were allowed to remain, was by two covered closes, while by the proposed plans which contemplated the rebuilding of the houses fronting Main Street, the proposed entrance to the back buildings was only 6 feet.

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—(1) The 177th section did not apply, because the space in question was private property, and the public had no right of entrance to it. The Act made special provisions for private courts. (2) Assuming that the section applied, the Dean of Guild had gone wrong in holding that the word "houses," as used in the section, meant "dwellings," it clearly meant "tenements." †

---

* 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, sec. 177,—"It shall not be lawful to form, lay out, or build any court unless the same shall be of a clear width of 15 feet, measuring from the buildings or intended buildings therein, provided always, that to any such court in which there shall be more than eight houses there shall be an additional width of 1 foot for every such additional house; provided also, that there shall be an entrance to every such court of the full width thereof, and open from the ground upwards."

† The appellant referred on the first point to sec. 142, and on the second to secs. 158, 162, 178, and 212; the respondent to section 213. These are in the following terms, viz.:—

Sec. 142.—"All private courts . . . shall be kept clean."

Sec. 158.—"The Commissioners shall, from time to time, cause the houses and buildings in all or any of the streets, public or private, to be marked with numbers," &c.

Sec. 162.—"When any house or building, any part of which projects beyond

No. 130. At advising,—

Mar. 6, 1891. Couper v. Surveyor of Maryhill.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is one of general importance, although I must say that in the particular case it does not look so important from a sanitary point of view as it may be in many other cases—this ground, on which it is proposed to erect what is called a mid-tenement, being so much on the slope of a hill that the buildings cannot be said to obstruct one another as regards light and air in any substantial degree at all. But that does not affect the principle,—the statute with which we have to deal, the Police and Improvement Act of 1862, not making any difference between sloping ground and level ground.

The question which we have to decide is whether or not the authority in Maryhill which controls the laying out of buildings and authorises or refuses authority to their construction has been right in this case in refusing to allow the complainer to build between two tenements, one facing Main Street and the other facing Whitelaw Street, a mid-tenement on the back ground.

Now, there are two substantial grounds on which objection is taken by the surveyor for the burgh. In the first place, he says that this proposed mid-tenement or row of houses is too near the existing houses under the statutory rules, and these rules are contained in clauses 177, 178, and 179 of the Act. Clause 177 enacts,—"It shall not be lawful to form, lay out, or build any court unless the same shall be of a clear width of 15 feet, measuring from the buildings or intended buildings therein, provided always, that to any such court in which there shall be more than eight houses there shall be an additional width of 1 foot for every such additional house; provided also, that there shall be an entrance to every such court of the full width thereof, and open from the ground upwards." Clause 178 relates to the height of houses in a court, and I do not think any case under that clause arises here. Then clause 179 is for the purpose of fixing the penalties for breach of the rules contained in clauses 177 and 178. Therefore it is upon clause 177 that this case really turns. There are two points in it. There is the point as regards the space to be left between the buildings to be erected, which will create the "court," and the nearest buildings, and there is the point about keeping the passage into the court open, and that that passage must be of the full width of the court.

The first question is a difficult one, and depends upon the interpretation to be put upon the word "house" in the Act of Parliament, and it is rendered doubly difficult by the fact that although this is a statute which in a very large number of its provisions relates directly to houses, there is no definition whatever in the statute of the word "house." The burgh surveyor maintains that the word "house" means every place occupied or to be occupied as a separate dwelling. The appellant, on the other hand, who objects to the decision of the Court below, maintains that "house" means tenement, that is to say, a house erected within four walls, consisting it may be of only one dwelling or many dwellings.

---

the regular line of the street, or beyond the front of the house or building on either side thereof, has been taken down in order to be altered," &c.

Sec. 178.—"It shall not be lawful to build any houses in any court which shall be of greater height than 30 feet, nor shall any houses in any court contain more than two flats above the ground flat," &c.

Sec. 212.—"It shall be lawful for the owners of any one or more floors or storeys of any house or other building within the burgh," &c.

Sec. 213.—"Where there are two or more houses in any tenement, the owner and occupier of each house shall permit," &c.

No. 130.

Mar. 6, 1891.
Couper v. Surveyor of Maryhill.

ccording to the convenience of the locality. Now, in this case it is not necesary for us to decide that question, because I think the case can be decided quite fficiently upon the second part of clause 177. But I think it would be hardly ir in a case of this importance to pass over that point altogether, although it not necessary to give an authoritative decision upon it. I am inclined to state hat my view of it is, viz., that the word "house" does not mean any part of a uilding that is occupied as a separate dwelling, but means a house in a building nse—that is, the tenement contained within the four walls which constitute e building. I find that in other clauses of the Act it is quite plain that that the meaning. Section 210 speaks separately of a house and of part of a house parately occupied. That section plainly indicates that the statute recognises at part of a house, although occupied by a separate family, is to be taken as a fferent thing from a house. Then clause 212 speaks separately of the parts of house. Section 213, which is the only one in which there is some ambiguity, ludes to where there are two or more houses in any tenement. I take that to ean that you may have a separate house altogether, though in the same tenement and within the same walls. It is a very common thing in Glasgow to have entirely separate house on the ground, opening separately from the street, ough within the same four walls as the rest of the house which contains a mmon stair above. Therefore, the leaning of my opinion would certainly be to this effect, that if the appellant here satisfies the statute as regards his houses by leaving a clear width of 15 feet between the houses and the other side of the urt, he is not liable to add an additional foot unless there are more than eight parate houses in what he is building.

But, as I said before, it is not necessary in this case to decide that, because I nk the decision of the Commissioners is right upon another point, viz., the ond proviso of clause 177, by which it is enacted that there shall be an rance to every such court of the full width thereof, open from the ground wards.

We are told here—and we see it for ourselves—that the plans shew a passage the front tenement in Main Street into this court of only 6 feet wide. Then is not an entrance of the full width of the court which is to be formed, and fore I think that the burgh authority of Maryhill was right in refusing to the erection of this mid-tenement on that ground. Therefore I think we affirm the decision of the Dean of Guild.

Whether or not the appellant, if he alters his plans so as to give the full width the court from the entrance in Main Street backwards, will be entitled to proed with his buildings is a question which depends on the interpretation to be upon the first part of clause 177, as to which I have indicated my opinion; in the meantime the decision will go, as I understand, upon the second half the clause, that he has not kept the passage opening out to the street of the width required by statute. It is quite obvious that the reason for that proion in the statute is that there may be a proper access for air on the level of ground of sufficient width to properly air the court, but whatever the ground is, the provision of section 177 is so distinctly clear that I think there can no doubt as to the decision we must pronounce.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The appellant admitted—and I think very proly admitted—that if the 177th section of the statute applied to this case, the peal could not be sustained. I am of opinion that it does apply to the case,

No. 130.

Mar. 6, 1891.
Couper v. Surveyor of Maryhill.

and therefore upon that ground I affirm the judgment. I do not give any further opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—The determination of the question raised by this appeal turns, as your Lordship has said, on the construction to be put on the 177th section of the General Police and Improvement Act of 1862, and the construction of that clause appears to me to be a matter of considerable difficulty. In this respect it is similar to many other clauses in the same statute, but one must endeavour to get at its meaning as best one can.

Now, the clause provides a certain restriction upon the use to be made of courts, and the first question that troubled me was whether that section did not apply entirely to courts to be formed without any application to courts already existing, and that for the reason that the clause begins, "It shall not be lawful to form, lay out, or build any court," which rather looks as if it refers to something to be done in the formation of a court, and that is in one sense a new creation, but I am satisfied, on giving the clause some consideration, that that would be to restrict its application unduly, and I think it is applicable to courts that are being made or courts that exist at the time the question concerning the court arises. Forming a court undoubtedly has reference to a thing not existing but to be formed, but the words "lay out or build any court" seem to me to refer to operations upon an existing court—at least the words may certainly be so read without doing them any violence.

I think it may fairly enough be said that the proceedings of the appellant are of the nature described in the section, as laying out or building this court. "Building a court" is an unfortunate expression, because a court, which is an area of uncovered ground, cannot be built in any proper sense, but I think the statute means building round a piece of uncovered ground so as to form it into a court or building upon a piece of uncovered ground. Now, taking it in that sense, I think the section I have alluded to has a distinct application to the case in question. I think the petitioner is endeavouring to lay out and build upon this court in a way which the statute, in the section I am reading, does not permit.

The two questions that your Lordship in the chair has alluded to—one of them perfectly free from doubt, and the other involved in some difficulty—are of importance, and I am inclined with your Lordship to indicate an opinion upon them. I think the word "house" in section 177 means tenement, and not a separate dwelling-place, and I think so for this reason, among others, that the immediately following section uses the same word "house" or "houses" in a sense which, from its context, must mean tenement. Therefore I am disposed to read in section 177 the word "house" in the same way as it obviously is intended to be read in section 178,—and the other sections that your Lordship referred to I think make this still clearer,—and that is in the sense of its being tenement, and not a separate dwelling-house.

But I agree with your Lordship that it is enough for the decision of this case to apply the last proviso of section 177, with regard to the passage to the court which has to be open to the full width of the court. Upon that ground I think the Dean of Guild was quite right in holding that the proposed buildings were in violation of that section, and consequently that his judgment to that effect ought to be affirmed.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—Agents.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF BARVAS AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—M'Kechnie—M'Lennan.
DONALD MACGREGOR, Defender (Appellant).—Strachan—John Wilson.

No. 131.
Mar. 10, 1891.
School Board of Barvas v. Macgregor.

School—Dismissal of teacher—Ultra vires—Committee of Council on Education—Public Teachers Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 18), sec. 3, subsec. 2.—The Public Teachers Act, 1882, sec. 3, subsec. 2, enacts that "No resolution of a school board for dismissal of a certificated teacher shall be valid unless agreed to by a majority of the full number of members of such school board."

In 1888 the Committee of Council on Education in Scotland resolved to give assistance to certain school boards in Scotland on condition, inter alia, that the board accepting the assistance should commit the management of their school to three managers, of whom one should be Her Majesty's inspector of schools for the district, which managers should have full power to dismiss the teacher.

The School Board of B. adopted this arrangement, and appointed M. and H., two of their number, to be managers along with the inspector of schools for the district.

In 1890 the School Board of B., by a majority of the whole members, passed a resolution dismissing the school teacher on three months' notice, the minute of the board bearing that "Mr R., Her Majesty's inspector, and Mr M., in their capacity as managers, concurred in and agreed to the dismissal. Mr H., in his capacity as manager, opposed the same."

The teacher having refused to remove from the schoolmaster's house (which formed part of his emoluments) on the ground that his dismissal was illegal, in respect that if the power of dismissal had been validly delegated to the managers, they had not competently exercised it, and that if the power of dismissal remained in the school board it had been invalidly exercised by the inspector taking part in the proceedings, the board brought an action for ejectment. Held that the dismissal was valid.

Opinion that the regulation of the Committee of Council making it a condition of giving assistance to school boards that the power of dismissing the teacher should be in the hands of the managers was ultra vires, as being inconsistent with the Public School Teachers Act, 1882, sec. 3, subsec. 2.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland. C.

ON 10th June 1885 Donald Macgregor, certificated teacher, was appointed by the School Board of the parish of Barvas, in the island of Lews, to be headmaster of the Lionel Public School in that parish. By the terms of his appointment he was to have, inter alia, a free house and garden, and three months' notice was to be given on either side of the termination of the engagement.

In December 1888 the Committee of Council on Education in Scotland resolved to give assistance to certain parishes in the Highlands on, inter alia, the following conditions:—"1. The school board shall, in pursuance of section 22 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, commit the management of each school under their charge to three managers, of whom one shall be Her Majesty's inspector in charge of the district. 2. To such managers shall be committed full powers of appointing and dismissing the teachers of the school under their management, of deciding as to the organisation of the school, the salaries of the staff, the fees to be exacted, and all items of expenditure in regard to the school, including lighting, heating, cleaning, and repairs."

In January 1889 the School Board of Barvas adopted this arrangement, and appointed Mr Maclennan (their chairman) and Mr Helm, one of their number, to be the managers of the Lionel School along with Mr Robertson, Her Majesty's inspector for the district.

On 26th May the clerk to the school board sent the following letter to Mr Macgregor:—"School Board of Barvas, Stornoway, 26th May 1890.—Dear Sir,—Lionel Public School,—I enclose extract from minutes of a meeting of this board, held to-day.* The extract contains intimation of your dismissal from office, and the dismissal will take effect on the expiry of three months from this date. Please acknowledge receipt hereof."

No. 131.
Mar. 10, 1891.
School Board of Barvas v. Macgregor.

Mr Macgregor having disputed the legality of his dismissal, and having refused to remove from the schoolmaster's house, the School Board and Mr Robertson and Mr Maclennan, managers, brought an action of removing in the Sheriff Court at Stornoway.

The pursuers pleaded;—The defender's right of occupancy of the said dwelling-house being to cease and expire on 26th August 1890, and it being the pursuers' desire that he shall remove therefrom on that date, decree ought to be granted as prayed for.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The defender not having been validly or legally dismissed from the office of teacher of Lionel Public School, is not bound to remove from the dwelling-house attached thereto.

On 15th November 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) pronounced an interlocutor in which, after findings in fact, he found in law "that said resolution was valid, in terms of the Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Act, 1882, and the notice thereof given to the defender was sufficient compliance with the terms of the agreement between the School Board and the defender," and granted warrant to eject as craved.

The Sheriff (Jameson) on appeal adhered on 26th December.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The defender's dismissal was invalid. If it was held to be the act of the managers it was invalid in respect that no notice was given by the managers of their intention to dismiss, and the minutes bearing to record the dismissal were those of the

* "Extract from Minutes of Meeting of the School Board for the parish of Barvas and Managers, held at Barvas on 26th May 1890.—Present: Messrs William Maclennan, James Paul Helm, Rev. D. Macbeath, Colin Morison, Murdo Macfarquhar, Roderick Macleod, Robert Hunter. Present also, J. L. Robertson, Esq., H.M.I.—Lionel School.—The clerk read a correspondence which had taken place since last meeting between himself and Mr Donald Macgregor, head master of Lionel Public School, from which it appeared that Mr Macgregor refused or delayed to tender his resignation of office, and that the following notice had been accordingly sent to Mr Macgregor, in terms of the Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Act, 1882, viz.:—'School Board of Barvas, Stornoway, 2d May 1890.—Dear Sir,—Lionel Public School,—I hereby give you notice, that at a meeting of the School Board for the parish of Barvas and managers, to be held within Barvas Inn, on Monday, 26th May current, at 1 o'clock P.M., a motion for your dismissal from the office of teacher of Lionel Public School will be considered. Please acknowledge the receipt of this notice. Yours truly, JOHN ROSS, Clerk.—Mr Donald Macgregor, teacher, Lionel,'—to which the following unsigned reply had been received:—'Lionel Schoolhouse, 5th May 1890.—J. Ross, Esq., Clk. to Barvas S. Board and Managers.—Dear Sir,—I received your notice of 2d instant. I consider it is illegal.' The Rev. Duncan Macbeath thereupon moved, that Mr Macgregor be dismissed from the office of headmaster of Lionel Public School at the expiry of three months from this date. The motion was seconded by Mr Murdo Macfarquhar. Mr James Paul Helm moved as an amendment that Mr Macgregor be not dismissed from office. The amendment was seconded by Mr Roderick Macleod. The amendment and motion having been put to the vote, the former was not further supported. The motion for dismissal was concurred in and agreed to by Mr Robert Hunter and the chairman, and it accordingly became the finding of the meeting. Mr Colin Morison declined to vote. Mr Macgregor is accordingly dismissed from office, the dismissal to take effect on the expiry of three months from this date. Mr Robertson, H.M.I., and Mr Maclennan, in their capacity as managers of Lionel School, concurred in and agreed to the dismissal. Mr Helm, in his capacity as manager, opposed the same. A true extract. JOHN Ross, Clerk."

No. 131.

Mar. 10, 1891. School Board of Barvas v. Macgregor.

hool Board, not of the managers. The motion to dismiss was made and onded by members of the School Board who were not managers. rther, the managers had no power to act by a majority, and they were unanimous. Probably the defender's better ground of defence was t the dismissal was the act of the managers. It was true that under Public Schools Teachers Act, 1882,* a school board had probably no ver to delegate the power to dismiss teachers as it had under the Act 1872,† but if the teacher consented to such delegation that took the e out of the Act; and it was to be inferred here that the defender had consented. If, however, the delegation was held to be ultra vires of Board the dismissal by the Board was illegal by reason of the pre-ce of the inspector of schools, who took part in the meeting, although a member of the Board.[1]

The pursuers were not called on.

LORD ADAM.—The question which we have here to consider is whether the nissal of the appellant, Mr Macgregor, from his office of headmaster of the nel Public School in the parish of Barvas was a good dismissal or a bad nissal. Mr Macgregor says it was a bad one, in respect that the power of nissal was delegated to the managers of the school, and that they, and they ne, had power to dismiss him, and therefore that a combined meeting of the nagers and the School Board rendered the dismissal null, as the managers ht have been influenced by the pressure of the members of School Board who e not managers. He also maintains alternatively that if the School Board not the managers had the power of dismissal, then the dismissal was null espect of the presence of Mr Robertson, one of Her Majesty's inspectors of ools, who was a manager but not a member of the School Board.

Now, the question arises in this way as to the powers of these two bodies. ppears to be clear that by the 22d section of the Education Act, 1872, a ol board could delegate any of its powers except that of raising money. then we have the Act of 1882, which in its 3d section, subsection 2, pro-es that,—"No resolution of a school board for the dismissal of a certificated her shall be valid unless agreed to by a majority of the full number of mem-of such school board." It would rather appear from these words that a lution by a majority of the whole school board is necessary to the dismissal teacher, and it seems to follow that the power of dismissal cannot be dele-d by the school board to managers. But this further matter occurs. The ication Department for Scotland, finding it necessary to come to the assistance chool boards in certain cases where difficulties had arisen as to school pro-on, made certain arrangements to help the boards upon certain conditions. se conditions are set forth in a minute of Committee of Council on Education Scotland dated 21st December 1888. One of these conditions is expressed these terms:—"The school board shall in pursuance of section 22 of the ication (Scotland) Act, 1872, commit the management of each school under ir charge to three managers, of whom one shall be Her Majesty's inspector

* The Public School (Scotland) Teachers Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 18), vides, section 3, subsection (2), that "no resolution of a school board for the nissal of a certificated teacher shall be valid unless agreed to by a majority of full number of members of such school board."

† By the 22d section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. 62), power was given to school boards to delegate any of their powers to nagers of schools appointed by them, except the power of raising money.

[1] Queen v. Justices of Hertfordshire, 1845, 6 Ad. and Ell. (Queen's Bench) 753.

No. 131. Mar. 10, 1891. School Board of Barvas v. Macgregor.

in charge of the district." Then there follows a resolution to the effect that the managers shall have the full power of appointing and dismissing the teachers of schools under their management, and of deciding on various other matters.

Now, it appears by the minutes of the School Board of Barvas that they agreed to accept the assistance of the Education Department on the terms set forth in the minute of the department to which I have referred, and to appoint three managers upon the conditions mentioned, and they accordingly appointed the chairman of the board, Mr William Maclennan, and Mr Helm, another member of the board, together with Mr Robertson, Her Majesty's inspector, to be managers of the Lionel School, and it is this that raises the present question: for while the School Board have accepted the grant upon the conditions stipulated by the Education Committee, one of these conditions is that the managers shall have full power of dismissal, while it is said that under the 3d section of the Act of 1882, the School Board are debarred from delegating their powers in this matter. This raises a somewhat novel question.

Mr Wilson has contended that the dismissal was bad because the power was vested in the managers. It is said by the Sheriff that such a delegation was ultra vires, and I am disposed to think that it was. What is the alternative? That the power of dismissal remained where it was, viz., in the School Board.

The defender appears to me to be on the horns of a dilemma. If the delegation to the managers of the power to dismiss teachers was ultra vires of the Board, the power remained in the School Board, and was well exercised by them: if, on the other hand, the delegation to the managers was valid, then the defender was validly dismissed by them, as they were entitled to act by a majority as much as any other body. It was argued, however, on the authority of the well-known case of the Queen v. The Justices of Hertfordshire, 6 Ad. and E. 753, that whichever body had the power of dismissal, its decision was invalidated by reason of the presence of persons who did not belong to it, for, as there, Mr Robertson, though a manager, was not a member of the school board, and only two members of the board were managers. But I think that that case was quite different in its circumstances from the present, and in no way rules it. On the whole matter I think the dismissal of the defender was valid, and that we should adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff.

Lord M'Laren.—The question here is whether the employment of the defender as schoolmaster of the Lionel Public School in the parish of Barvas was terminated in respect of his lawful dismissal from office, because of course if it was, the School Board is entitled to evict him from the dwelling-house attached to the school. That question of dismissal depends on the further question what body in Barvas is entitled to dismiss the schoolmaster of the Lionel School. Is it the School Board or is it the managers of the school, one of whom is not a member of the School Board, but is one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools? That question appears to depend on the construction of clauses in two Acts of Parliament. The earlier of these Acts—the Act of 1872—permits school boards to delegate all their powers except that of raising money, but by the Act of 1882 a restriction was placed on this power of delegation, and it was provided that no teacher should be dismissed except on a certain premonition and by an absolute majority of the whole school board. I have been unable to see why the Act of 1882 should not be held to apply to the parish of Barvas, but apparently the question was regarded as one of difficulty, for the argument before the Sheriff seems to have turned upon the question whether the delegation of the power of dismissal to the managers was legal. The Sheriff held that it was not legal, and I agree with him. I certainly think that, since the passing of the Act of 1882, no authority except that of an absolute majority of the school board can bring about the dismissal of a teacher.

In the argument which we had here, the defender appeared to admit that his dismissal was the act of the School Board and not of the managers, but he contended that that dismissal was illegal, because one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools was present at the meeting of the Board which passed the resolution to dismiss the defender, and concurred in the resolution in his capacity of manager. I confess I am unable to follow that argument, and I agree with Lord Adam that there is a clear distinction between such a case and cases like that of the Queen v. The Justices of Hertford. Justices of the Peace act judicially in all matters brought before them in their official capacity, and it is an invariable rule in the administration of justice that no outside advice or assistance shall be permitted. Justice of the Peace Courts, as much as tribunals of a higher order, are not entitled to take advice or assistance except from the parties themselves, or from procurators duly qualified and authorised to represent the parties. School boards are in quite a different position. They are not judicial, but are purely administrative bodies, and are entitled to take advice from any quarter they please. Indeed, I doubt whether the members of a school board would be rightly discharging their duties if they shut their ears to the advice and opinions of their constituents, or of other persons qualified to give assistance; and to say that the only persons from whom a school board may not take advice are the inspectors of schools is sufficient to shew the unsoundness of the proposition for which the defender contends.

I am therefore of opinion that on whichever ground the defender bases his case it is untenable, and I concur with your Lordship in holding that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. By the terms of the defender's appointment three months' notice was to be given by either party of the termination of the engagement; and therefore he was liable by the terms of his appointment to be dismissed, or to have his appointment brought to an end, at any time on three months' notice. But then he is entitled to the protection of the Act of 1882. That Act did not restrict the title of the School Board to terminate the defender's appointment according to its conditions, but did provide that they should not do so without due notice and deliberation, and that he could only be dismissed by the decision of an absolute majority of the board. He was therefore liable to dismissal on three months' notice by an absolute majority of the whole Board.

Now, a majority of the board have resolved upon his dismissal, and I think that that is sufficient for the decision of the case, for I am unable to see how any arrangement by the Scotch Education Department can deprive the defender of the protection of the Act of 1882, unless he consented to it. It was put in argument as if a new contract had been made by which the defender agreed to accept dismissal at the hands of the managers. There is no evidence of that, and it is impossible to accept that view, because there is no evidence that the defender knew of the arrangement between the Scotch Education Department and the School Board. I am quite unable to see any indication that the conditions of the defender's appointment were altered by that arrangement, and am therefore of opinion that the Board were not in a position to dismiss the defender save by the vote of a majority of the whole Board.

No. 131. Mar. 10, 1891. School Board of Barvas v. Macgregor.

But although I have thought it right to express my opinion upon that point, I think it is of very little importance to the defender, because it is not disputed that he was dismissed by a majority of the full Board, and that the procedure required by the Act was duly followed out.

I agree with both your Lordships that the case of the Justices of Hertfordshire has no bearing on this question, and I think that a school board would be very far from conforming with the directions of the statute, if, when there was a question of dismissing the teacher of a school, they failed to consult those of their body who happened to be managers of the school, and also Her Majesty's Inspector, if they were able to get his advice.

I think, therefore, the defender's dismissal is quite competent.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

STUART & STUART, W.S.—JOHN ELDER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 132. Mar. 11, 1891. Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

THOMAS CLAVERING, SON, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Johnston—Dickson.

GOODWINS, JARDINE, & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Murray—Ure.

Company—Shares—Certificates fraudulently issued by secretary of the company—Right of bona fide holder for value—Damages for failure to place on register.—A person advanced money to B on the security of share certificates bearing that B had a certain number of fully paid £10 shares in a limited company. The certificates bore the common seal of the company, and the signatures of two directors and of the secretary.

In an action by the lender against the company for damages arising from their refusing to register the shares in terms of the certificates, the company pleaded that B had only paid £1 per share, that the certificates had been issued by the secretary without the authority of the company, that he had fraudulently allowed them to remain in B's hands, and that B was a party to the fraud.

Held that the objection could not be sustained, as the pursuer was entitled to rely upon the validity of the certificates.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. M.

ON 17th September 1890 Thomas Clavering, Son, & Company, merchants and bankers, Glasgow, and Thomas Clavering, individual partner of the firm, raised this action against Goodwins, Jardine, & Company, Limited, iron and steel manufacturers, incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1886, having their registered office at 79½ Gracechurch Street, London.

The conclusion of the summons (as restricted) was for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £7000 as damages in respect of the defenders' failure to place the pursuer Thomas Clavering on their register, as transferee of 640 seven per cent fully paid preference shares of £10 each, in terms of their certificate.

The circumstances which gave rise to the action were as follows:—

In September 1889 William Jardine, one of the managing directors of the defenders' company, who held certain debentures and shares in the company, including 140 fully paid-up £10 shares, and 500 £10 shares

No. 132.

Mar. 11, 1891. Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

on which only £1 a share had been paid up, wrote to Mr Francis Stobbs, secretary of the company, asking him to send him certificates applicable to those debentures and shares. It appeared that the whole £10 per re payable on the unpaid-up shares had become due in June, and the ectors and secretary had, in view of the shareholders paying their calls taking up their scrip, sealed and signed the share certificates by anpation, leaving them in a book attached to counterfoils, from which y fell to be separated as payment was made by the several shareholders. e clerk, omitting to notice that Mr Jardine's 500 shares were not fully d up, sent him the certificates applicable to these shares along with the enture certificates and the certificates of the fully paid-up shares. The ificate as regarded the 500 shares, which was dated 29th June 1889, ified that "William Jardine . . . was proprietor of 500 preence shares of £10 each, fully paid up . . . in Goodwins, Jare, & Company," and it was sealed and signed by two directors and the etary.

n 5th September 1889, Jardine wrote to Stobbs as follows:—"My r Sir,—In sending me debenture certificates, you have enclosed certie for 500 preference shares, on which I have as yet only paid £500. t is not asking too much, I would like to retain the certificate for a e, as I think I might with it and my other certificates raise £4500, let you have same by end of month. This would give you plenty of ls for dividend," &c.

t the same time Jardine sent Stobbs two cheques post-dated 30th tember 1889, for the sum of £4500 in payment of the amount due to e these shares fully paid up, but instructed Stobbs that the cheques e not to be used until permission was given him to use them. Stobbs ined the cheques in his private drawer, and, without consulting his ctors, he allowed Jardine to keep the certificates. The cheques were equently dishonoured.

n 13th September Jardine obtained a cash advance of £4500 from srs Clavering, Son, & Company, and in security he executed and dered to them a transfer of the 640 shares in favour of Thomas Clavering, he also delivered to them the certificates which he held for these es, under an agreement that if the advance was not repaid within a th they were to be at liberty to sell the shares.

pon 24th October 1889, the loan not having been repaid within the ulated time, Thomas Clavering wrote the following letter to Stobbs:—erewith I enclose you transfer by Wm. Jardine in my favour for six dred and forty (640) 7 per cent pref. shares of £10 each fully paid in r company, and certificates for same as per note at foot. Have the dness to mark receipt of same as having been lodged with you on the gin of the transfer, and return same to me in course of post."

n 25th October Stobbs returned the transfer with the following docquet ched to it,—"Certificates of 640 shares at office, 79½ Gracechurch et, London, E.C. . . . F. Stobbs, Secy. 25/10/89."

n 2d November Clavering wrote to Stobbs,—"Please take note that aim the dividend on the 640 shares in your company sent you 24th tobbs replied on 5th November,—"Referring to your esteemed favour he 2d inst., I note that you claim the dividend on 640 shares, as per nsfer certified by me on the 25th ult."

n 20th November Clavering again wrote for payment of the divid, and he enclosed the certified transfer of the 640 shares, requesting they should be registered, and certificates therefor be sent in due rse.

No. 132.
Mar. 11, 1891.
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

No satisfactory reply to this letter was received, but Stobbs wrote on 17th December to say that he was under the impression that Jardine had arranged with Clavering that the shares were not to be registered out of his (Jardine's) name, "and that only the transfers were to be lodged here, as a notice that they were to be so dealt with."

On 6th February Clavering wrote to Stobbs,—"Referring to your letter of the 17th December, please hand me in course certificate for the 640 shares your hold for me."

Stobbs continued to make excuses throughout March and April for not sending the certificate in answer to Clavering's letters, till on 27th May the defenders' law-agents wrote the following letter to Clavering:—"By instructions of the board of directors which met yesterday, we beg to inform you that the company decline to recognise the alleged transfer by Mr William Jardine in your favour, dated 13th September 1889, of 640 preference shares of £10 each, therein described as fully paid, in respect that only 140 of the shares therein mentioned were fully paid, and upon the remaining 500 only £1 per share had been paid; as also that the secretary had no power to give, and Jardine had no right to get, delivery of fully paid certificates where full payment had not been made; that the delivery was illegal and contrary to orders; that the company cannot recognise certificates unlawfully obtained, nor can they recognise the marking on the transfer indicating lodgment of the certificates. We are to add that the board were entirely ignorant of these proceedings until a few days ago."

The pursuers averred that, at the date when they acquired the shares, they were of the full value appearing on the face of the certificates, viz., £6400. Two dividends payable at 11th November 1889 and 1st July 1890 had since been declared, amounting together to the sum of £448. The estates of William Jardine were sequestrated on 9th April 1890, and he was then owing the pursuers the sum of over £9000 (including the sum of £4500), and they were entitled to hold the shares and produce thereof when sold against the whole of the debt. (Cond. 10) "Owing to the refusal of the defenders to register the said transfer, and to issue new certificates, as they were bound to do, the pursuers were prevented from selling the said shares as they were entitled to do, and would have done if they had had the certificates. The shares have now greatly depreciated in value, and the pursuers have, through the defenders' illegal and unwarrantable refusal to register the transfer of said shares in favour of Mr Clavering, and to issue certificates therefor, sustained loss and damage to the extent of £7000. The pursuers, in the event of share certificates being now delivered to them, are willing (under reservation of their whole pleas if immediate delivery is not made) to deduct the value of the said shares at the time of such delivery from the sum to be recovered under the present action."

The defenders averred that Stobbs acted fraudulently and outwith the scope of his duty in permitting Jardine to keep the certificates which he had obtained by mistake and inadvertence. Stobbs had been dismissed for his fraudulent conduct, and Jardine being bankrupt had been interdicted from acting as managing director of the company. Until the end of May 1890, the defenders had no knowledge whatever of the transactions in question. They were willing to deliver to the pursuers the certificates for the 140 shares which were fully paid up.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having made the advances referred to on the faith of the said share certificates issued by the defenders to the said William Jardine for the shares referred to in the summons, and of the transfer of said shares granted by him in favour of the

No. 132.

Mar. 11, 1891.
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

l Thomas Clavering, they are entitled to decree in terms of the first clusion of the summons. (2) The defenders having illegally and unrantably refused to register the said transfer and issue share certificates the shares so transferred to Mr Clavering for the pursuers' behoof, y are liable to the pursuers in damages.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The said 500 shares being paid up only he extent of £1 on each, the pursuers are not entitled to claim delivery he certificate thereof as of fully paid-up shares, or to be entered in the ister of shareholders of the defenders' company as holders of the same. The actings of the said F. Stobbs having been fraudulent and outwith scope of his duty as the defenders' secretary, the defenders are not in way bound thereby.

At a proof the above facts were established. As regarded the value of shares, Clavering deponed that, at the date of his purchase from Jare (September 1889), he considered the shares to be worth from £9 to each, and that he could have sold them judiciously and by degrees extinction of the debt. He further deponed that the shares depreed in value in April 1890, after Jardine's bankruptcy, being worth in nt of fact at that date about £3 each. In December 1890, they were ted at 24s. or 25s. on the Stock Exchange.

The defenders led evidence to shew that in September 1890 the price he shares ranged from £5 to £6, 10s.

On 20th December 1890, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) decerned inst the defenders for the sum of £4000, with interest at the rate of 5 cent from 6th February 1890 until payment, the pursuers being bound exchange for said payment to transfer to the defenders, or their inee or nominees, the 500 £1 paid shares, and the 140 fully paid res mentioned on record.*

"OPINION.—The pursuer of this action lent to Mr W. Jardine in Septber 1889 a sum of £4500, on the security, as he believed, of, inter alia, 500 paid £10 preference shares in the defenders' company. He subsequently overed that these shares were not fully paid, being in fact paid up only to extent of £1 per share. But, having had handed to him at the time of the a certificate under the company's seal, and signed in terms of its articles, ing that the shares stood registered as fully paid shares in the borrower's e, he brings the present action against the company, seeking damages for company's failure (or inability) to place him on the register as transferee of fully paid shares, in terms of the certificate. The leading conclusion of the mons is for registration in his name of the shares as fully paid. But it was ceded at the debate that this would be ultra vires of the company, and rdingly the demand is, as I have said, restricted to a demand for damages, measure of the damage being said to be the market value of the company's paid shares at the date when the company were called on to register the sfer in the pursuer's favour.

A proof has been led, from which it appears that the history of the certifi and the manner in which it found its way into Mr Jardine's hands was as ows:—Mr Jardine was one of the managing directors of the defenders' comy, and he and his relatives held a number of debentures and fully paid es in the company, distinct altogether from the shares in question. In Septber 1889 he wrote asking the secretary of the company to send him certifis applicable to those debentures and shares, and, by what appears to have n the mistake of a clerk, there was at the same time sent him a certificate for 500 shares now in question, for which certificate he did not ask, and which ht not to have been sent him until he had paid up the £9 per share still due those shares. The mistake arose, or rather became possible, in this way. whole £10 per share payable on the company's preference shares was, it ears, due, and had been so, since the month of June 1889, and in June

No. 132.
Mar. 11, 1891.
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Stobbs had, from first to last, acted solely in the interests of Jardine. He had not only acted 1889, in anticipation of Mr Jardine and the other shareholders paying their calls and taking up their scrip, the directors and secretary had (following, they say, a usual practice) sealed and signed the share certificates by anticipation, leaving them in a book, attached to counterfoils, from which they fell to be separated as payment was made by the several shareholders. The clerk who was directed to send the share and debenture certificates for which Mr Jardine asked, omitted to notice that the 500 shares in question were in a different position, and accordingly Mr Jardine was, by the carelessness of the company, or one of its officers, put in possession, not only of the certificates to which he was entitled, but also of the certificate in question, applying to these 500 shares, which certificate should not of course have been issued to him until he had paid the full amount of his calls.

"Had matters stopped here—that is to say, had Mr Jardine gone straightway to the pursuer, and making a fraudulent use of the certificate which he had thus got, obtained the loan which has given rise to the action, the question between the pursuer and the company might not have been clear, but it would have been considerably simplified. It happened, however, that the affair took a further turn. Mr Jardine at once discovered the mistake, but, instead of at once returning the certificate, he wrote the following letter to Mr Stobbs, the secretary:—(His Lordship here quoted the letter of 5th September 1889, supra). The secretary unfortunately had not the moral courage to deal with this proposal as he ought. He looked to Mr Jardine as his superior, and did not, as was his clear duty, communicate with the other directors or insist personally on the immediate return of the certificate. On the contrary, he allowed Mr Jardine to retain the certificate, having apparently had his scruples satisfied in a very inadequate manner by the receipt from Mr Jardine of a cheque for the amount of his calls, which cheque, however, he was requested not to cash until Mr Jardine gave him leave. The result was that Mr Jardine was allowed to keep the certificate, that the cheque remained in the secretary's private drawer till Mr Jardine became bankrupt in the following April, and that in the meantime Mr Jardine made the use of the certificate which has given rise to the present action.

"In these circumstances, the question to be decided is—What are the pursuer's rights as against the company, having in view the terms of the certificate, but having also in view that those terms are inconsistent with the share register, and that the certificate left the hands of the company in the manner which I have just described?

"It will be, in the first place, convenient to see what are the relative rights which arise upon the issue in regular course of a certificate of shares or stock in a limited company.

"Such certificate, it will be observed, is a statutory document—that is to say, it is recognised by the Companies Acts. By section 31 of the Act of 1862 it is provided, 'A certificate under the common seal of the company specifying any share or shares or stock held by any member of a company shall be prima facie evidence of the title of the member to the share or shares or stock therein specified.'

"And by the articles of association of this (the defender's) company, section 11, it is provided, 'Every member shall be entitled to receive, gratis, a certificate under the common seal of the company, specifying the share or shares held by him, and the amount paid up thereon.'

"The certificate here, therefore, is a certificate by the company, and is a document by which the company is bound as by any other document issued in the course of its business. And, looking to the terms of the document, there seems no difficulty in carrying its operation and effect at least this length, that it implied, if it did not express, a contract as between the company and the person to whom the certificate was issued that the company should recognise the latter as a shareholder to the extent set forth in the certificate, or otherwise, should

No. 132.

Mar. 11, 1891.

Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

dulently, but entirely outwith the scope of his employment.[1] He had ctically issued the company's shares at a discount, a transaction which e good to him the pecuniary value of that position. In short, as between company and the recipient of the certificate in regular course, it seems not btful that the company impliedly warrants the facts set forth in the certifi- On the other hand, of course, the recipient is open to all exceptions ng from his own conduct or his own knowledge. If, for example, as has pened—(see Simm and Others v. The Anglo-American Telegraph Company, R., 5 Q. B. Div. 188), the transfer in his (the recipient's) favour, on the of which he has been registered and obtained his certificate, turns out, ough unknown to him to be a forgery, or if he has obtained the issue of the ficate by fraud, or if he is in any way open to any other personal exception, all such cases the company is free, and has a good answer to any action at instance of the recipient of the certificate. All this is probably clear gh.

But quid juris when the question arises, not with the recipient of the ficate, but as here, with a second transferree—a third party—to whom the ficate has not been issued, who has had no communication with the com-, but to whom the certificate has been handed or exhibited, and who in nce thereon and the relative transfer—and in good faith—has made an nce of money—is he, when he lodges his transfer and demands registration rding to the certificate, to be held open to all the exceptions pleadable st his transferrer? Is he, in other words, to be treated as an ordinary nee having no higher rights than his cedent? or is he, on the other hand, e position of having an independent claim against the company, founded e certificate as a document addressed to all the world and warranting to body concerned that the shares mentioned exist and are held as mentioned e certificate?

On principle, and if the question were open, I acknowledge that there s much to be said against putting a certificate of shares in the position ically of a negotiable instrument. The statute only declares that it shall ima facie evidence, and it may be doubted whether a proposed transferree t to be in safety to rely on such prima facie evidence, and ought not to be red for his safety to take the precaution of consulting the company's register. t appears, however, to be settled by a long course of decisions in England, s I see no reason to doubt, on sound views of commercial expediency, that tificate of shares, once regularly issued, is a document binding the company ke good its representation to any bona fide transferree for value into whose s it (the certificate) comes. The way it is expressed is that the company is pped' in a question with such transferree from disputing the truth of the ficate, and the translation of that seems to be that the company is held to nt the truth of the statements which the certificate makes, and so to be ex contractu, in specific performance, if that is possible, or in pecuniary ation if that is impossible. The cases referred to are noted below. They be found collected in Lindley, I., 145, and Buckley's Notes, to section the Companies Act. Shaw v. The Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Limited, 13 Q. B. Div. 103; Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., L. R., B. 584; British Mutual Banking Co., Limited, v. Charnwood Forest Rail-Co., L. R., 18 Q. B. D. 714; Bishop v. The Balkis Consolidated Co., L. R., . B. D. 513; Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 3 App. Cas. 1004.

What, therefore, the pursuer here got, or was entitled to believe he had got, an obligation of this company, duly sealed and signed, and giving him the to sue the company ex contractu on an implied warranty, or, as it is put ngland, on the principle of estoppel. The question which remains, and on

[1] Lindley on Company Law, 5th edn., pp. 208 to 210; The British Mutual king Co., Limited, v. The Charnwood Forest Railway Co., 1887, L. R., 18 . Div. 714; Limpus v. The London General Omnibus Co., Limited, 1862, . J. Exch. 34.

No. 132. Mar. 11, 1891. Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

it was ultra vires of the company to have authorised.[1] The defenders were not then to be held responsible for their secretary's unlawful actings, which the case really turns, is whether the fact that the certificate was irregularly or fraudulently issued by the officials of the company can affect the legal operativeness of the document, as an obligation of the company, duly signed and sealed and put in circulation by the negligence or fraud of the company's officials.

"I confess I am unable to see how the pursuers can be affected by these considerations. If the document found its way into what I may call circulation by the negligence of the company's officials, that of itself seems to afford a fairly sufficient ground of liability. And if, on the other hand, what happened amounted to fraud on the part of the officials, it was, it seems to me, fraud committed, not against the pursuer, but against the company. A negotiable instrument or document of title—say to goods—duly executed by a company, would not, I apprehend, be the less binding on the company—I mean in the hands of a bona fide holder for value—because it had been issued by the company's officials in violation of their duty, or for a fraudulent purpose of their own. And although of course a certificate of shares is not properly a negotiable instrument, nor in a proper sense a document of title, it is yet, as we have seen, substantially in the same position, so far as regards what in this question is the essential matter—viz., the company's inability to plead against a bona fide transferee for value that he has no better title than his transferrer.

"It is not necessary to consider what would have been the result if the certificate had been forged. The case of Shaw v. Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Company, Limited, 13 Q. B. D. 103, one of the cases I have already referred to, goes the length of holding that even in that case the company would be liable—at least if the document was issued by the proper officer of the company, although fraudulently and for his own purposes. But I confess I somewhat hesitate to accept that decision as ruling the case of forgery, which involves some very special considerations. Neither do I think it necessary to consider what would have been the result if the certificate here had been stolen from the company's repositories. It may be that in that case the company would only be liable on the ground of negligence. But there also—I mean in the case of theft—different considerations come in. In the present case the certificate was not only genuine but it was transmitted to Jardine along with a letter from the proper officer of the company, and although it is not proved that that letter was exhibited to the pursuer, it yet existed, and the pursuer would have been none the wiser if he had called for it.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer here is entitled to the remedy which he asks. But I desire to add that I do not place my judgment on the ground urged in argument, that the pursuer has his redress against the company as having been defrauded by the company acting through its authorised agents. If that had been the ground of action, I should, I confess, have had great difficulty—I should indeed have been disposed to hold the defenders' answer a good one, viz., that the fraud, if committed, having been committed by the company's agents for their own purposes, and in their own interests, the company was not responsible except in so far as it took benefit. But here, if I am right, the pursuer was not defrauded at all, at least as regards his pecuniary interests. He got, if I am right, a valid document effectually binding the company, and the fraud was not therefore a fraud committed upon him, but a fraud committed against the company.

"On the question of damages there is a good deal of difficulty. But upon the proof I am disposed to come to the conclusion (1) that the pursuer did not seriously press for registration of his transfer so as to put the company in default until the month of February 1890; and (2) that while the evidence is somewhat imperfect, the value of the paid-up shares at that time was not more

[1] Klenck v. East India Co. for Exploration and Mining, Limited, Dec. 21, 1888, 16 R. 271.

No. 132.

Mar. 11, 1891.

Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

that all the more because they had reaped no benefit in the matter.[1] decision in the case of Shaw v. The Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining pany, Limited,[2] relied upon by the pursuers, was accepted with hesi- n by the Lord Ordinary, and was, it was contended, unsound. In it company was held to be "estopped" from disputing a purchaser's to shares in the company, forged certificates of which had been d to him by the company's secretary. The case of In re Bahia and Francisco Railway Company[3] was not in point. In it a company held to be "estopped" from disputing the truth of a certificate which come into the hands of a bona fide transferree for value, the Court ing that the company had issued shares which it was bound to know t find their way into the hands of a third party. In the present no certificates were issued to Clavering, who got no proper transfer ever. (2) Assuming damages to be due, the Lord Ordinary's prin- of assessment was erroneous. The measure of such damages was to certained, not by the market value of the shares at the time of the action, but by the light of subsequent events, including the effect of ine's bankruptcy.[4] There was no evidence that Clavering meant to his shares in February, the date at which the Lord Ordinary had con- ed the value of the shares as affecting the damages. Indeed, if he sold them, he would have swamped the market and brought down value. In December following they were proved to have been prac- ly valueless.

rgued for the pursuers;—(1) Clavering was a bona fide transferree alue of the company's certificate regularly sealed and signed by the tors and secretary. The company were "estopped" or barred in a tion with him from disputing the truth of that certificate.[5] How-

---

£6 per share. It has to be noticed that Jardine's difficulties had by that become public, and according to the pursuer himself his sequestration in following brought the shares down to about £3. Altogether, I think I he pursuer full justice by fixing his damage on this head at £3000, with est from 6th February 1890.

There is another parcel of shares,—140 in number,—which were part of ecurity for the loan, and as to which the question is entirely separate. e shares were in fact fully paid up, and the pursuer's only complaint as to is that the company delayed to register the transfer until the shares had ly depreciated in value. I think that, for the reasons already stated, the any here were not in default until the month of February, and that the ge suffered is the difference between the then value of the shares and the e at the date of the defences when the company offered to register. That ence I do not think I have the means of estimating, because the company nd that their shares have still a substantial value, but I think I shall do ce by giving the pursuer decree for £6 per share, the assumed value in uary, he being bound to transfer the shares to the company or its nominee condition of receiving that payment. The 500 shares I shall also require e transferred, if the defenders desire it. But they (not being paid up) are, ould suppose, of no value, and were of no value at any time during the roversy.

On the whole, the pursuer will have decree for £4000, with interest from February 1890."

Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie, May 20, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 80, per l Chanc. (Chelmsford), p. 85, per Lord Cranworth, p. 90, 39 Scot. Jur. 437.

Shaw v. The Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Co., Limited, 1884, L. R., Q. B. Div. 103.

In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. 1868, L. R., 3 Q. B. 584.

Peek v. Derry, 1887, L. R., 37 Ch. Div. 541.

Buckley on the Companies Acts (6th edn.), p. 93, notes on sec. 31 of the Act

No. 132.
Mar. 11, 1891.
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

ever fraudulently Stobbs acted in issuing the certificate to J truly within the scope of his employment, his actings b ultimately to benefit the company.[1] In Mackay's case, Smith, in delivering the judgment of the Court, pointed out of Addie,[2] relied on by the defenders, did not at all confl wick v. English Joint Stock Bank,[1] for it was decided which did not arise in Barwick's case. He further state dicta of Lords Chelmsford and Cranworth in Addie, to the action of deceit was not maintainable against a corporatio the frauds of its agents, were dicta relating to English fo and not necessary to the decision of the case. There was n Lord Justice Lindley's book[3] that the case of Shaw v. The P Colonial Gold Mining Company, Limited,[4] was unsound. Bishop and Others v. The Balkis Consolidated Company, Lim tinguishable from the present case. In it the plaintiff had of shares in a company which had been transferred to hi upon the faith of a "certification" by the company's secre Court held that he could not recover in respect the word " did not import a warranty of the transferrer's title, but mere tation by the company that the document had been lodg secretary apparently in order, and that the transferrer was e shares. In the present case there was the issue of "cert As regarded the damages, if the amount fixed by the Lord altered, it ought to be increased. The measure of damag ascertained by seeing what the pursuers could have obt shares if they had been put in a position to sell in Novemb beginning of 1890, as they ought to have been. Even in Se and after Jardine's bankruptcy, the price of the shares wa £6, 10s.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The pursuer in this case asks for dam that a transfer which he received of certain shares in the defen which were certified to him by the secretary of the company on 2 1889 was not registered by the company, and which shares he h to get rid of in the market.

The circumstances are very peculiar. It appears that Mr Ja one of the managing directors of the company, had induced the s company—a Mr Stobbs—who had sent him the shares in questi as if Mr Jardine had paid for them, while in point of fact he h small part of the price of them, to allow him to retain those sh from Mr Jardine a cheque for the amount to be paid upon them, of 1862; In re British Farmers Pure Linseed Cake Co., 1878, L. 533; Weir v. Bell, 1878, L. R., 3 Exch. Div. 238, per Baron Bra Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 1878, L. R., 3 App. Cases, 1004; and I San Francisco Railway Co., vide supra, note 3.

---

[1] Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, 1867, L. R., 2 Exch. v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick, 1874, L. R., 5 Privy 394.

[2] Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie, supra, note 1, p. 659.

[3] Lindley on Company Law, p. 484.

[4] Shaw v. The Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Co., note 2, p. 659.

[5] Bishop and Others v. The Balkis Consolidated Co., Limited, Div. 512.

nding that he was not to use the cheque till Mr Jardine allowed him to do Mr Jardine thereupon proceeded to transfer the shares with a view to sing money, and he did succeed in raising money from Mr Clavering upon se shares.

Now, in that state of circumstances, Mr Clavering maintains that he is en- ed to damages in respect of the position in which he has been placed with ard to those shares, and the Lord Ordinary has found that he is.

The defence maintained upon the part of the company is that the secretary s not acting within his duty as their servant in doing what he did, and that what was done was a fraud, they are not liable for his fraud. I cannot ept that. Their servant the secretary was authorised by them to conduct ir business, and it was his duty to issue such certificates as were issued in s case, and he did issue the certificate, which is duly signed by two directors, eing a certificate for these shares, and on the transfer being intimated by Clavering to the company, he, as the officer of the company, wrote upon margin the words which have been quoted in the course of the debate. w, in doing these things, I hold that he was acting as the representative of company whose duty it was to do such acts, and that the company must esponsible for the acts so done. I concur with the Lord Ordinary upon that tter.

The only remaining question is as to the damages sustained by the pursuer he result of those acts, and certainly the defenders have something to say on question of the amount of damages. The Lord Ordinary takes as the time which he must consider the question of damages, the month of February 0. The transaction took place in 1889, and the Lord Ordinary, fixing the od at February 1890, comes to the conclusion that the sum of damages that ht to be given is £4000. If that was the exact time at which the computa- of damages was to be made, I am not sure that I would agree with the d Ordinary in the amount; but the opinion I have formed after hearing the is that Mr Clavering is entitled to claim damages at an earlier period than t—in point of fact, the time from which he is entitled to claim damages is time at which he made his demand, in November 1889.

Now, it is perfectly true, as is maintained by the defenders, that a large nber of shares like these, if suddenly thrown on the market, would tend to ng the market down, and probably they would not realise anything like the which the pursuer represents; but it is also equally clear that if the pursuer had his shares placed on the register in 1889, he would have been able, hout doing anything so sudden as to throw the whole of them into the rket at once, to make a good realisation of them; and accordingly, that being I am inclined to hold that the sum of damages which the Lord Ordinary has wed in this case is not excessive, but is a reasonable sum in the circum- nces.

I understand that the defenders are quite willing to transfer the 140 shares ich are fully paid up to the pursuer, and to that the pursuer cannot have any ection, because the shares being fully paid up no liability can be incurred der them. But that is a matter really of no practical consequence in the case, hough it will be necessary slightly to alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. e general result, however, at which we have arrived is practically the same that at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, viz., that the sum of damages ould be as in his Lordship's interlocutor.

No. 132.

Mar. 11, 1891.
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion.

I have not much hesitation in rejecting the argument which was addressed to us by the reclaimers here, to the effect that the company are not responsible for the consequences of the misconduct of their directors and secretary, or any two of their directors and secretary, or of their secretary alone.

It was, so far as we can judge, quite an intelligible and proper transaction between the pursuer here and Mr Jardine, whereby Mr Jardine got an advance of £4500 from the pursuer upon the security of a certain number of paid-up shares in this company, of which Mr Jardine was a director. It may have been a rash loan on the part of the lender, but it is a commonplace business transaction of loan of money on the security of a transfer of fully paid-up shares in the company. He got a transfer of 140 really fully paid-up shares, and he also got a transfer of 500 shares from Mr Jardine which were not fully paid up, but in regard to which Mr Jardine had a certificate that they were fully paid up, under the hands of two directors and the secretary of the company.

I do not need to explain in detail the circumstances under which Mr Jardine got that certificate with respect to the 500 shares. In point of fact, he got it from those who were the proper officers of the company to grant and issue such a certificate. It was signed by two directors and by the secretary, and issued by the secretary, the proper officer of this mercantile company to perform that duty. If they had been fully paid-up shares, and the company when required had registered the pursuer as the transferree, then there would, of course, have been no ground of complaint on the part of the pursuer at all.

But after the lapse of a month from the date of the loan, the borrower having a month to pay it,—according to the contract of loan it was to be paid in a month,—when it was not paid at the end of the month, he sent the transference of the 500 shares and the 140 shares—640 shares in all—to the secretary of the company to be registered in his name, and if everything had been properly done by the officers of the company, he would have been entitled to be registered in respect of those 640 shares. There was an application at an earlier date, on 24th October, but I do not refer to it. On the 20th November, however, he sent the transfers of those certified fully paid-up shares, 500, and the really paid-up shares, 140, to the secretary of the company, and desired that they should be registered. That was not done, and the company say they could not do it because the 500 shares were not fully paid up. I do not quite follow their reason for not doing it with respect to the 140 shares, but they declined to do it with regard to these either. The matter was put off and put off by the secretary who had been a party to this very gross fraud which had been committed: was put off and put off by him until the month of May following, when the pursuer was informed that the directors declined to recognise the transfer in his favour at all, and declined to put it upon the register.

Now, I agree with your Lordship that they were bound to put the transfer upon the register with respect to both sets of shares in November 1889; I think that was their obligation, and that they cannot be permitted to allege that the 500 shares were not fully paid up, in the face of the certificate of their own directors and secretary that they were fully paid up. I think they were estopped or barred, or whatever term you choose to use, from pleading that they were not fully paid up. The pursuer proceeded, as he was entitled to do, in reliance upon a certificate under the hands of the proper officers of this mercantile company to the effect that they were fully paid up. I therefore regard, with your Lordship

No. 132.

Mar. 11, 1891.
Clavering, Son, & Co. v. Goodwins, Jardine, & Co.

the failure of the company to register when they were requested to do so in the month of November as a wrong committed by them upon the pursuer, and for that wrong he is entitled to compensation in damages. I do not think he is bound to ask that the shares should be registered now. He asked it in November 1889, and we are now in the month of March 1891. I think he is entitled to his remedy in the shape of damages to repair the injury to him by the wrong done him by the defenders.

It is not quite a simple and certain matter to estimate the amount of damage. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the wrong was committed in the month of February, and that the damage might properly be estimated at £4000. I think with your Lordship that that would have been too large a sum upon the evidence to give if the wrong had not been done till February, but I think it was done in November, and I do not think that that amount of damage is excessive, for the evidence rather impressed me with the conviction that if registration had taken place on the 20th of November the pursuer might have realised those shares which are now worthless.

The defenders might have them, at their own expense, if they want them, but were informed by their counsel that they do not want them, but would rather be without them. The pursuer is, in my opinion, agreeing with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, entitled to be recompensed with a sum of £4000 of damages, of course with the expenses of this process.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties in the reclaiming note for the defenders against Lord Kyllachy's interlocutor of 20th December 1890, recall the said interlocutor: Ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £4000, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent from the date of this decree until payment, the pursuers being bound, in exchange for said payment, to transfer to the defenders, or their nominee or nominees, the 500 shares on which £1 has been paid, and the 140 fully paid shares mentioned on record."

BURTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 133.

Mar. 11, 1891.*
Shedlock v. Hannay.

ALFRED SHEDLOCK AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—Dickson.

JAMES B. HANNAY, Defender (Respondent).—Murray—Ure.

Foreign—Jurisdiction—Contract—Lex loci actus.—On 16th November 1888 an agreement was entered into in New York between Duncan on behalf of Hannay, of Glasgow, the inventor of a new process for producing white lead, and Shedlock and Hudson, of New York, "for sale of said inventions for the Americas, and to designate to them power to handle said process" upon certain terms. The agreement was subsequently confirmed by Hannay at Glasgow subject to certain conditions which were accepted in writing by Shedlock and Hudson at New York.

The latter having brought an action of damages in Scotland against Hannay in respect that he had sold his rights in connection with the invention, and had

* Decided Jan. 30, 1891.

No. 133.
Mar. 11, 1891.
Shedlock v. Hannay.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.

thereby violated the agreement, held that as the agreement was made and executed in New York, its validity and meaning fell to be determined by the law of New York.

In 1888 Mr J. B. Hannay, residing at Cove Castle, Dumbartonshire, invented a new process of producing white lead.

On 16th November 1888 he entered into the following agreement:—"It is understood that J. Thomson Duncan has an understanding with J. B. Hannay, F.R.S.E., of Glasgow, the inventor of the apparatus and new method or process of producing white lead, whereby he is empowered to enter into arrangements, which he hereby does, with Alfred Shedlock and James A. Hudson, of New York, for sale of said inventions for the two Americas, and to designate to them power to handle said apparatus method, or process, in such manner as shall seem to them best, and that upon terms as already fixed by correspondence between the said Shedlock and Duncan, and approved of by the said Hannay, viz., That all necessary expenses shall be first deducted from any income that may be derived from sale or use of the patents, and the one-half of the remainder is to go to the said Hannay and the other half to be retained by the said Shedlock and Hudson; it being understood that the said Hannay is to be kept free of all responsibility as to outlays which may be made by the said Shedlock and Hudson, in the event of failure to carry through the business to a successful issue. Dated New York, 16th November 1888."

This document was attested by a notary-public, and bore the notarial seal only. It was signed by Duncan, Shedlock, and Hudson.

Hannay confirmed this agreement as follows:—"Glasgow, 1st Dec. 1888.—The above agreement is hereby confirmed by me, subject to the following conditions,—That, in the event of other patents being taken up in America, all improvements made by anyone connected with the undertaking shall be added for the general good of the process, free except for any expenses incurred. . . . ." Shedlock and Hudson accepted these modifications, and concluded the agreement as so modified by a writing attested at New York by a notary-public, and bearing only a notarial seal.

The agreement was thereafter registered in the United States Patent Office.

Shedlock and Hudson and their mandatary now brought an action of damages against Hannay for breach of the agreement, under which, they alleged, they had acquired the sole right to use the invention in question in the United States, and to dispose of it as they pleased.

They averred;—(Cond. 2) ". . . By the said agreement the pursuers acquired the sole right to use the said inventions in, inter alia, the United States of America, and to dispose of said right in said United States as they pleased. The statements in answer are denied, subject to the admission that the pursuers registered the agreement in the United States Patent Office and under reference to the proceedings there." (Cond. 3) "Subsequently in breach of said agreement, the defender, in or about the month of April 1889, sold to the White Lead Company, Limited, the whole patents and inventions belonging to him—or which he was entitled to acquire—for the said improved method of manufacturing white lead which he had then applied for in the United States of America and other countries, and all future improvements thereon, including the rights to said inventions which he had previously sold to the pursuers as aforesaid, and he has refused to carry out the foresaid agreement with the pursuers. The sale to the White Lead Company was made by the defender wilfully, in violation of said agreement with the pursuers. . . ." (Cond. 4) "In 18[illegible] the defender and the said White Lead Company applied in New York for

No. 133.
Mar. 11, 1891.
Shedlock v. Hannay.

and obtained in or about 1889 or 1890, letters-patent for the said invention although the defender was advised that this was in breach of his said agreement with the pursuers. The pursuers were thereby, as the defender knew and intended when he entered into the agreement with the White Lead Company, prevented from obtaining letters-patent in the said United States for the said invention, and from obtaining any benefit from their rights under the said agreement. The pursuers would have derived very large profits and advantages from their rights under the aforesaid agreement between them and the defender had the same been carried out; and in consequence of the defender's having, in violation of the said agreement, sold his right to said invention, apparatus, method, and process of producing white lead to the White Lead Company, Limited, the pursuers have sustained loss to the extent of £30,000."

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The defender having made and thereafter violated the agreement with the pursuers condescended on, they are entitled to decree for the amount of loss and damage sustained by them through the defender's violation of said agreement.

The defender pleaded;—2. The validity and meaning of said alleged agreement fall to be determined and interpreted according to the law of New York, by which (1) it is invalid and inoperative; and (2) it is, and has been determined by decree to be, unavailing to confer any rights on the pursuers.

In support of this plea, he stated;—"The said deed was framed and executed in New York, and the contract therein expressed was to be performed in New York. Explained that the validity and interpretation of the agreement therefore fall to be determined according to the law of the State of New York. No consideration is therein expressed; and by the law of the State of New York a consideration is necessary for the validity of an agreement not under seal; the said agreement is not under seal, and is therefore invalid. . . . The pursuers afterwards registered the document above mentioned in the American Patent Office, New York, and endeavoured to get the patents issued to them, on the plea that the said document conferred on them the ownership of the said patents, but they were entirely unsuccessful. According to American law the said document is inept to convey any right of ownership in the said patents or to entitle them to have letters-patent issued to them."

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 7th November 1890, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the agreement founded on was made and executed in New York; and (2) that the validity and meaning of said agreement fall to be determined by the law of New York: Therefore, to this extent and effect, sustains the second plea in law for the defender, and quoad ultra continues the cause: Grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—The only question with which I have at present to deal is that raised by the first part of the defender's second plea in law.

"The agreement in question which has reference to the obtaining and use of a certain patent in America was executed in New York on 16th November 1888, by the pursuers and a Mr J. Thomson Duncan, the latter being represented in gremio of the deed as a person empowered by the defender to enter into the arrangement there expressed. The agreement so executed is 'confirmed' by the defender, subject to certain conditions in a writing dated 'Glasgow, 1st December 1888,' appended to the agreement, and these conditions the pursuers agreed to and accepted by a note, also appended to the agreement, executed by them in New York. In this state of the facts I am of opinion that the agreement or contract in question was made and executed in New York, and that any question regarding its validity as a contract, its construction, or the extent and character of the rights and obligations arising therefrom, falls to be determined

No. 133.

Mar. 11, 1891.
Shedlock v. Hannay.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The action was one brought in the domicile of the defender for damages for a breach of contract. It was not the fact that the contract had been made and executed in New York. The only fact in favour of the respondent's view was that the agreement had been partly signed in New York. But this was of no importance, looking to the terms of the letter of 1st December, which was an essential and vital part of it. The patent was a Scottish one, and the agreement relating to it dealt with its sale not in the State of New York only, but in "the two Americas." (2) There were no technicalities in it, for although the agreement itself seemed to incorporate previous correspondence the confirmation which followed made it complete. The lex fori must apply unless there was some reason to the contrary in the contract,[1] but there was nothing in it which appealed to the law of any particular country, and the Court required no assistance from American law to construe its terms. Further, the Court must keep in view the fact that the contention of the defender was advanced with the view of bringing about the result that the agreement must be held null and void,—in opposition to the general rule that a contract must be interpreted ut valeat magis quam pereat. Besides, the locus solutionis here was not New York, it was the "two Americas." It was all over the Americas, and the contract was what might be termed a cosmopolitan one, so that no special law could be in view of the parties. The contract fell therefore to be interpreted in accordance with the rules which obtained at the place where the action was brought. The natural place for Hannay to perform the obligation laid upon him was in Scotland, and as he had refused to do so, the Courts of this country would compel him.

The respondent argued;—The Lord Ordinary had taken the right view, and the agreement fell to be construed by the law of the State of New York. New York was the locus contractus, for the agreement had really been executed there. The document of 1st December, although written from Glasgow, was nothing more than a letter by the defender confirming Duncan's authority to act for him. The law was correctly stated by Turner, L. J., in Shand's case,[2] when he said,—"The general rule is that by the law of New York.—(P. and O. Steam Navigation Company v. Shand, 3 Moore's P. C. 272; Jacobs, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 589.)

---

"The difficulty which has sometimes arisen in the determination of questions similar to that with which I am now dealing, from the fact that the place of making the contract was different from the place where it was to be performed, does not seem to arise here. In the present case the locus solutionis is, to some extent at least, the same as the locus contractus; and I think the whole circumstances, viz., the character of the contract, its subject-matter, its execution in New York, and its anticipated fulfilment there and elsewhere in America, lead to the inference that the parties intended the law of New York to be that according to which the contract should be interpreted, and, if necessary, enforced. There is certainly nothing to indicate that the parties had in view the law of Scotland as the law which was to determine their rights or liabilities."

[1] Owners of "Immanuel" v. Denholm & Co., Dec. 7, 1887, 15 R. 152; Valery v. Scott, July 4, 1876, 3 R. 965; Ainslie, &c., v. Murrays, March 17, 1881, 8 R. 636; Don v. Lippman, May 26, 1837, H. L. 2 Shaw & Maclean, 682; Stewart v. Gelot, July 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 1057, 43 Scot. Jur. 583; In re Missouri Steamship Co., 1889, L. R., 42 Chanc. Div. 321; Gillespie's Bar, 324; Story's Conflict of Laws, sec. 280; Bell's Law Dictionary, voce Law [the Law Merchant].

[2] The P. and O. Steam Navigation Co. v. Shand, 1865, 3 Moore's P. C. Reps. 272, at p. 290; Jacobs, Marcus, & Co. v. The Crédit Lyonnais, Feb. 1884, L. R., 12 Q. B. Div. 589; Lloyd v. Guibert, Nov. 1865, L. R., 1 Q. B. 115; Dale v. Dumbarton Glass Work Co., Feb. 5, 1829, 7 S. 369.

law of the country where a contract is made governs as to the nature he obligation, and the interpretation of it." It might be otherwise if a erent intention were to be gathered from its terms, e.g. where it was vided that it was to be entirely carried out elsewhere, as in the case of Missouri Steamship Company,[1] or where the subject-matter of it was table estate situated elsewhere. There was another rule which also lied here,—"The law of the place of performance determines the vali- of the contract in respect to performance."[2] This was a contract a sale "for the two Americas," and nothing at all remained to be done Scotland. It might be that there were many loci solutionis in America, that could not affect the present argument. The maxim actor sequitur m rei was applicable to questions of jurisdiction only, and did not ct this case.

t advising,—

ORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of two persons of the e of Shedlock and Hudson, who are citizens of New York, and it is founded an agreement, the terms of which are before us, which bears to be dated New York 16th November 1888. There is a supplementary writing of 1st ember of that year in which the defender in this country assents to what been done by his authorised attorney in New York, under certain conditions; that again is met by an acceptance on the part of the pursuers of the modi- on so introduced.

he agreement, therefore, as it appears to me, is undoubtedly an agreement ated in New York, and it is only necessary that we should look at it er to see what is its nature before disposing of the question raised. If greement is binding, according to its terms, there can be no doubt that has been a very grave breach of the obligation undertaken under it by defender, because,—the agreement being for the purpose of constituting a of joint adventure for carrying on a trade in a patent invention in "the two ricas" by the pursuers and defender,—the defender, after having come under bligations of that agreement, committed a breach of it in this way,—in the h of April 1889 he sold the invention to another company called the White Company, Limited. Therefore one can have very little sympathy with defender in so far as concerns the honesty of the transaction, but the ques- before us is entirely a question of law, whether the agreement is enforceable rding to its terms.

ow, there are many curious speculations among writers on international law how far the place of making an agreement regulates its construction. But is one consideration which presses upon my mind very strongly in this case, which seems to lead to a conclusion without much difficulty. It is alleged by defender that this agreement is invalid according to the law of the State of York, because it is not under seal, and therefore cannot be enforced according at law. Now, when we look at the agreement, we find that whatever other acter it may bear—I think it is an agreement for a joint adventure—whatever its precise character may be, it is, at all events, a bilateral contract; and a eral contract must be binding upon both parties or upon neither. Now, ose the case were reversed, and the defender were seeking to enforce this ement in New York, if he could not succeed in enforcing the agreement there

[1] L. R., 42 Chanc. Div. 321.
[2] Wharton's Conflict of Laws (2d edn.), sec. 401.

No. 133.
Mar. 11, 1891.
Shedlock v. Hannay.

according to the law of that country, it seems to me to follow of necessity from the principle I have just announced that the agreement cannot be enforced here either, because that would be to make one party liable in the agreement while the other was not, and that is a result that the law can never countenance. A bilateral contract, as I have already said, must be equally binding upon both parties, or binding upon neither. This view of the case confirms me very much in the impression which I entertain otherwise, that, in a case like the present, the lex loci actus must necessarily govern, because there is really no other law that can very well be applied as in a question regarding the validity or construction of the agreement. You cannot appeal here to the lex loci solutionis, because that is an indefinite place. The agreement is to be carried into effect all over the Americas, but there are a great many states in each, and the law of those states on questions of this kind may be essentially different. We are therefore driven to this, that we cannot say that the lex loci solutionis can possibly regulate the validity and construction of the agreement.

Now, is there any choice between the law of the place of execution and any other law? I confess I think not. I think we are necessarily shut up to the law of the place of execution; the lex loci actus is the law which must regulate the validity and construction of this agreement.

I am therefore of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that this agreement having been made and executed in New York, its validity and meaning must be determined by the law of that state. His Lordship, "to this extent and effect," sustains the second plea in law for the defender. I think probably that might have been omitted, but, at the same time, limited as it is, I think it stands quite consistently with the rest of the interlocutor, because the only extent and effect to which the second plea is sustained is, that the validity and meaning of the agreement has to be determined by the law of New York.

I am therefore for adhering.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion also, and have nothing to add.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

I think this case is free from many of the difficulties which may arise where contracts are executed in one country with a view to performance in another. There are two material points to be taken into account; in the first place, that the contract was executed in New York; and, in the second place, that the subject-matter of the contract is a right to be exercised in the United States. The pursuers' averment is, that there was an agreement entered into by which they say the defender agreed with the pursuers for the sale of his invention for the two Americas, and gave them power to deal with his invention. Then they go on to make an averment which, as a matter of pleading, would be quite out of place if it were concerned with the law of Scotland, but which is perfectly relevant and proper if it is an averment with reference to foreign law, which to this Court is a matter of fact. Their averment is, that by the said agreement they "acquired the sole right to use the said inventions in, inter alia, the United States of America, and to dispose of the said right in the said United States"; and then they go on to say that "they registered the agreement in the United States Patent Office." Now, that is an averment as matter of fact, that the effect in law of their agreement was to give them the sole right to use this invention in America. The right which they so acquired must, of course, depend on the law of the United States, because an exclusive privilege of using or selling a process or a manufactured article within a certain territory is a right that can be conferred by no other Government except the Government of that territory; and therefore the mode of its acquisition and the conditions upon which it is to be exercised must be determined by the law of the territory alone. It therefore appears to me that the pursuers start their case by laying down as the fundamental basis of their action an averment of the law of the United States.

But then they go on to make their averment of the breach of contract, which they say has been committed. In the third article of their condescendence they say that the defender sold to another company the whole patents and inventions belonging to him, which he had already sold to them. But then, in order to make that a relevant averment, it was, of course, necessary that they should go on to say that by this sale they had been deprived of the right which, by the previous contract, they had already acquired; and, accordingly, in the fourth article of the condescendence they say that in 1889 the defender and the new company applied in New York for, and obtained, letters-patent for the said invention, although the defender was advised that this was in breach of his agreement with the pursuers. Then comes the material averment of damage from breach of contract,—"The pursuers were thereby, as the defender knew and intended when he entered into the agreement with the White Lead Company, prevented from obtaining letters-patent in the said United States for the said inventions, and from obtaining any benefit from their rights under the said agreement." Now, that again appears to me to be an averment, and a perfectly relevant averment, of the law and practice of the United States; and therefore the pursuers' averment is that by the law of the United States they had acquired a good right by an effectual contract, and that they have been prevented from enjoying it because the defender has interposed an obstacle which by the law of the United States deprives them of the right which the defender gave them. It appears to me therefore that the pursuers put in issue the law of the United States, and base their case upon it. Now, the answer is, that by the law of the United States the contract which the pursuers allege to be effectual to give them the sole right to the invention is no valid contract at all, because the law of the United States requires that such an agreement should be under seal; that this agreement is not under seal, and therefore that it is not valid.

Now, there again is a very relevant averment by the other party of the law of the United States. The general rule certainly is that the formal requisites which are necessary for the validity of a contract must be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. I do not know that it is at all necessary in this case to determine whether that is a rule of universal application, or whether there might not be a case in which, in this country at least, we should be disposed to hold that, while the forms and solemnities of the place of execution are sufficient for the validity of a contract everywhere, they are not indispensable for its validity everywhere, so that contracts might possibly be enforced in this country, although defective according to the lex loci actus, if they comply with the conditions which our law requires to make them binding. I do not think it is necessary to consider the question; because, in the present case, it appears to me enough to say that the defender in making that answer makes a perfectly relevant answer to a perfectly relevant averment. The pursuers' averment is that it was the defender's breach of contract, and that alone, which prevented the pursuers from making their alleged right effectual in the United States. The defender answers that it was not any breach of contract which deprived the pursuers of the right they allege, but the original inefficacy of the written instrument on which they rely to give them any right in the United States whatever. It therefore appears to me that this record puts the United States law in issue, and that if the pursuers do not succeed in proving that law to be as they allege, they fail in proving the fundamental averment upon which their whole case rests.

No. 133.

Mar. 11, 1891. Shedlock v. Hannay.

Taking that view, therefore, it does seem to me doubtful whether it was quite necessary, although I think it was very proper and convenient, to raise the question at this stage in the form in which it has been raised, because it seems to me that if the pursuers had been allowed to go on to prove their case and had failed to prove the fundamental fact which they allege, namely, that they had acquired a right effectual to them in the United States, they would have failed to prove anything like breach of contract.

On these grounds, and entirely concurring with what your Lordship has said, I am of opinion that the interlocutor should be adhered to.

THE COURT adhered.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—REID & GUILD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 134.

Mar. 13, 1891. Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall.

RENTON FOOTBALL CLUB AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Murray—A. S. D. Thomson.

JOHN K. M'DOWALL AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—R. V. Campbell—Dickson.

Title to sue—Unincorporated society—Competency of action—Patrimonial interest.—The Renton Football Club, an unincorporated society, its office-bearers, and five persons described as members of the club, sued the Scottish Football Association, also an unincorporated society, its office-bearers, and the members of certain committees, for reduction of a minute of the defenders deciding that the pursuers' club be declared professional and expelled from the association. The pursuers averred that they had been illegally expelled from the association of which they were members; that as members they enjoyed several important pecuniary advantages which they would lose by expulsion; and that they had been duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the action. The secretary of the association, several members of its general committee, and all the members of the "professional committee" appeared, and pleaded, inter alia, (1) that the pursuers had no title to sue, inasmuch as they did not represent and had no authority to use the name of the Renton Football Club; and (2) that the Scottish Football Association being an unincorporated society could only be sued by calling its individual members. It was admitted that the association had several thousand members.

The Court allowed the pursuers a proof of their averment that they were duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the action, and repelled the second plea.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

ON 17th October 1890 the Renton Football Club and certain persons described as the president, the vice-president, the match-secretary, the honorary secretary and the treasurer of the club, together with seven other persons described as members of committee, and five other persons described as members of the club, brought an action against the Scottish Football Association and persons described as the vice-president, the honorary secretary, and the treasurer of the association, together with twenty-four persons described as members of the general

No. 134.

Mar. 18, 1891.
Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall.

committee, and nine persons described as members of the professional committee of the association, concluding for a reduction of a minute of the business and professional committee, whereby the committee decided that the Renton Football Club were declared guilty of "professionalism" and expelled from the association. There was also a conclusion for damages, but this conclusion was departed from by minute in the Outer-House.

The pursuers stated;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuers the Renton Football Club is an association for encouraging and carrying on the game of football in Renton and elsewhere. The defenders, the Scottish Football Association, were formed nearly twenty years ago, and consisted at first of a few clubs only, but now comprise upwards of 150 clubs." (Cond. 3) "The Scottish Football Association has a constitution and rules, which bind all the clubs and members thereof . . . The association has considerable funds and also heritable property in Glasgow. Each club and each affiliated association is bound to contribute an annual sum to the general funds, and, in addition, one-third of the gate-money taken for admission to the final tie between the two clubs competing for possession of the Scottish Cup goes into the funds of the association, as well as the money drawn for admission to trial matches for the selection of the Scottish Eleven, amounting to very considerable sums. Further, the association are lessees of offices in Waterloo Street, Glasgow, which are kept for the use of the members, for the management of the association's business, the holding of meetings and other association purposes, and which all members of the association have right to use. The association has also purchased heritable subjects in Carlton Place, Glasgow, for the use of its members." (Cond. 4) "By article 6 of the constitution and rules of the association it is provided that the affairs of the association shall be conducted by a committee of seventeen members, including the president, vice-president, and treasurer." The pursuers then set forth the minute under reduction and the grounds upon which they maintained it was illegal. (Cond. 9) "The consequences to the pursuers of this attempted expulsion are very serious. The pursuers cease to have the use and benefit of the funds and property of the association, to which they very materially contributed. Other clubs, which are members of the association and affiliated associations, are debarred by the constitution and rules from playing with them. They had a large number of fixtures for the coming football season, which would in ordinary course have yielded them a considerable revenue and which cannot now be played in consequence of the actings of the defenders. Their share of entry-money for certain matches has been very large, e.g., on 4th February 1883 it was £144, 8s. 8d. after paying all expenses, and on 13th February 1886 it was £93, 1s. 6d. They are excluded from contending for valuable prizes offered by the association out of its funds. They have thrown upon their hands the burden of maintaining their grounds without the corresponding benefit of having association matches played upon them, and in these and other ways they are suffering and must suffer from the wrongful and illegal actings of the committee, and they are entitled to the damages concluded for in respect of the injury to their patrimonial rights."

The pursuers pleaded;—(3) The pursuers not having been legally and validly expelled from the association are still members thereof, and are entitled to have the same declared.

Appearance was entered for the secretary of the association, for certain of the members of the general committee, and for all the members of the professional committee called as defenders. No appearance was entered for the Scottish Football Association.

No. 134.

Mar. 13, 1891.
Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall.

The compearing defenders in their statement of facts stated, inter alia; —(Stat. 1) "The Renton Football Club is composed of a large number of persons. Only a few of the members of the Renton Football Club are pursuers of the present action. The pursuers do not represent, and have no right to use the name of the Renton Football Club for the purposes of this action. The said club is not incorporated or entitled to sue under the name of the Renton Football Club." The pursuers answered,—(Ans. 1) "The Renton Football Club is composed of nearly 200 persons. The pursuers were duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the present action. Admitted that the said club is not incorporated. Quoad ultra denied." (Stat. 2) "The Scottish Football Association is not incorporated or entitled to be sued under that name. It comprises 172 clubs and 11 affiliated associations. It has no individual members. None of these clubs or associations have been called to this action."

The compearing defenders pleaded;—1. The action is incompetent. 2. No title to sue. 3. The action should be dismissed in respect (1) The pursuers are not entitled to sue; (2) The defenders are not duly convened.

It was not disputed that the Scottish Football Association was composed of clubs whose collective members amounted to several thousand persons, and that the membership was a very fluctuating body.

On 6th January 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) repelled the first plea in law, and the second head of the third plea in law stated for the compearing defenders; and before further answer as to the second plea and the first head of the third plea for the said defenders, allowed the pursuers a proof of their averment that "they were duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the present action," and to the defenders a conjunct probation.*

---

* "OPINION.—In support of the defenders' first plea that the action is incompetent, they contended that the questions raised and interests involved were not such as a Court of justice could consider, and that no question of civil right or patrimonial interest was really raised. They quoted Forbes v. Eden, 8th Dec. 1865, 4 Macph. 143, 38 Scot. Jur. 98, affirmed 11th April 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 36, 39 Scot. Jur. 411, in support of the position that the Court could never entertain questions regarding violation of the constitution of voluntary associations where no patrimonial interests were involved.

"On this point I am of opinion that, assuming the truth of the pursuers' averments, the action is such that the Court may and is therefore bound to entertain. I do not require at this stage to consider whether it is competent for the Court to give the pursuers the full remedy they ask. It will be for consideration, when the merits of the case are reached, whether a decree of declarator that the Renton Club is not professional can be pronounced. Neither does it seem necessary to express any opinion as to the nature and amount of the patrimonial interest which will warrant recourse to the Court, nor to affirm absolutely that there cannot be cases in which Courts of justice might intervene, even although no interest of a strictly patrimonial character could be alleged. For I think there is no doubt that there is in this case an ample allegation of that kind of patrimonial interest which in many cases has been regarded as sufficient to give jurisdiction to the English Courts in actions relating to expulsion from clubs. Reference was made by the pursuers to the dicta of Lord Denman in Innes v. Wylie, 1844, 1 Car. and Keenan, 257; to Wood v. Wood, 1st June 1874, L. R., 9 Ex. 190; to Fisher v. Keane, 1878, 11 Ch. Div. 353; to Labouchere v. Wharncliffe, 1879, 13 Ch. Div. 346; and especially to the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Rigby v. Connol, 1880, 14 Ch. Div. 482. And on the

No. 134.

Mar. 13, 1891. Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall.

The compearing defenders reclaimed.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's opinion, the three points considered by the Lord Ordinary being argued to the Inner-House.*

After the hearing the case was adjourned in order to give the pursuers an opportunity of producing a minute of their club authorising the institution of the action. A minute bearing to be a minute of the Renton Football Club was thereafter produced, but the defenders denied the authenticity of the minute, on the ground that the meeting of which it bore to be the minute had not been convened in terms of the rules. The Court then made avizandum.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action by an unincorporated society, formed of whole, I think it plain enough that this action cannot be thrown out as incompetent at this stage, as not disclosing any question which can be judicially entertained.

---

"In support of the plea of no title to sue, it was maintained that the Renton Football Club, not being incorporated, could not sue by that name alone, and that, as it was not a trading company, it was not sufficient to add the names of certain selected members, but that, being an unincorporated association not established for purposes of trade, it was essential that all the members should join in the action. No authority was quoted for that proposition, which was submitted as being elementary and self-evident. The pursuers contended that, in joining with the club its office-bearers and several of its members, they had stated a sufficient instance. This contention may be sound, although I do not think that any exact precedent was quoted. But the pursuers have not left their title to depend on that argument, because they have averred that they were duly authorised at a meeting of the club to sue the action. It appears to me that that is a relevant averment—(Bow v. Patrons of Cowan's Hospital, 6th December 1825, 4 S. 276; Jamieson v. Watson, 15th July 1852, 14 D. 1021, 24 Scot. Jur. 631); and I propose to allow them to prove that averment. If they succeed in proving it, their title will be considered on that footing; if they do not, it will be open to them to maintain that the instance is sufficient without that authority.

"The first head of the third plea seems a repetition of the second plea.

"The second head of that plea is that the defenders are not duly convened. I understand this plea to mean that the Scottish Football Association is not duly convened. It is a very peculiar body, and it is averred—what seems impossible—that there are no individual members of it at all. It holds meetings, however, passes resolutions, and possesses property, heritable and moveable. The defenders' argument came, I think, to this, that there could be no competent action of the kind now brought, unless all the members of all the clubs and affiliated associations of which the Scottish Football Association consisted were called, which is obviously a practical impossibility; that otherwise the association could not be sued at all, and that if, through the fault of its servants or the contract of its officers, the association incurred an obligation, its property could not be reached by its creditors.

"The defenders rested their argument chiefly on the case of M'Millan v. The General Assembly of the Free Church, 9th July 1862, 24 D. 1282, 34 Scot. Jur. 621, and in particular on the dicta of the Lord President, at page 1291, and also on the judgment and note of Lord Jerviswoode in a subsequent action by Mr M'Millan v. The Free Church of Scotland, and its officials (20th July 1864, 2 Macph. 1444). The pursuers relied mainly on the case of Somerville v. Rowbotham, 27th June 1862, 24 D. 1187, 34 Scot. Jur. 619. I think it unnecessary to say more than that that decision appears to me to be substantially in point, and I consider that I follow it in repelling the defenders' plea now in question."

* Additional Authorities.—General Assembly of Baptist Churches v. Taylor, June 17, 1841, 3 D. 1030; Culcreuch Cotton Co. v. Mathie, Nov. 27, 1822, 2 S. 47; Duke of Portland, Nov. 23, 1852, 15 D. 62; Tantussi, June 23, 1886, 2 Times Reports, 700.

No. 134.

Mar. 13, 1891.
Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall.

persons engaged or interested in a lawful sport, and directed against the proceedings of a society to which they are affiliated, whereby the pursuers were expelled from the association on the ground of what is called professionalism. The question in the action is, whether the pursuers are amenable to censure or exclusion upon this ground. The only matter, however, which is now under consideration is the title of the pursuers to sue. The Lord Ordinary has dealt with that question, and the substance of his interlocutor is that he allowed the pursuers a proof of their averments that they were duly authorised at a meeting of the club to pursue the present action. The objection to the instance is that the Renton Football Club being an unincorporated society has no persona standi in judicio, and it is contended that the difficulty is not removed by the course which has been taken of joining certain individual names along with that of the association.

In considering this question we may start with the very elementary proposition that as every subject of the Crown is entitled to the protection of the Courts of law, so every assemblage of persons who may conceive that their collective rights have been invaded, must be entitled to redress by taking proper means for having their case judicially considered. But it is also clear that an unincorporated society has not a title to institute an action of this kind in its name without further addition. Various reasons may be given for this rule, but it is sufficient to give one, and that is, that in the event of a decree for expenses being given against the society, or in the event of a counter action being brought against the society under the designation which it has given to itself, there would be no person against whom a decree ad factum prestandum could be given, and it would be impossible that such a decree could be carried into execution in the ordinary way. On the other hand, it by no means follows as a consequence of this rule that every individual member of the unincorporated society must be made a party to the action. Where a society consists of a small number of persons it may be very convenient, and would save all questions, if the name of every individual member were inserted in the instance, but from the constitution of such societies, and from the very slight cohesion which sometimes exists between their members, it is evident there are cases where it would be exceedingly difficult to comply with such a requirement. It is certainly undesirable, and indeed I think inconsistent with sound principle, that we should lay down a rule with reference to the instance of unincorporated societies, with which in many cases it would be difficult, and in some impossible, to secure compliance. Indeed, I think that to require the insertion of the names of every member would be a rule which would be more likely to result in vexatious preliminary litigation as to the constitution of the society than productive of any benefit to either of the parties concerned. It is undoubtedly the right of the defenders to see that in addition to the instance of the society itself, they should have the instance of certain persons who are responsible for the proper prosecution of the action, and for giving obedience to the decrees that may be given under it or under any counter action that may be joined with it.

In the present case we have, in addition to the title of the Renton Football Club itself, the names of all the persons described as office-bearers and two others—seventeen persons in all. I think it will be generally agreed that the office-bearers of an unincorporated society are always proper persons to be named along with the society itself, both because they are likely to be substantial persons and acquainted with the affairs of the society, and also because they are the persons to whom the society has deputed the conduct of its affairs. I do not say that in every case it would be sufficient that the office-bearers of the club or society were named, but in the majority of cases it may be considered that the office-bearers fairly represent both the mind of the society with whom they are associated and the requirement of character and responsibility. In the present case, while we have had very full argument upon the legal questions, no personal objection has been stated to any of the parties named as pursuers, and I must take it that those persons sufficiently represent the wishes of the football club, and that the objection to the instance is maintained upon theoretical grounds.

No. 134.

Mar. 13, 1891.
Renton Football Club v. M'Dowall.

There is, however, a further condition of the right of an unincorporated society to sue by a representation of its members, and that is, that those persons must be duly authorised by a meeting of the society. It is plainly not necessary that they should be authorised by every individual member of the society or that there should be a signed power of attorney, because there would be the same difficulty in getting such a deed as there would be to find out the names of the persons to be inserted in the summons. But there must be an authority given by at all events a majority of the known members of the club, either in writing or by a resolution of a meeting attested in the ordinary way. The Lord Ordinary has allowed proof on the subject, and on the first explanation of the case we were all disposed to affirm the principle which the Lord Ordinary had laid down. But with the view of saving litigation, counsel interposed and produced a signed minute giving the necessary authority. It is objected to that minute that while it authorised the institution of the action, it did not say in what names the action should be prosecuted, and if that had been the only objection to the mandate I should not have thought it a good one. It was the function of the meeting of a society to give authority to institute an action, but it was not part of their duty, because they were not a meeting of lawyers, to state the form in which the action should be brought. But the position of the case is now somewhat altered, because it is stated by counsel for the defenders that they mean to deny the authenticity of the mandate upon the ground that the meeting was not properly convened, and the result of that objection is that we must simply adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and leave it to be proved, if it can be proved, that the requisite authority was given.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD ADAM intimated that the LORD PRESIDENT, who had heard the cause but was absent, also concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note and adhere to said interlocutor . . . Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed," &c.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—A. J. & J. DICKSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.
Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

THE GLASGOW TRAMWAY AND OMNIBUS COMPANY, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Murray—Dickson.

THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF GLASGOW, Respondents.—Comrie Thomson—Ure.

Company—Resolution to alter memorandum of association—Confirmation by Court—Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 1.—The Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1890, sec. 1, enacts that (subsec. 1) "Subject to the provisions of this Act, a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, may, by special resolution, alter

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.

Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

the provisions of its memorandum of association or deed of settlement with respect to the objects of the company, so far as may be required for any of the purposes hereinafter specified, ... but in no case shall any such alteration take effect until confirmed on petition by the Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company." Subsec. 5,—"The Court may confirm, either wholly or in part, any such alteration as aforesaid with respect to the objects of the company, if it appears that the alteration is required in order to enable the company (a) to carry on its business more economically, or more efficiently; or (b) to attain its main purpose by new or improved means; or (c) to enlarge or change the local area of its operations; or (d) to carry on some business or businesses which, under existing circumstances, may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company; or (e) to restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum of association or deed of settlement."

The corporation of Glasgow possessed statutory powers to make and maintain tramways in the streets of Glasgow. Section 26 of their statute provided that animal power alone should be used on the tramways. The corporation leased the tramways for twenty-three years from 1st July 1871 to a limited company, which was promoted for the purpose of acquiring the lease, and whose objects, as specified in the memorandum of association, were to carry on the working of the tramways and the omnibus traffic in connection therewith under the lease, and after the expiration of the lease to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors in the city and vicinity.

The company in the course of working the corporation tramways acquired a large stock of horses and plant, the greater part of which would be rendered useless and a source of loss in the event of the lease not being renewed, and accordingly, when about three years of the lease had still to run, the company applied to the Court for alteration of their memorandum of association, under the above Act, so as to include, inter alia, these objects,—"(10) To exercise the powers and carry on the business of a tramway company, and to promote, or acquire, equip, work, and dispose of any tramways within the city of Glasgow and the vicinity. (11) To carry on the business of omnibus, road-car, coach, hackney, or stage carriage, and cab proprietors, carting and general contractors, undertakers, funeral furnishers, and carriers in all their various branches. (12) To carry mails, parcels, and other matter transmitted through the Post-Office . . . (13) To work and move all or any of the carriages or other vehicles of the company by means of electrical power, steam power, or by any other mechanical power which may be available, or by means of haulage with wire ropes, cables, chains, or other appliances."

The corporation opposed the application, on the ground that it was a breach of the contract with the corporation for the company to alter its constitution in any way during the lease, and because object (13) was inconsistent with the prohibition by Parliament of mechanical power.

Held that the promoting and disposing of tramways was an object foreign to the purposes of the memorandum of association and could not be sanctioned, and that quoad ultra the alterations fell to be confirmed.

Observed that the alteration of the constitution of the company would not enlarge their rights under the Tramways Acts.

1st Division. C.

By the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. lxii.) the corporation of Glasgow were empowered to construct tramways on the streets of Glasgow. Sec. 26 enacted that "all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by animal power only"; and sec. 87 gave the corporation power to "lease from time to time to any person or body the right of user of any tramway made by the corporation, and of demanding and taking in respect thereof the tolls and charges authorised by this Act."

By agreement, dated 25th May 1871, between the corporation of Glasgow, as first parties, and William Morris and others, as second parties, of the narrative that the first parties had agreed, under the powers of the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, "to lease the tramways there-authorised to a joint stock company to be formed by the second parties under the Limited Liability Act, on the terms and for the period hereinafter specified," it was, inter alia, agreed as follows:—"3. The first parties shall lease the tramways for twenty-three years, from the 1st day of July 1871, to a limited liability company, to be called the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, Limited, and (hereinafter called 'the company') to be formed by the second parties within the period of three months from the said 1st day of July 1871, the capital of such company to be not less than £200,000, applicable solely to the tramways to be leased under this agreement, and omnibuses and omnibus traffic in connection therewith, and the articles of association of said company shall be framed in conformity with this agreement, and so as to facilitate the working out thereof, and the said lease to be granted as aforesaid."

Accordingly, on 30th September 1871, a company named the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, Limited, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, with a capital of £350,000, divided into 35,000 shares of £10 each, of which, at the date of the petition after mentioned, £9 per share had been paid up.

The objects for which the company was established were by the memorandum of association declared to be,—(1) To adopt and carry out the foresaid agreement between the corporation and William Morris and others. "(2) To take any new lease, on such terms as may be agreed on, of the said tramways and extensions on the expiration of the lease above referred to." (3) To adopt and carry out another agreement which it is not necessary here to explain. "(4) To work, conduct, and develop the business of the tramways above described, and of the omnibus traffic in connection therewith. (5) After the expiration of the lease or leases aforesaid, to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors in Glasgow and the vicinity. (6) To purchase and acquire any land, buildings, plant, cars, omnibuses, horses, machines, plant, stables, or other property, whether real or personal, and of whatsoever nature, the acquisition of which may be useful for or conducive to the attainment of any of the objects of the company, and to acquire patents, or concessions, or any interest therein for the purposes of the company. (7) To establish and construct works, buildings, and machinery, and therein to make, build, and construct cars, omnibuses, and plant for the purposes of the company. (8) To sell or otherwise dispose of any property acquired by the company. (9) To do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects."

On 17th November 1871 the corporation of Glasgow and the company entered into a lease, whereby the corporation, on the narrative of the heads of agreement between themselves and the promoters, let to the company "the sole right to use, for the sole purposes of the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, carriages with flange wheels or other wheels specially adapted to run on a grooved rail on the whole tramway authorised to be formed by the said Act," for the space of twenty-three years from 1st July 1871.

The provisions of the lease which are material to the present report were as follows:—"(1) The corporation were to make the tramways out of moneys to be raised or borrowed by them. (2) The company were to pay to the corporation the interest paid or payable by the corporation on the money borrowed on capital account and on certain other expenses. (3) The company were also to pay to the corporation a sum of three per cent per annum on the sum borrowed by the corporation on capital account, to be accumulated as sinking fund in extinction of the cost of constructing the tramways. (5) The company were to maintain the tramways and a certain space of the adjacent roadways, and hand over the same at the end of the lease in good working condition. "(6) The company shall have the right of user of the tramways for the sole purpose of the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, during the currency of this lease, and also of demanding and taking the tolls and charges authorised by the said Act. . . . (7) The carriages to be used by the company on the tramways shall be constructed and maintained to the satisfaction of the corporation or any person to be appointed by them for that purpose; and the carriages shall be run at such times, and at such speed, as the corporation or an officer appointed by them may from time to time direct; and, generally, the corporation shall, subject to the provisions of this lease, have the whole powers to make regulations or pass bye-laws with reference to the working or use of the said tramways as they shall from time to time consider necessary or expedient, with all the other powers and authorities conferred on the corporation, or on the Lord Provost and Magistrates, by the said Act." (9) In addition to the foresaid sums the company were to pay to the corporation £150 per annum for every mile of street in which the tramways were opened for traffic, and proportionately for any portion so opened less than a mile. (10) Besides their other obligations the company were to pay a sum of four per cent per annum on the money expended by the corporation in the construction of the tramways, which sum was to be invested in the joint names of the Lord Provost and the chairman of the company, and expended from time to time in the renewal of the tramways and adjacent roadways—any balance at the end of the lease being declared to belong to the company. "(11) On or before the 1st day of July 1873 the company shall invest a sum of not less than £60,000 in the purchase of heritable property in the city of Glasgow or the vicinity, and the same shall be conveyed to the corporation; but the conveyance or conveyances thereof shall be qualified by a back-bond declaring that the said properties are held in security of the fulfilment by the company of the obligations of this lease. (13) The company shall be entitled to all the powers and privileges, except in so far as at variance with the present lease, conferred on lessees by the foresaid Act, and they shall be subject to all the liabilities thereby imposed. (17) Except in so far as implemented by the execution of these presents, or as otherwise carried into effect, the heads of agreement before mentioned shall remain operative and binding between the parties hereto."

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

Thereafter the tramways authorised by the Act of 1870 were duly constructed, and the company entered into possession and worked them.

On 25th November 1890, the company presented a petition, praying the Court to confirm the following special resolution of the company, in terms of the Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1890:—*

* The Companies Memorandum of Association Act (53 and 54 Vict. c. 62) sec. 1, enacts,—"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, may, by special resolution, alter the provisions of its memorandum of association or deed of settlement with respect to the objects of the company, so far as may be required for any of the purposes hereinafter specified, . . . but in no case shall any such alteration take effect until confirmed on petition by the Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company. (2) Before confirming any such alteration, the Court must be satisfied—(a) That sufficient notice has been given to every holder of debentures or debenture stock of the company, and any person or class of persons whose interest will, in the opinion of the Court, be affected by the alteration; and (b) That, with respect to every creditor who, in the opinion of the Court, is entitled to object and who signifies his objection in

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.

Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

"That the memorandum of association of the company be altered so as to include among the objects for which the company is established the following, or any one or more of them, viz.:—(10) To exercise the powers and carry on the business of a tramway company, and to promote or acquire, equip, work, and dispose of any tramways within the city of Glasgow and the vicinity. (11) To carry on the business of omnibus, road-car, coach, hackney or stage carriage, and cab proprietors, carting and general contractors, undertakers, funeral furnishers, and carriers in all their various branches. (12) To carry mails, parcels, and other matter transmitted through the Post-Office, or under its directions or regulations, and to perform all such reasonable services in regard to the conveyance of mails, parcels, and other matter as the Postmaster-General may from time to time require, and to enter into agreements with the Postmaster-General. (13) To work and move all or any of the carriages or other vehicles of the company by means of electrical power, steam power, or by any other mechanical power which may be available, or by means of haulage with wire ropes, cables, chains, or other appliances. (14) [This head of the resolution was withdrawn in the course of the proceedings after mentioned.] (15) To take on lease any premises, lands, or farms, the acquisition of which may be useful for or conducive to the attainment of the objects of the company or any of them."

The petitioners stated that there had been abortive negotiations between them and the corporation of Glasgow with reference to the renewal of the lease, which expired in 1894, and that the corporation had now intimated their intention to apply to Parliament in the ensuing session for powers to work the tramways by electricity or mechanical power, alleging that they already possess the power to work them by horses. "In these circumstances, the petitioners think it prudent that steps should be taken to widen the field of the petitioners' business, so that their large stock of horses and plant may not become useless in the event of no arrangements for a prolongation of the lease being arranged, or in the event of the manner directed by the Court, either his consent to the alteration has been obtained, or his debt or claim has been discharged or has determined, or has been secured to the satisfaction of the Court: Provided that the Court may, in the case of any person or class of persons, for special reasons, dispense with the notice required by this section. (3) An order confirming any such alteration may be made on such terms and subject to such conditions as to the Court seems fit; and the Court may make such orders as to costs as it deems proper. (4) The Court shall, in exercising its discretion under this Act, have regard to the rights and interests of the members of the company, or of any class of those members, as well as to the rights and interests of the creditors, and may, if it thinks fit, adjourn the proceedings in order that an arrangement may be made, to the satisfaction of the Court, for the purchase of the interests of dissentient members; and the Court may give such directions, and make such orders as it may think expedient, for the purpose of facilitating any such arrangement or carrying the same into effect: Provided always that it shall not be lawful to expend any part of the capital of the company in any such purpose. (5) The Court may confirm, either wholly or in part, any such alteration as aforesaid with respect to the objects of the company, if it appears that the alteration is required in order to enable the company—(a) To carry on its business more economically, or more efficiently; or (b) To attain its main purpose by new or improved means; or (c) To enlarge or change the local area of its operations; or (d) To carry on some business or businesses which, under existing circumstances, may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company; or (e) To restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum of association or deed of settlement."

---

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.

Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

respondents being successful in their said application to Parliament, so that the petitioners may be in a position to offer for a lease to work the tramways otherwise than by animal power."

The corporation lodged answers and maintained that under the Act of 1870, and the agreement and lease following thereon, the company were absolutely precluded, at all events during the subsistence of the lease, from carrying on any other business than the working of the tramways leased to them by the respondents. And they stated that it was on the faith that the energy and capital of the petitioners would be dedicated solely to this end that the respondents undertook the very large expenditure on the construction of tramways above mentioned. There was no warrant or authority whatever in the said statute, agreement, or lease, for the very extensive change in the character and scope of their business now projected by the petitioners. In particular the respondents objected to objects (10) and (13) of the petitioners' proposed addition to their memorandum of association. They contended that to introduce object (10) into the memorandum would be to run entirely counter to the Act of 1870. By that Act the company came into existence solely for the purpose of working tramways, which the respondents were empowered to construct. If the company were now permitted to promote or acquire and work other tramways, then the capital, energy, and resources, which the respondents were entitled to rely upon being dedicated exclusively to the tramways constructed by them might be dissipated on other and entirely different concerns.

The respondents contended that to introduce object (13) would be to run counter to the 26th section of the Act, which provided that "all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by animal power only." Parliament had hitherto refused its sanction to the use of mechanical power on tramways formed on the streets of Glasgow; and, if the employment of any other than horse power was to be sanctioned, the right to use such power should be vested in the respondents as proprietors of the tramways and conservators of the streets of the city in the public interest, and not in companies or persons whose interest in the streets must necessarily be limited in character and duration, and in some respects antagonistic to the interests of the public.

The respondents further contended that the pecuniary obligations to them under which the petitioners lay might, and probably would, be seriously affected. If the petitioners should embark on the numerous schemes embraced within the objects now sought to be included in their memorandum of association their financial resources would be seriously imperilled, and their ability to meet their pecuniary obligations to the respondents would be impaired if not destroyed. In answer, the petitioners stated that in terms of the lease the corporation held heritable securities to the amount of £129,232, and that the total pecuniary obligations of the company to the corporation would not exceed £105,000, and this was neither admitted nor denied by the corporation.

Argued for the petitioners;—Under the Companies Memorandum of Association Act, the Court had a discretion in the matter of confirming a resolution to alter a memorandum of association, but practically as regarded persons outside the company such a resolution would be confirmed provided it complied with subsec. 2 and subsec. 5 of sec. 1 of the Act. Subsec. 2 enacted in the first place that the Court must be satisfied that notice had been given to persons whose interests would be affected by the proposed alteration, but no question arose here under that head. Then it was further provided that the Court must be satisfied that the claims of creditors who had not consented to the

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

alteration had been discharged or had determined or had been satisfied. Now, in answer to the respondents' objection, it was sufficient to point to the petitioners' statements on the head which the respondents neither admitted nor denied, and which therefore must be taken pro veritate—at anyrate the petitioners were ready to go to proof on it; that article shewed plainly that the corporation were very amply secured against any possible loss during the remaining years of the lease. Next, as regarded subsec. 5 it was to be borne in mind that a company might be incorporated under the Companies Acts for any purposes of profit whatever, which were not in themselves contrary to morality or to public policy. The petitioners therefore might legitimately and without objection have possessed all the powers they now desired to have, had they enumerated them in their memorandum of association. Once incorporated, however, a company was, until the recent Act, strictly limited to the purposes enumerated in its memorandum of association. The only way in which it could (in practical effect) enlarge the scope of its business was by the cumbrous and expensive method of a liquidation, and the incorporation of a new company with enlarged powers. The object of the Act of 1890 was to supply a more expeditious and cheaper way of effecting the same result in certain classes of cases, which were enumerated in subsection 5. The question therefore was, Did the powers for which the confirmation of the Court was asked fall into any of these classes? And that was the only question under this head, for there was nothing in the constitution of the company which prevented them from taking advantage of the Act. They were a company registered under the Companies Acts, and that was sufficient to give them a title to petition. The purposes of a company as defined in its memorandum might perhaps be of such a limited and specific character—especially as regarded the duration of the company,—that no possible additions to its memorandum would fall within subsection 5, but that was not the case with the petitioners; their memorandum did not limit the period of their existence to that of the present lease, nor did it contemplate that their only business should be that of lessees of the corporation tramways, for they were expressly given powers to enter into a new lease, and to become omnibus proprietors. Now of the proposed new purposes to which the corporation specifically objected, (10) fell within either subhead (c) or subhead (d) of subsection 5, and (13) fell within either subhead (a) or subhead (b). It was said that to confirm (13) would be to entitle the company to break the contract which they had made with the corporation, as that contract prohibited the use of other than animal power on the tramways. But that was to confound the powers of the company with their rights ex contractu. It could not be suggested that the Court by granting the present application would give the company the right to violate the Act of Parliament, which prohibited the use of other than animal power; and it was almost equally obvious that the addition of the proposed power to the company's memorandum would not give them a vested right to use other than animal power on the Glasgow tramways should Parliament see fit to sanction such a means of locomotion. While their contract with the corporation lasted they would be bound by that contract notwithstanding anything that might be done in this application, just as any private individual lessee would have been, and when their contract with the corporation came to an end they, whatever their powers might be, would have no more right than any private individual to use mechanical or any other mode of locomotion on the tramways, unless they and the corporation entered into a new lease. What they desired was to be put into as advantageous a position as an individual lessee would have been in at the end of

No. 135.
Mar. 13, 1891.
Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

the lease in contracting for a new lease; for if Parliament were to sanction the use of mechanical power on the Glasgow tramways a private individual lessee could have contracted with the corporation for a new lease, whereas for the petitioners with their present powers to do so would be ultra vires, or at least it was doubtful whether it would be intra vires.

Argued for the corporation;—It might be that the corporation were secured against all possible loss, provided the company's powers remained what they were, but if the company was permitted to embark in all the speculations which would be within its power, were confirmation to be granted, it was impossible to say what liabilities it might not incur. The company was in an unique position, for as long as the lease lasted it was entirely under the control of the corporation, and could do nothing without the consent of the corporation. It was bound to apply its whole capital to the working of the tramways belonging to the corporation—the 3d article of the agreement with the promoters (which was incorporated into the lease by the 17th article of the lease) distinctly provided that: and it was bound to use only animal power in using the tramway—the Act of 1870 enjoined that, and was binding on the company. In short, it was pars contractus between the corporation and the company that the company's powers should, during the lease, remain what they were. This being so, the present application was an attempted breach of contract, and as such, neither complied with subsection 2 of the Act of 1890, nor with subsection 5,—not with subsection 2, for the consent of the corporation had not been obtained, and it could not be said that a breach of a contract was either a discharge or a determination of or a security for that contract. Then subsection 5 contemplated that additions to a memorandum should be in some way ancillary to the powers already in the memorandum. But the powers which it was here proposed to add were subversive of the existing constitution of the company. Under its existing powers it could do nothing but work the Glasgow tramways so long as it was lessee of these tramways. In any case, the Court had a discretion, and it would be well exercised in refusing the application during the currency of the present lease.

The petitioners in reply disputed the construction of the agreement which would bind them to apply their whole capital, which much exceeded the specified £200,000, to the working of the tramways, but they stated that they were willing so to apply it during the currency of the existing lease.

At advising,—

Lord Kinnear.—This is an application under the Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1890, for the confirmation of certain resolutions to alter the memorandum of association of the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company. The Act was passed in order to enable companies, with the sanction of the Court, to enlarge the scope of their memorandum of association so as to relieve themselves to a limited extent, defined by the Act, of the incapacity which disables trading corporations created for certain definite purposes only from undertaking any kinds of business or entering into any contracts not warranted by the terms of the original constitution of the company, either expressly or by necessary implication. I think that there can be no question that in the position in which the petitioners are placed it is most reasonable that they should be allowed to avail themselves of the power conferred by the statute, provided that the interests which the statute requires to be protected are sufficiently secured.

The petitioners' company was incorporated in 1871, mainly for the purpose of

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.

Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

working certain tramways in Glasgow under a lease from the corporation for twenty-three years from July 1871, and after the expiration of that period under such new lease of the same subjects as might be agreed on, and for carrying on an omnibus traffic in connection with the tramways during the subsistence of the lease or leases, and after their expiration for carrying on the business of omnibus proprietors in Glasgow and the vicinity. In carrying on their business under the lease up to this date, the company have employed a capital of £369,502, they have acquired a great deal of property, both heritable and moveable, and they are now in possession of a very large stock of horses and plant, which are necessary for the conduct of their business. They say that if the lease which they now hold from the corporation should come to an end, without being renewed, they would be in this position, that their constitution as established by their present memorandum of association would allow of their applying this large and valuable stock of horses and plant to no useful purpose, except in so far as regards the comparatively inconsiderable portion which might be used in the business of omnibus proprietors. The position therefore which they have stated is this, that if their business is restricted by the limits of their present memorandum, they will be placed in a very disadvantageous position in contracting with the corporation for a renewal of the lease, for if they should fail to come to terms with the corporation, which seems to be probable, they will have this valuable stock thrown upon their hands, with no resource except to sell it at what is called a break-up value, to the serious loss of the shareholders. In these circumstances, it is quite legitimate and most reasonable that they should endeavour now so to enlarge the scope of their corporate life as to enable them to make some profitable use of their property when the lease comes to an end, in case it should not be renewed, and in the meantime to make valid agreements for that purpose, which should be binding both upon the company and upon the persons with whom they might contract, because it is quite clear that as the memorandum of association now stands, any agreements which they might now make for the purpose of using their property for any other objects than those expressly warranted by the memorandum of association would be altogether invalid and ineffectual. In so far therefore as this application depends upon the general reasonableness of its character, it appears to me that the petitioners have presented a case which entitles them to obtain the sanction of the Court to the resolutions which they have passed.

But the Court is not entitled to sanction such resolutions merely because they appear reasonable and proper in the interests of the company itself. We must be satisfied that the conditions under which the statute allows the memorandum of association to be altered are complied with. Now, these conditions are of two kinds. In the first place, the statute allows the alteration of a memorandum of association only for certain limited and definite purposes, and the Court therefore cannot confirm a resolution for altering a memorandum unless it appears that the alteration is required for these purposes; and in the second place, even if it should so appear, the Court cannot confirm a resolution unless they are satisfied that sufficient notice has been given to all persons interested, and that the interests of those who are entitled to object have been duly secured.

Now, with regard to the first of these conditions, what is required is that the company should shew that the alteration is necessary to do one or other of five things, namely to carry on its business more economically or more efficiently—that of course means its present business—or to attain its main purpose by new or improved means, or to enlarge or change the local area of its operations, or to carry on some business or businesses which, under existing circumstances, may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company; or to restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum of association or deed of settlement. The first question therefore appears to me to be whether the resolutions which the company asks should be confirmed are in accordance with these conditions of the statute. The new objects which the company proposed to add to their memorandum of association are stated under six heads, but one of these has now been withdrawn from consideration. There remain therefore five heads, under which are set forth the new objects or purposes which the company desire to have added to their memorandum of association.

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.

Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

Now, it appears to me that there is only one of these heads which raises a question of any difficulty upon this branch of the case, and that is the power contained in the first of the proposed new resolutions, which, if the resolutions are confirmed, would become the 10th purpose of the memorandum of association. The resolution proposes to give the company the right "to exercise the powers and carry on the business of a tramway company, and to promote or acquire, equip, work, or dispose of any tramways within the city of Glasgow and the vicinity." Now, in so far as this resolution proposes as an object of the company the exercising of the powers and the carrying on of the business of a tramway company, and the acquisition, equipment, and working of tramways within the city of Glasgow and the vicinity, it would appear to me that it falls within the powers given by the 5th subsection of the statute as being an enlargement or change of the local area of the operations of the company. It does not appear to me that in so far as the words which I have read go, the resolution would carry the business of the company beyond the scope of the provisions of the statute. But then, in addition to the purposes to which I have just referred, the resolution proposes that the company should have power to promote and dispose of any tramways within the city of Glasgow and the vicinity. Now, the power to dispose of property, heritable or moveable, may be a merely ancillary power, without which it would be impossible to carry on the main purposes of the corporation, and if nothing more were implied in the words "dispose of tramways" than the power which the company already has under their present memorandum of association, it does not appear to me that it would create any difficulty. But the words of the proposed resolution seem to me to go beyond that. The word "promote" is not a word of any very definite meaning, but if the company obtain power to promote and dispose of tramways, that certainly appears to me to cover the promotion of undertakings for the construction of tramways, and for the disposal of these tramways after they had been constructed, and might possibly be held to cover speculations departing even more widely from the original purposes of the company. I am disposed to think that the promotion and disposal of tramways is a matter entirely foreign to the original purposes of the memorandum of association, and I cannot say that it has been made apparent, by any of the explanations which have been given to us at the bar, that this alteration is required in order to enable the company to do any of the things contemplated by the statute. I am therefore unable to see that the Court is in a position to confirm the resolution in so far as it is a resolution authorising the company to promote and dispose of tramways. With that exception, it appears to me that all of the new purposes which

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.

Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

the company desires to undertake are clearly within the terms of the statute. I do not think it necessary to examine them in detail. It is enough to say that they all fall under one or other of the heads given in the statute.

But assuming that to be so, there is a second condition which must be satisfied before the Court can confirm the resolutions. The Court requires to be satisfied with respect to every creditor who in the opinion of the Court is entitled to object either that he has given his consent to the proposed resolution, or that his debt or claim has been discharged or determined, or that it has been secured in some way to the satisfaction of the Court. Now, I think that there is no doubt whatever that the position of the corporation of Glasgow as the creditor in the obligations of the lease of the tramways to the company is such as to entitle the corporation to state objections to the proposed alterations, and, if these objections cannot be otherwise satisfied, that the corporation are entitled to insist that their claims should either be discharged or in some way secured to the satisfaction of the Court. The corporation have accordingly stated objections, and have maintained them very strenuously to the Court.

These objections appear to me to be of two kinds. In the first place, the corporation maintain that the proposed alterations ought not to be sanctioned as being inconsistent with the statute, and as otherwise objectionable irrespective of the special claims of the corporation as creditors in the obligations of the lease; and in the second place they maintain that the resolutions ought not to be sanctioned because they would prejudice the interests secured to them by that contract.

As to the first of these objections, I think it applies mainly to the 4th of the new resolutions, which would stand, if the resolutions are sanctioned, as the 13th of the purposes of the memorandum. By it the company seek to obtain authority "to work and move all or any of the carriages or other vehicles of the company by means of electrical power, steam power, or by any other mechanical power which may be available, or by means of haulage with wire ropes, cables, chains, or other appliances." The corporation contend that to introduce this object into the petitioners' memorandum of association would be to run counter to the Act of Parliament, that is to say, the Glasgow Street Tramways Act, 1870, by which the tramways now vested in the corporation were established. By the 26th section of that Act it is provided that "all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by animal power only." The corporation state that Parliament has hitherto refused its sanction to the use of mechanical power on tramways formed on the streets of Glasgow, and they contend that if the employment of any other than horse power is to be sanctioned, the right to use such power should be vested in them as the proprietors of the tramways and conservators of the streets of the city in the public interest, and not in companies or persons whose interest in the streets must necessarily be limited in character and duration, and in some respects antagonistic to the interests of the public.

It appears to me that this is an objection which is not relevant to any question which we are here required to consider. It seems to me to proceed upon an entire misconception of what it is that the company proposes to do, and of what it is competent for them to do in the way of enlarging the scope of their business. It is quite manifest that no resolution of the company, and no confirmation of any resolution of theirs, can possibly vest in them the right to use mechanical power on the streets of Glasgow. If the effect of the Act of

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.
Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

Parliament has been correctly stated it is perfectly clear that nothing that the company can do will enable them to use mechanical power contrary to the provisions of the Act of Parliament. The only effect of their resolution, if it should be confirmed, will be that it will remove a disability which is entirely personal to the company themselves. It will give them no right adverse to the corporation, and no power to do anything which is not at present perfectly lawful to any private company or individual, or to any association of persons who may choose to combine for the purpose of using mechanical power, and set forth that purpose in a memorandum of association registered under the Companies Acts. Therefore it seems to me that the apprehension of the corporation is entirely without foundation. The resolution, if confirmed, will enable the company to make contracts with the corporation, or with any other persons who may be entitled to authorise, or who may hereafter be entitled to authorise, the use of mechanical power on tramways in Glasgow or its vicinity, but it will do nothing more. I do not know whether it may not be that the company has this power already. It does not appear that they are expressly limited by their memorandum of association to the use of animal power only, but it may very well be that they are so limited by implication, because they have come into existence, according to the constitution contained in the present memorandum, for certain specified purposes only, which may perhaps be held to exclude the use of tramways by other than animal power. One can quite understand therefore why they should think it proper to take in express terms this power of using mechanical means in case they should be enabled, by the confirmation of their resolutions, to carry on a more extensive business than they do at present.

The other objection to the proposed resolutions which the corporation have stated is this,—they say that the tramway company are bound to them, in the first place, under very large pecuniary obligations, and in the second place, under an obligation to devote their whole capital, energy, and resources exclusively to the tramways constructed by the corporation, and at present leased by the company, and therefore, the corporation contend, it would be contrary to the conditions of their contract, if the company undertook, or were allowed to undertake, a different business in which they might employ some portion of the capital and resources which the corporation say ought to be devoted exclusively to their service. Now, the lease certainly does impose very heavy obligations upon the company, and secures to the corporation in the public interest very important rights. But it appears to me that all these obligations of the company to the corporation are already very amply secured. They are secured by the terms of the lease itself, and by the conduct of the business which has followed upon the lease in the execution of its terms.

In the first place the lease provides, in its 11th clause, that the company should be required to invest a sum of not less than £60,000 in the purchase of heritable property, to be conveyed to the corporation in security of the obligations of the lease in their favour, and in the second place, in order to secure the performance of the company's obligation to maintain the tramways, and to run cars upon them for the benefit of the community—to carry on their business fairly for the benefit of the community—there are a number of very stringent stipulations in the lease which appear to me to put the corporation in a very secure position indeed as against the company, and therefore on a consideration of the objections which have been stated on behalf of the corporation with reference to the provisions of the lease, I am disposed to think that—throwing out of account one special stipulation to which I shall advert immediately—the corporation is so amply secured that it would not be proper to refuse to sanction what are in themselves most reasonable alterations in the memorandum of association upon the ground of any interest which the corporation may have. The company state that the pecuniary obligations undertaken by them to the corporation have amounted in all to something less than £30,000 per annum on the average of the last five years; that this has been duly paid hitherto, and that for the three and a-half years of the lease which are still to run the total sum to be paid by them to the corporation, on this average, will not exceed £105,000. They then further state that, in terms of clause 11 of the lease, they have conveyed to the corporation heritable property to the value of £129,232 in security of the obligations undertaken by them in the lease. Now, in answer to these statements, the corporation admit that the pecuniary obligations of the company amount to the sum mentioned, and that they have hitherto been paid, but they go on to say, "quoad ultra not known, and not admitted." Now, I cannot take that as a denial of the statement which the company make that the corporation hold under absolute disposition property of the petitioners of much greater value than the lease required, and amply sufficient to secure these obligations. The respondents may not be prepared to admit the exact figures stated in the condescendence. But they must of course know whether the statement is true or false to the general effect I have mentioned, and if they intended to deny it they should have done so in terms. They have not asked for any inquiry upon that point, and therefore I take it that upon record the corporation admit that statement. It appears to me therefore that the pecuniary obligations which the company have undertaken to the corporation are amply secured.

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891.
Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

But then there remains the special stipulation to which I have referred, which seems to me to raise a question of some difficulty.

The contract of lease imports an obligation which in effect comes to this, that the company are bound to apply their whole capital of at least £200,000 exclusively to the purposes of the Glasgow tramways, and it is said that if they are allowed to enlarge the purposes of their business in the manner proposed they would be induced—or at all events enabled—in breach of their obligation, to devote some part of their capital to purposes foreign altogether to their original constitution. Now, there no doubt may be a question of construction upon the contract as to whether that is or is not too rigorous a reading of the obligation, or whether, on the other hand, the obligation is not satisfied by the company having already devoted to the purposes of the corporation tramways a much larger amount of capital than the minimum mentioned in the memorandum. But if there be any such question, I should not regard this as a proper process in which to determine it. On the contrary, I think that the objection is one which must be considered upon the assumption that the construction of the contract maintained by the corporation is the true construction, and that no part of the original capital can be applied to any purpose which is not authorised by the original memorandum. Therefore, the question comes to be whether this obligation with the others is sufficiently secured. There may be something to be said for the view taken by the company that the obligation is sufficiently secured already, but I think that we are relieved of the difficulty of determining that question, which is not without some delicacy, by the proposal which was made by the company at the bar during the course of the debate. They

No. 135.

Mar. 13, 1891. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., Limited, v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

stated that they were willing to undertake that during the subsistence of the lease they should not call up capital to be applied to any purposes except the purposes of the lease. If the company are willing to give that undertaking, and to make it a condition of their resolutions being confirmed, I am of opinion that all the resolutions ought to be confirmed, except the portion of the first resolution to which I previously referred.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD ADAM concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent at the advising, but LORD ADAM intimated that his Lordship concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Confirm the proposed alteration of the petitioners' memorandum of association except in so far as regards the power to promote and dispose of tramways contained in the 10th article, and in so far as regards the 14th article thereof, but under the condition that the uncalled-up capital should be applied solely to the purposes of the existing lease."

MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—T. J. GORDON & FALCONER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 136.

Mar. 17, 1891. Forbes v. Whyte.

SIMON FORBES, Pursuer.—Dickson.
GEORGE WHYTE, Defender.—Party.

Expenses—Party conducting his own case.—Held that a party to an action residing at a distance from the seat of the Court who conducts his own case personally and is found entitled to expenses is not entitled to charge against the opposite party anything in respect of personal expenses while absent from his home attending the litigation.

Opinions that he is not entitled to charge for his trouble and loss of time.

1ST DIVISION. C.

IN the action reported supra, p. 182, Whyte, the respondent, was found entitled to expenses, and his account was remitted to the Auditor for taxation.

From the account, it appeared that the case was discussed before the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber on 9th and 10th October 1890, that there was a discussion before the First Division in the Single Bills on 28th October, and that the case was disposed of on the merits on 28th November. Whyte, who throughout appeared personally, charged nothing in lieu of professional fees, either to counsel or agents, for these discussions. His account was made up as follows:—(1) Railway and cab fares incurred by him in coming from and returning to Aberdeen to attend the two earlier discussions, and in coming from and returning to London on the occasion of the last discussion; (2) "personal expenses in Edinburgh," at the rate of £1, 11s. 6d. a-day, for nine days in all; and (3) "days from business in Aberdeen" (or "in London"), at the rate of £3, 3s. a-day, for nine days in all. There was a further sum of £3, 6s. 10d. of expenses of audit, which was incurred to Whyte's agent. The total amount of the account was £55, 6s. 4d.

The Auditor taxed off the sum of £44, 12s. 6d., allowing only a sum of £3, 3s. under the head of "engaged from business in Aberdeen," in respect of the discussion in the Bill-Chamber, and of £1, 1s. and £3, 3s. under the corresponding heads charged for the later discussions. He also allowed the audit expenses, and further allowed an addition under that head of £1, 7s. 8d., making a total allowed of £12, 1s. 6d.*

* In a note the Auditor stated that he had been informed that the respondent was a commercial traveller in London, that he (the respondent) "states his Whyte lodged objections to the report. No. 136.

Mar. 17, 1891. Forbes v. Whyte.

LORD ADAM.—We have here a note of objections by George Whyte to the Auditor's report on his account of expenses in a petition for the sequestration of his estates. Whyte conducted his own case, and being successful, was found entitled to expenses. He lodged an account of these expenses, amounting in all to £55, 6s. 4d., of which sum the Auditor has taxed off £44, 12s. 6d., and has added on a small sum of £1, 7s. 8d., bringing out a balance of £12, 1s. 6d. due to Whyte.

In his report, the Auditor explains the principle upon which he has proceeded in these terms,—"My view is that he"—that is Whyte—"is not entitled to professional fees, but only to a reasonable allowance for his trouble, and that having elected to conduct his case personally, in place of employing counsel and agent in the usual way, he is not entitled to charge more than if he were resident at the seat of the Court."

Mr Whyte's objection practically comes to this. He says that he is entitled to all of what he calls outlays and other charges—his railway fares and other expenses in the coming to Edinburgh from Aberdeen and from London, his personal expenses while in Edinburgh during the discussions on the petition at the rate of £1, 11s. 6d. per day, and a sum of three guineas per day for the time when he was detained from business in consequence of his attendance in the Court.

Now, for myself, I should require further consideration before I could hold that when a person conducts his own case he is entitled to any remuneration at all for his trouble in the matter. If he is entitled to anything in name of outlay, I think it must be of the most moderate description; but for a party who is living at a distance to come here each time the case is in the roll and conduct his own case personally, and then charge substantial sums for outlay, personal expenses and loss of time, is absurd. The Auditor has allowed about £12 as being a reasonable allowance to Mr Whyte. As I have said, I doubt whether anything at all should be allowed, but we cannot consider that from the way in which the matter comes before the Court, the other party not having lodged a note of objections. All we can do is to repel Mr Whyte's objections, which I am of opinion we ought to do.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that a person who conducts his own case is not entitled to remuneration for trouble and loss of time incurred in consequence of his having elected to attend the Court personally. I am therefore not prepared to affirm the principle on which the Auditor appears to proceed.

Nor, as at present advised, am I prepared to allow a person conducting his own case anything for his personal expenses, railway fares, hotel bills, and so on.

---

expenses on this footing, that he is entitled to charge his travelling expenses to and from his place of residence for the time, with personal expenses at 31s. 6d. per day, and an allowance of £3, 3s. per day for time detained from business. My view is that he is not entitled to professional fees, but only to a reasonable allowance for his trouble, and that having elected to conduct his case personally, in place of employing counsel and agent in the usual way, he is not entitled to charge more than if he were resident at the seat of the Court."

No. 136. Mar. 17, 1891. Forbes v. Whyte.

But as no objection is taken by the other party to the Auditor's report, we may give decree for the sum which the Auditor has allowed.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I agree that a litigant conducting his own case is not entitled to any compensation for time and trouble, and I participate in your Lordship's doubt whether such litigant is entitled to more than his judicial outlays—that is to say, his outlays in connection with the fees of Court, and outlays of that description.

But in any case, I am clear that such litigant is not entitled to more than a reasonable allowance for his outlays, judicial and extrajudicial. And it seems to me that, in the whole circumstances of this case, the sum here allowed by the Auditor fairly represents such reasonable allowance.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR were absent.

THE COURT repelled the objections, and decerned for the sum found due by the Auditor.

ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 137. Mar. 17, 1891. Hall v. Hall.

ALEXANDER HARVEY HALL AND OTHERS, First Parties.—Johnston—Rankine.

ANNIE MARGARET HALL, Second Party.—Low *—Dickson.

Succession—Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.—Held (by a majority of the whole Court, diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) that the implied conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit does not apply to provisions by a testator in favour of his brothers and sisters.

WHOLE COURT M.

MISS WILLIAMINA ANNE SCOTT, of Campfield, died at Aberdeen on 23d October 1889, leaving a disposition and settlement, dated 14th June 1844 by which she conveyed her estate of Campfield and others, therein particularly specified, and generally her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to her mother Mrs Anne Hall, and her stepfather Mr Harvey Hall, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver in liferent, but for her or his liferent use allenarly, and "to the children of their marriage, equally between them in fee." She further directed that, failing any more particular arrangement by herself, Mrs Hall and Mr Hall should have power to apportion the lands and estate of Campfield "among the children of their marriage in such way and manner, and according to such proportions as they or the survivor shall judge proper."

When she executed the disposition and settlement, Miss Scott was twenty-one years of age, and had no brothers or sisters, or their descendants, of the full blood living, but had alive six brothers and sisters uterine, the children of the marriage between her mother, Mrs Hall, and her stepfather, Mr Harvey Hall. No other children were subsequently born of the said marriage.

Mr and Mrs Hall both predeceased Miss Scott. Of her brothers and sisters uterine, four predeceased her, three without issue, and one John Robert Hall leaving an only child, Annie Margaret Hall, who was born on 16th August 1864.

This was a special case to which the parties were Alexander Harvey Hall and Mrs Anne Hall or Lancey (with consent of her husband), the surviving brother and sister uterine of the testatrix, Miss Scott, of the first part, and Annie Margaret Hall, the only child of John Robert Hall,

* Mr Low was of counsel for the second party, and signed the minute of debate, prior to his elevation to the bench.

No. 137.

Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

of the second part, for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the question,—"Whether the second party, as coming in place of her deceased father or otherwise, is entitled to one-third of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, of the late Williamina Anne Scott, of Campfield, under her disposition and settlement?"

The second party maintained that she, as coming in place of her deceased father, was entitled to take one-third of the whole estate under the destination in the deed, or under the implied conditio si sine liberis decesserit. The first parties maintained that the second party was not entitled to any share of the estate.

After a hearing before the Second Division, the case was appointed to be laid before the whole Court with minutes of debate.

In their minute the first parties argued;—The claim of the second party was founded alternatively on the destination in the deed or on the implied conditio si sine liberis. The former alternative must rest on the argument that the words "children of the marriage" included grandchildren, issue of a predeceasing child. That contention ran counter to the whole course of decision both here and in England.[1] Such an extension of the term "children" was inadmissible, at least where persons survived, as here, to whom the term in its natural sense was applicable. If the second party had had brothers and sisters it would have involved a claim on the part of all of them, as well as herself, to share along with their uncle and aunt per capita. Lastly, it was inconsistent with the power of appointment in the deed in which the testatrix gave her own interpretation of the word "children," for the objects of the power were declared to be the "children" of her mother and stepfather, and such a power could not competently be exercised in favour of grandchildren.[2]

The substantial ground of the second party's claim was the conditio si sine. The question was whether the application of the conditio was to be restricted to cases in which the person or persons expressly instituted as objects of a testator's bounty were so related to him that he was either their direct ascendant (parens) or stood technically in loco parentis to them, or whether it was to be extended to the class of cases in which the testator, though not in matter of relationship in loco parentis, had in a more popular sense placed himself by the provisions of his will in loco parentis to the objects of his bounty.

The doctrine of the conditio, at least in its modern development, seemed to be peculiar to the law of Scotland. It was founded on three obscure passages in the Corpus Juris Civilis.[3] It appeared from these texts that the conditio was regarded as applicable only where the testator was an ascendant of the person instituted. Within that relation John Voet was willing to allow the condition ample scope, since he was of opinion that it would apply even in the case of a natural child. But in regard to collaterals, he said, "Non etiam tacite haec subaudienda conjectura si . . . collaterales sunt quorum intuitu non tanta, quanta quidem respectu descendentium, pietatis, indeque natæ conjecturæ, ratio est."[4] Further, he held that the conditio did not apply if the favoured person or persons were known by the testator to have children. It thus appeared

[1] Rhind's Trustees v. Leith, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 104, 39 Scot. Jur. 120; Lowen v. Lewis, 9 App. Cas., 890, 915.

[2] Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees, July 4, 1885, 12 R. 1230.

[3] D. 35, 1, 102; C. 6, 25, 6; C. 6, 42, 30; see Blair's Executors v. Taylor, Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362, at pp. 365 and 367.

[4] Ad Pand. 36, 1, 17 to 23; see Earl of Lauderdale v. Royle's Executors, May 19, 1830, 8 S. 771; Martin's Trustees v. Milliken, Dec. 24, 1864, 3 Macph. 326, 37 Scot. Jur. 155.

No. 137.

Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

that the Scots Courts had carried the doctrine much further than the authorities on which it unquestionably was originally founded. The conditio seemed to be unknown in England, apart from the Wills Act of 1837,* which gave a statutory remedy of a somewhat analogous character, but confined it to the settlement of an ascendant.

The phrase in loco parentis was familiar in another department of Scots law. The general rule being that marriage might lawfully be entered into between persons who were seconds in blood, and between persons related in a more remote degree, according to the notation of the Canon law, it would have followed that uncle and niece, aunt and nephew, grand-uncle and grandniece, &c., might lawfully intermarry, had it not been for the further rule that persons were within the forbidden degrees if one of them stood in loco parentis to the other; that was where he or she was brother or sister to a direct ascendant of the other party.[1] It was probably this analogy between the disability of ascendants and descendants, and of persons holding this relation, that suggested the extension of the conditio beyond the line of direct descent.[2] If the doctrine was to be extended beyond cases in which the testator stood, in this strict sense, in loco parentis to his beneficiaries, that could only be by eliminating relationship altogether from the consideration, and deducing the applicability of the conditio solely from the nature and provisions of the particular settlement.

Certain general rules might be gathered from the authorities. (a) The duty of the Court was to discover, if it could, from the terms of a settlement, what was the intention of the testator. To give effect to the conditio was ex hypothesi to insert a clause or term in the settlement which did not appear on the face of it. Two theories had been put forth to explain the ratio of thus exceptionally dealing with the ænixa voluntas of a testator. One was that he really meant the inclusion of issue of a predeceasing object of his bounty by the use of the words to be found in his will; the other, that he inadvertently forgot the possibility of the predecease, and would, had he thought of it, have certainly provided for it in express terms. It was here immaterial which of those views, or whether either of them, was sound. It was enough that there must be some limit imposed on this presumption of intention; otherwise, the cardinal rule of lapse of a legacy through the death of a legatee or beneficiary before the death of the testator, or before the vesting of the bequest, would be reduced to a nullity. (b) One mode in which the scope of the conditio was restricted was brought about by the general, if not universal, rule that there must be no proper delectus personæ in the bequest.[3] That principle explained the subordinate rules, that the settlement must be a general one, and of the nature of a family settlement, and that the bequest must be devised to a class. The doctrine of delectus personæ applied with much force where there was a special conveyance, but that circumstance was not conclusive against the application of the conditio.[4] Nor was it necessary to call the whole class in order to let in the presumption; nor that all the persons favoured should belong to the same class; nor that

* 1 Vict. cap. 26, sec. 33.

[1] 1 Fraser, Husband and Wife, 119.

[2] See Hamilton v. Hamilton, Feb. 8, 1838, 16 S. 478, per Lord Glenlee, at p. 487, 10 Scot. Jur. 263.

[3] Hamilton v. Hamilton, Feb. 8, 1838, supra; Fleming, 1798, M. 8111; Gillespie v. Mercer, March 8, 1876, 3 R. 561; Douglas' Executors, Feb. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 504, 41 Scot. Jur. 268; Bryce's Trustee, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722.

[4] Chancellor v. Mossman, July 19, 1872, 10 Macph. 995, 44 Scot. Jur. 557.

the members of the class should be benefited equally.[1] (c) The other mode in which the application of the conditio was restricted was found, it was submitted, in the rule whereby it was confined to cases where the testator either was an ascendant (parens) or stood strictly in loco parentis to the persons called to share in the inheritance.

The doctrine of the conditio was first recognised in 1738 in the case of Montrose Magistrates v. Robertson,[2] where the destination was in the direct line. The first case in which the doctrine was applied beyond the line of direct descent was M'Kenzie v. Holte's Legatees in 1781.[3] It appeared from the Session Papers in that case that the beneficiaries instituted were the children of two sisters and of a niece of the testator's husband, and that the testator was disposing of property which had come to her from him, and which she apparently regarded herself as bound to dispose of in favour of his nearest relatives. So that substantially the testatrix stood in loco parentis to the children, and was making for her husband a family settlement. The case of Wallace v. Wallace in 1807[4] contained the first formal statement of the restriction now in question. The testator left the residue of his estate to the children of a nephew that might be in life at the decease of the longest liver of the testator and his spouse, with a survivorship clause. The nephew and his eldest son died before the date of payment, but the latter left a child, who was therefore great-grandnephew of the testator. The decision was that the testator's great-grandnephew was, in place of his deceased father, entitled to a share of the residue along with the surviving children of his nephew. The successful argument proceeded on the presumed will of the testator, as involving the conditio si sine liberis; and the argument to the contrary was that the presumption of the conditio only held in the case of direct descendants, and where the testator was properly in loco parentis—neither of which relations was, it was contended, to be found in the circumstances of the case. The cases of M'Kenzie and Wallace were strongly founded upon in Christie v. Paterson.[5] That decision, so far as was known, was the only example of a divergence from the rule of practice which had confined the application of the conditio to cases in which the testator was either parens or strictly in loco parentis to the persons instituted. The persons there called were cousins-german. One of them predeceased the testator leaving issue, and that issue was held entitled to the share which would have fallen to their mother had she survived. The Lord Ordinary rested his decision on the cases of M'Kenzie and Wallace. He was followed by Lord Hermand,[6] by the Lord President, and by Lord Gillies, but Lords Balgray and Succoth differed; and Lord Balgray explained the case of Wallace as depending on the will being a complete family settlement by a testator, who stood, as it were, in loco parentis, and declined to hold that the conjectura pietatis ruled the case in hand. The case of Hamilton v. Hamilton in 1838 was important on account of the dicta which fell from some of the Judges.[7] In Thomson's Trustees v. Robb[8] the conditio was held to [1] Halliday, Nov. 9, 1869, 8 Macph. 112, 42 Scot. Jur. 65; Magistrates of Montrose v. Robertson, 1738, M. 6398; Wood, 1789, M. 13,043; Bogie's Trustees v. Christie, Jan. 26, 1882, 9 R. 453.

[2] M. 6398.

[3] M. 6602.

[4] M. Clause, App. No. 6.

[5] July 5, 1822, F. C. 667, 1 S. (N. E.) 498.

[6] But see Lord Hermand in Neilson, June 4, 1822, F. C. 619.

[7] 16 S. 478, see particularly Lord Glenlee, p. 487.

[8] July 10, 1851, 13 D. 1326, 23 Scot. Jur. 620.

No. 137. Mar. 17, 1891. Hall v. Hall.

apply to a gift to the family of a sister, called generally, and a nephew and niece nominatim. In Martin's Trustees v. Milliken[1] Lord Barcaple decided, and Lords Cowan and Neaves were of opinion, that the conditio could not be applied in favour of the children of a legatee described as "the natural son of my brother." Rhind's Trustees v. Leith[2] was a case in which it was sought to apply the conditio to a gift to the testator's cousins-german. The claim was rejected, on the ground that the cousin whose child claimed had not survived the date of the settlement, and so the parent not having been instituted, there could be no conditional institution of the child. But Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis[3] in that case doubted the case of Christie v. Paterson as an authority for extending the conditio to cousins. In several recent decisions, in which the conditio was applied in favour of the children or descendants of nephews or nieces of the whole or half blood, it was distinctly assumed to be necessary that the testator should stand in loco parentis to the parties instituted in his will.[4] In Bogie's Trustees v. Christie[5] the Lord President thus explained what was meant by a testator placing himself in loco parentis:—"It does not mean that the uncle has during his life occupied such a position as treated his nephews and nieces with that kindness which a parent would shew to his children; what is meant is, that in his settlement he has placed himself in a position like that of a parent toward the legatee—that is to say, that he has made a settlement in their favour similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make." This, however, was merely a qualification of the doctrine, which had admittedly been settled by a long series of decisions, that the conditio was, as a general rule, applicable to cases of settlements made by uncles or aunts on nephews or nieces—in other words, by persons who stood, according to the more technical sense of the words, in loco parentis to the object of their bounty.

In Blair's Executors v. Taylor[6] the question now at issue was more thoroughly canvassed than in any other case. The main distinctions between that case and the present were that there the testator was full brother to the persons whom he favoured in his will, and that, though he called all of his brothers and sisters, he did so nominatim, not in general terms. But neither of these specialties seemed to have been decisive in leading the majority of the Court to the conclusion that the conditio did not apply. The Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff and Lord Neaves rested their judgment mainly, if not exclusively, upon the view that the testator did not stand in loco parentis, and Lord Ormidale did not differ. Lord Gifford, who dissented, admitted that the cases which alone were attended with difficulty were those in which a bequest was made, not to strangers nominatim, nor to children or descendants, but to collateral relatives either by name or as a class, and that there it was very difficult to lay

[1] Dec. 24, 1864, 3 Macph. 326, 37 Scot. Jur. 155.

[2] Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 104, 39 Scot. Jur. 120.

[3] 5 Macph. p. 111; see also Douglas' Executors, Feb. 5, 1867, 7 Macph. 504, 41 Scot. Jur. 268, per Lord President Inglis, pp. 507-8, and per Lord Benholme, p. 509.

[4] Aitken v. Wright, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 275, 44 Scot. Jur. 164; Irvine v. Irvine, July 9, 1873, 11 Macph. 892, 45 Scot. Jur. 546; Nicol v. Nicol's Executor, Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 374; Gillespie v. Mercer, March 8, 1876, 3 R. 561; Gauld's Trustees v. Duncan, March 20, 1877, 4 R. 691; Bryce's Trustees, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722; see also M'Call v. Dennistoun, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 281, 44 Scot. Jur. 160, per Lord Deas at p. 284.

[5] Jan. 26, 1882, 9 R. 453; see also Berwick's Executor, Jan. 23, 1885, 12 R. 565, at p. 571.

[6] Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362.

No. 137.

Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

down a satisfactory principle. His Lordship further admitted that the conditio applied in general to bequests to nephews and nieces, and proceeded to figure circumstances in which a brother might be more in the position of parent to his brothers and sisters than an uncle to his nephews and nieces, and suggested that, even in the case of strangers in blood, such as an adopted father and son, the conditio might apply, and he concluded,—"It is dangerous to make a legal presumption that one person is in loco parentis to another. I rather think that this will always depend upon circumstances, apart from the case of direct descendants." This dissent of Lord Gifford shewed the strength and the weakness of the argument upon the other side. Those who maintained it were driven to abandon a legal presumption upon which a rule of some certainty had been based, without being able to substitute for it anything but the indefiniteness of circumstances. It was plain that the argument, if carried to its logical result, must eliminate relationship altogether from the consideration, for it could not stop at any particular degree of relationship. If so, they must bring the matter to this, either that the conditio si sine should be applied in all cases where a testator made a general settlement, or a general provision, in favour of a class, or they must allow extrinsic circumstances to weigh. It was submitted that in either view there would be a wide departure from the principles which have hitherto regulated the interpretation of settlements and a transition from judicial interpretations to mere conjecture. The presumption of intention involved in the doctrine of the conditio si sine had been extended beyond its original conception, but on definite and intelligible lines. On the other hand, the views expressed by Lord Gifford shewed forcibly the danger of indefinitely extending the doctrine beyond the intelligible limit which had hitherto (with one doubtful exception) been imposed upon it, viz., that in the case of collaterals the testator must not only have evinced the intentions of a parent in his will by granting what is substantially a family settlement, but also must be, in the technical sense, in loco parentis.

The second party argued in her minute;—It was well settled that "the conditio applies where the settlement is universal, where the beneficiaries are a class, where the provision is of the nature of a family settlement, and where the testator, if not a parent, is at all events in loco parentis to the beneficiaries."[1] In the present case the settlement was universal, was in favour of a class, and was of the nature of a family settlement; the only question therefore was whether, in the sense of the conditio, the testator was in loco parentis to the beneficiaries? In considering that question, it was not unimportant, in the first place, to see what was the principle upon which the conditio in its modern development rested. That principle had been laid down upon high authority to be the implied will of the testator. In the case of a provision by a parent to his children, the pietas paterna was itself sufficient to raise the implication. In the case of those who were not actually parents, the implied will was mainly to be gathered from the terms of the settlement—the fact that the settlement was universal, in favour of a class, and of the nature of a family provision, being, as already pointed out, the strongest indication of intention that children should take the share of a predeceasing parent.[2] Consistently with this principle, the conditio had been applied not only in favour of the children of descendants, but also in a long series of cases where provisions have been made by a testator in favour of collaterals.[1] In Nicol v. Nicol's Executors,[2] the conditio was held to apply to a bequest to the children of the testator's brothers uterine, though the testator had a brother of the full blood, to whom part of the estate was left. In M'Kenzie v. Legatees of Holte,[3] the rule was applied in a destination to strangers in blood, viz., to the children of the sisters of the testator's husband and of his niece. In Christie v. Paterson,[4] the principle was given effect to where the testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to "the children of the brothers and sisters" of his mother. But, while this decision had been apparently accepted as sound by several eminent Judges,[5] it had been disapproved of by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Rhind's Trustees v. Leith,[6] and by Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in Blair's Executors v. Taylor.[7] Christie v. Paterson was however a very different case from the present, because it dealt not with a universal settlement in favour of the testator's cousins, but with a bequest of residue only; further, the bequest was expressly limited to cousins "who shall be alive at the time of my death." It was true that the Lord President indicated the opinion that in no case could the conditio be applied when the relationship between the parties was that of cousins; but the ground upon which his Lordship disapproved of Christie's case was, that there the testator did not stand in loco parentis to the legatees, and that the will was not, properly speaking, a family settlement, both of which elements concurred in the case of Wallace, which that of Christie professed to follow. In the present case, it seemed too clear for argument that the terms of the settlement were sufficient to raise the implication of intention on the testator's part, that the issue of predeceasing children should take their parents' share, unless the relationship of the testator to the beneficiaries was such as to exclude the implication.

[1] Blair's Executors v. Taylor, Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362, per L. J.-C. Moncreiff, at p. 364.

[2] Dixon v. Dixon, Feb. 9, 1841, 2 Rob. App. 1, per Lord Brougham, p. 22; Grant's Trustees v. Grant, July 2, 1862, 24 D. 1211, per Lord Kinloch, Ordinary, p. 1221, per Lord President M'Neill, p. 1226, per Lord Deas, p. 1230; M'Call v. Dennistoun, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 281, 44 Scot. Jur. 160, per Lord Ardmillan, p. 285.

No. 137. Mar. 17, 1891. Hall v. Hall.

What then was meant by the term in loco parentis? It was submitted that the question whether the testator stood in loco parentis to the beneficiaries did not depend wholly or even chiefly upon actual relationship. If, in the whole circumstances, the granter might fairly be regarded as having put himself in that position towards the beneficiaries—that was to say, if he had made a settlement in their favour similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make, he would be held to have placed himself in loco parentis, so as to let in the conditio. Applying this test, it was submitted that the testator had clearly placed herself in loco parentis. If she had been an aunt, it must be admitted that the conditio would apply. Did the mere fact that she was an elder sister by a previous marriage necessitate a different construction being put

---

[1] Wallace v. Wallace's Trustees, M. voce "Clause," Appx. No. 6; Thomson's Trustees v. Robb, July 10, 1851, 13 D. 1326, 23 Scot. Jur. 620; Dennistoun v. Kinloch, supra; Bryce's Trustees, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722; Bogie's Trustees v. Christie, Jan. 26, 1882, 9 R. 453.

[2] Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 374.

[3] Feb. 2, 1781, M. 6602.

[4] July 5, 1822, 1 S. 543 (N. E. 498), 20 F. C. 687.

[5] Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle in Booths v. Black, 9 S. 406; Lords Cunningham and Fullarton in Thomson's Trustees v. Robb, supra; and Lord Ormidale in Gauld's Trustees v. Duncan, March 2, 1877, 4 R. 691.

[6] Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 104, 39 Scot. Jur. 120.

[7] Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362.

[8] Bogie's Trustees v. Christie, Jan. 26, 1882, 9 R. 453, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 455, and Lord Shand, p. 457; Blair's Executors v. Taylor, Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362, per Lord Gifford, at p. 373.

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

upon her family settlement? A man's nephews and nieces, if the children of a much older brother, might be all older than himself, or in positions which made it unreasonable to say that he was in loco parentis to them; on the other hand, an elder brother might be so much older than the other children as to make it reasonable to say that he was in loco parentis to them.[1]

Blair's Executors differed in all essential particulars from the present case. There the testator made his will when a young man about to leave the country, and settle as a merchant in Smyrna. By his will he left his whole estate to his father, and failing him by death, to his brothers and sisters nominatim. The question arose upon the death of the testator, thirty-five years afterwards, predeceased by his father and by two brothers who left issue. A majority of the Court held that the testator was not in loco parentis to his brothers and sisters, the true ground of judgment being that they were called only as conditional institutes, and were not called as a class, but nominatim. No doubt the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Neaves indicated the opinion that a person could not be in loco parentis to brothers and sisters; but that opinion was not necessary to the judgment, and was, it was humbly submitted, contrary to principle and authority. Here all the circumstances pointed to the testator having assumed the position of a parent to the beneficiaries instituted. She was, at the date of the settlement, twenty-one years of age, while the eldest beneficiary was only twelve. She describes herself as Miss Scott "of Campfield," and that estate, which formed by far the larger part of what was carried by the settlement, was primarily and specially conveyed, and it was declared that, failing "any more particular arrangement" by the testator, her mother and stepfather, being the parents of the beneficiaries, "or the survivors, shall have power to transfer, divide, and apportion Campfield, among the children of the marriage, as they or the survivor shall judge proper." Such a settlement, in which the testator left her whole estate to a class of very near relatives equally among them was, it was submitted, clearly a settlement "similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make," while the whole circumstances evinced that kind of personal affection for the beneficiaries which might fairly be regarded as analogous to the pietas paterna, so as to justify the conclusion that the testator had put herself in loco parentis to those who, though her brothers and sisters, were truly a younger generation.

The consulted Judges returned the following opinion:—

LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, LORD WELLWOOD, LORD KYLLACHY, LORD KINCAIRNEY, LORD STORMONTH-DARLING, LORD LEE.—The question referred to the consulted Judges arises under the testamentary disposition of Miss Williamina Anne Scott of Campfield, who conveyed her estate heritable and moveable to her mother, Mrs Anne Hall, and her stepfather, Mr Harvey Hall, in conjunct fee and liferent, for her or his liferent use allenarly, and to the children of their marriage in fee.

According to the terms of the disposition, the testamentary heirs of Miss Scott are Mr Alexander Harvey Hall and Mrs Lancey, the brother and sister uterine of the testator. But a share is claimed by Miss Annie Margaret Hall, the child of a deceased brother uterine of the testator, on the ground that the conditio si sine liberis decesserit ought, as she contends, to be read into the will, in the same manner as if this had been a will by a parent in favour of his children, or by a testator in favour of nephews and nieces to whom he had placed himself in loco parentis.

[1] Blair's Executor's v. Taylor, supra, per Lord Gifford, at p. 372.

No. 137. Mar. 17, 1891. Hall v. Hall.

As to the origin of the rule of law under which issue are held entitled to come in place of the parent without express words of institution, it is probably unnecessary to say more than that it was introduced on the authority of the Roman law, or by an analogical application of its principles.

But as the authority of the Roman law is referred to in the argument in favour of the extension of the rule in question to the present case, it may be pointed out that the law of Scotland which goes by the name of the "conditio si sine liberis" is by no means identical with the conditio of the Roman jurisprudence. While in one direction our Judges have sought to confine its application by means of the expression to be found in almost all the reported cases, that the benefit of the conditio is confined to persons to whom the testator placed himself in loco parentis, in another direction the rule of our law has a wider extension than that of the Roman system. Under our system, the liberi, or issue of the persons instituted, have the benefit of the implied condition in preference to next of kin of the testator. But the case treated in the Digest is the case of a gift to an institute with a conditional institution in favour of a stranger or remoter heir, in which case only it was considered that the testator would have preferred the issue of his immediate legatee to the stranger, if he had contemplated the case of the death of the legatee before the opening of the succession.

According to the principles of construction of wills which are now received and acted on, it is probable that we should not feel justified in introducing such a rule at all if the question were now to arise for the first time; for it must be admitted that the effect of the conditio is to import into the will something which is not there, although this is accomplished by means of an artificial rule of construction. The same reasons which raise a doubt as to the validity of the process by which the rule was originally introduced into our law ought, as we think, to incline the Court to refrain from extending the doctrine beyond the limits within which it has hitherto been confined by decisions and the practice following on decisions. To these general observations it may be added that in England the doctrine of the implied institution of children rests on statutory authority, and is confined in its operation to the descendants of the testator; and it has not been shewn to us that any writer of authority has advocated an extension of the principle beyond the admitted limits of its application in the law of Scotland.

It is plain enough that the Judges by whom the conditio si sine liberis was first admitted as a rule of construction had no intention of establishing it as a universal rule. The rule was first applied to the case of bequests by parents to children, and was afterwards extended to the relation of uncle and nephew, subject to this qualification, that it should appear from the will that the uncle had placed himself in loco parentis towards the objects of his gift; in other words, that he intended to make a family settlement.

Accordingly when, in the case of Rhind's Trustees v. Leith, it was proposed to apply the conditio to a bequest in favour of the testator's first cousin, it became necessary to fix a limit to the application of the rule, and the whole subject was considered from this point of view. It was seen that if the conditio was made general in its application, this would be equivalent to repealing the rule of law that a legacy lapses by the predecease of the legatee. It was found that with the doubtful exception of the case of Christie, there was no authority for applying the conditio to legacies in favour of collaterals; and it was pointed out by the Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis that the case of Christie was of little weight as an authority, because the case was determined by a majority of three to two, and Lord President Hope, who was in the majority, gave his decision not in accordance with his personal opinion on the point, but in deference to the supposed authority of the case of Wallace, which certainly does not touch the question of the extension of the conditio to collaterals.

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

It is true that in the case of Rhind's Trustees the claim made in virtue of the conditio must have failed on another ground, viz., that the parent of the claimant was not instituted. But this circumstance was in the view of the Judges who decided the case, and their decision is given with reference to the two questions. As an expression of judicial opinion, the case of Rhind is entirely adverse to the extension of the conditio to collaterals. But the history of the question at issue does not end here. In the case of Blair's Executors v. Taylor the question of the limits of the application of the conditio was again considered by the Second Division of the Court, the claim in this case being at the instance of the child of one of the testator's predeceasing brothers. The leading opinion was given by Lord Moncreiff, and was in accordance with that delivered by the present Lord President in the case of Rhind's Trustees. Lord Moncreiff, after reviewing the authorities and weighing all the reasons that had been urged in favour of the extension of the rule to the descendants of brothers and sisters, came to the conclusion that the children of the testator's brothers were not entitled to come into their parents' place as implied institutes. Lord Neaves and Lord Ormidale concurred, while Lord Gifford came to a different conclusion. The decision seems to be directly in point, and it has all the weight which is due to a carefully considered judgment of the majority of the Court.

Supposing the question to be open to reconsideration, we could not come to a different conclusion from that which is expressed in these decisions. It is not necessary to recapitulate the arguments which are set forth in the opinions there delivered. But it may be pointed out that the presumption on which the conditio si sine liberis is founded—viz., the supposed preference of the testator in favour of the issue of his legatees—is not necessarily consistent with fact. A childless testator may have considered in his own mind whether he ought to leave his fortune exclusively to his surviving brothers and sisters, or whether he ought to include nephews and nieces within the scope of his gift. This is a matter on which the views of testators may very naturally differ. But in the case supposed, if the testator did not mean to leave anything to the nephews and nieces, he would naturally suppose that he sufficiently expressed his wishes by passing them over. Few persons in making a will would wish to resort to the odious form of express disinherison, and it seems undesirable to establish a rule which would render it necessary for testators to use excluding words in order to accomplish their intentions. In the case of bequests to descendants, it is so usual to include the whole family that there is not much likelihood of the testator's true intention being defeated through the operation of the conditio. But it is not by any means so clear in the case of bequests to collaterals that the intention is to go beyond the immediate next of kin.

The case of uncle and nephew is perhaps intermediate ground. At all events, the rule is there established, with a limitation to the case of proper family settlements, containing no indication of a contrary intention.

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

We see no expediency in extending the rule either to gifts in favour of brothers and sisters, or to gifts in favour of cousins, and it is at least doubtful whether such extension, even if expedient, is altogether legitimate or within the province of a Court of construction. If the principle is to be further extended, it will be very difficult to find any other limit than the one indicated in the decisions, and the choice seems to be between confining it to the wills of parents or persons in loco parentis, and making the rule universal and thus rescinding the rule that a legacy lapses by the predecease of the legatee.

Our opinion accordingly is that the question in the special case ought to be answered in the negative.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The consulted Judges have in this case arrived at a unanimous decision, expressed in one opinion, in which I understand two of your Lordships concur. I regret that after full consideration it has been impossible for me to concur in the judgment which must follow upon that opinion. Had the question been entirely novel, I should have been willing to waive my own view in favour of that arrived at by so large a number of my brethren, so many of whom are senior to myself, and to have been guided by them in the decision of a novel question. But as I hold that the decision to be given in this case is a direct upsetting by the whole Court of what has been already in principle decided—and in my view rightly decided—I feel bound to express my own view to the effect that the former decision was sound, and ought not now to be departed from as a precedent.

In seeking for a definition of what is required in order to justify the Court in holding that the children of a beneficiary under a will shall take their parent's share, when the parent has predeceased the testator, although not mentioned as substitutes, I accept that which was laid down by my predecessor in this chair in the case of Blair's Executors. He specifies four elements as necessary—first that the settlement be universal; second, that the beneficiaries be a class; third, that the provision be of the nature of a family settlement; and fourth, that the testator, if not a parent, be at all events in loco parentis to the beneficiaries. It is certain that as regards the first three elements there can be no doubt. The testatrix in this case made a universal settlement. She was the sister uterine of the beneficiaries, her mother having married a second time, and they are pointed at not individually but as a class to which there might have been additions after the will was made. She was the member of the family who had means to dispose of, and for the love she bore to her mother she left all her estate in fee to her brothers and sisters, thus plainly making for her parents that family settlement which it would have been natural for them to make had they possessed the subject of the settlement.

What is the meaning of a family settlement? It means just this, that the testator was bestowing his gifts on all of a class, not because of the personal regard he had to each separately and individually, but because of his regard for the family generally, and his wish to favour all whether he knew them or not, or indeed whether they were in existence at the time of his executing his will or not. Whenever you have a will which it is natural for a testator to make from his relationship to the class favoured, you have a family settlement. These elements concur in this case.

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

The only remaining question therefore is, whether the testator was in loco parentis to those favoured by the will. What is the meaning of these words? I concur with the Lord President in the case of Bogie's Trustees that they do not mean that the testator has during his lifetime acted towards them in his intercourse with them as a parent would do. It is not necessary that he should have ever seen them at all at the time of his will being executed. The position must be ascertained from the will itself, in the light of the circumstances attending it. Has he, as the Lord President expresses it, "placed himself in a position like that of a parent towards the legatees—that is to say—made a settlement in their favour similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make." It appears to me that there can be no doubt whatever in this case that what the testatrix did was to make a family settlement exactly as described by the Lord President, viz., "similar to what a parent might have been presumed to make." Having therefore the three elements of family settlement, a universal settlement, and of settlement in favour of a class, and further of settlement such as a parent presumably would make, the question is narrowed down to a very simple one indeed. Is a sister uterine excluded by law from putting herself in loco parentis to the class of her brothers and sisters in dividing her estate among them? For it cannot be seriously suggested that every other element does not point in the direction of her having done so if it was not beyond her power by law.

The argument against the view that the in loco parentis element is possible in the case of so near a relative as a sister uterine seems to me to be one based on no principle. When once it is admitted that even during the lifetime of the actual parents a relative such as an uncle or aunt can in making a will act in loco parentis to a family, I can see no principle whatever which should debar a sister from doing the same. It cannot really depend upon a question of family ascendancy, for if it is the action in making the will which places the testator in the locus of parens, that is a place assumed, not in virtue of any right, but in order to fulfil a family purpose which the law holds to be natural. There cannot, I think, be any principle which should bar a member of the family from doing the part of a parent to the family in the way of provision merely because the member was not an actual ascendant in the family tree. The presumption is that the making of a family provision is from family affection, and no one would suggest that there is ground for holding that the purpose was less likely to exist in the case of a brother or sister than in the case of an uncle or aunt. In ordinary life the cases are many in which a brother or sister has to take up every duty of a parent that is possible to one not the actual parent. Once it is recognised that some relatives may by will put themselves in loco parentis to those not their own children, on what conceivable principle can it be held that the will of so near a relative as a brother or sister, though in every respect the same as that of the uncle or aunt, is not to be held to carry the same advantages to the children of predeceasing beneficiaries? The possible results are most anomalous. An uncle's gift to his nephews may pass by law to grandnephews, but a brother's gift to his brothers may not pass to their sons, his nephews, a generation nearer to him. Indeed, in the case of Wallace the rule was applied in favour of a great-grandnephew. I am unable to see any ground for such a distinction, by which one near relative is held to have included the children of those favoured and the other has not, although they have both expressed themselves in the same way and for the same general purpose. For it is intention that is in question. The intention to favour children of predeceasing institutes is implied by the law. What ground is there for not implying it in this case? None whatever that I can discover. It cannot surely be said that a brother or sister is less likely in making a family settlement to desire to favour the families of brothers and sisters than uncles or aunts to favour grandnephews and grandnieces. Indeed, the opposite is the more likely. Here, in this particular case, the place of parent as regards provision for the family is naturally and kindly taken by the sister. She was the member of the family who possessed the means, and was able to fulfil the duty of affection which generally rests upon the actual parent of providing for the family—that is, for the children of the family, and their children in the event of predecease, that being what the law holds that a natural parent will desire to do. The whole principle of the implication rests on the idea that natural duty would tend to a certain course of action, and that general words must be held to imply that which natural duty would dictate. The further implication in the case of other relatives than the natural parent is, that as they take upon themselves the fulfilment of the duty they take the place of the natural parent in that matter, and therefore must be held that they also desire that the same result should follow their general directions which would follow from similar directions of the parent himself. I am unable to find any principle upon which it is to be held that a brother or sister in taking up the natural duty and fulfilling it is not to be held to do so to the same effect by the same acts as would be held in the case of uncles and aunts.

No. 137. Mar. 17, 1891. Hall v. Hall.

The consulted Judges appear to be unable to find any principle, and to turn to expediency as a ground for refusing to give effect to the implication in the present case. They say—"We see no expediency in extending the rule, . . . and it is at least doubtful whether such extension, even if expedient, is altogether legitimate or within the province of a Court of construction." But the same opinion has already admitted that the rule of construction is "artificial." I therefore see no middle course between logically applying the artificial rule of construction, which is now undoubtedly a rule accepted, or to set it aside altogether. If the rule is to obtain at all, there is no expediency in limiting it arbitrarily, and the proposed limitation in this case I consider to be arbitrary in the highest degree. No case could be conceived in which a refusal to carry out the rule would be so arbitrary as the present case. The rule might in some cases have an effect different from that which the testator really intended. It certainly might be so in the case of an uncle or aunt. But there is no case, other than that of an actual parent, in which the presumptions are so strong in favour of the rule as that of a brother or sister. Therefore, if expediency is to come into consideration, it seems to me to be an incomprehensible view of expediency which holds it expedient to construe an uncle's will according to the rule and refuse to apply the rule to a brother's.

It may be asked, Where are you to stop? I am not troubled by that question. I hold that a decision in favour of the second party in this case would not extend the operation of the rule at all. I hold it to be a fortiori of the case of uncle and aunt, and I also hold that as the rule has been extended further already by the case of Christie, which was decided after much debate, the present decision is not an extension of the rule in any sense. The Judges in the majority in that case plainly held—and I agree with them—that the principle of the case of Wallace applied, and thus held distinctly that the limitation of the rule to cases in which there is ascendancy is unsound. They held that the logical result its application to the case in which the institute was a grandnephew was that it must apply also to cousins-german. Holding that decision to be right, I hold further, that a rule which has been extended to cousins-german must apply to a brother or sister uterine, always assuming that the latter comes in the position of parens in the settlement. There can be no logic in holding that a cousin-german can place himself in loco parentis to his cousin, and to deny the same power to a brother or sister uterine. I am aware that numerous criticisms have been made upon the decisions in Wallace and in Christie, to the effect that the case of Wallace was not a precedent justifying the decision in Christie. But it seems to me that the opinions of the majority in Christie were plainly based on the view that the question whether a testator put himself in loco parentis depended upon the expression of his will, and not at all upon the relation of ascendant or descendant. The Lord President in the case of Wishart v. Sturrock says that Wallace was not a precedent for Christie, because in Wallace the testator was in loco parentis to the persons favoured. But I read the case of Christie as meaning that the majority there held that the cousin put himself in loco parentis, and that it did not occur to them that a cousin was precluded from doing so merely because he was not an ascendant. In that view, which I hold to be sound, the case of Wallace was a precedent for the decision in Christie, and I see no reason to depart from what was decided in these cases. I do not think that the question, Where are you to stop? is to be an excuse for retrogression when no ground of equity, or even expediency, can be stated for going back. No evil has resulted from the decision in Christie, now seventy years old, and I see no reason for setting it aside, still less for giving a judgment contrary to it in a case which is a fortiori of it.

In saying what I have now said regarding the case of Christie, I do not overlook the decision in the case of Rhind's Trustees. If the question in this case related to a will by a cousin, I might feel myself bound by the decision in Rhind's case until it was reconsidered, and I admit that the opinions of the consulted Judges make it plain that no different result could be expected. But this case does not relate to cousins, and having been sent to the whole Court, I presume each of us is bound to express his own opinion without being bound by previous decisions, and in that view I have expressed my opinion after considering the cases but without feeling bound to follow them.

One other ground is stated in the opinion of the consulted Judges for the judgment they propose, to which it is necessary to refer, viz., that the application of the rule imposes upon a testator who does not desire that the children of predeceasing beneficiaries should succeed the necessity of resorting to what their Lordships call the "odious form of express disinherison." I do not understand the reasoning which makes any such consideration a ground for restricting the operation of an admitted principle. I do not understand how the expression of a testator's will can be odious if that which it expresses is not odious in itself. There can be nothing odious in a testator expressing his will in such form as shall prevent persons being favoured whom he is under no actual obligation to favour and does not desire to favour. It looks rather as if the consulted Judges thought that it would be an odious thing to exclude children from the benefit of a legacy to their parent, and that the expression of it in the will would be the expression of something odious, and that therefore it will be better to hold the odious thing done without its being expressed. If that is not what was intended by the reasoning, I am unable to understand what it is. But the view is, in my opinion, baseless. In no case would any such form—if odious—be necessary. The opinion of the consulted Judges expresses distinctly the doctrine that to whatever limit the conditio is to apply, it is only to apply in those cases in which the testator has placed himself by his will in loco parentis to the objects of his favour. He has therefore only to express himself so as to exclude the idea of his having placed himself in the position of parens to exclude the operation of the rule of construction, and thus avoid the odium which their Lordships seem to fear will be incurred by testators if the rule be applied in accordance with the decision in Christie.

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

Being unable to follow the views expressed by the consulted Judges, either upon principle or expediency, I must express my dissent from the judgment which must follow upon the opinion they have expressed.

LORD YOUNG.—This case was heard and referred to the whole Court for decision last summer, when I think Lord Lee was a member of this Court. So far as my memory serves me, I was opposed to that step, because it appeared to me that the question in the case might be decided upon the terms of the will, and without going into the troublesome and difficult questions that might arise on considering the conditio si sine liberis and the authorities on that doctrine.

The will is simple in its conception, although it is at the same time rather special. The lady whose settlement is here in dispute was a child of the first marriage of her mother, and she lived long enough to see her marry again and have another family. So long ago as 1844 she executed a disposition and settlement in favour of her mother and stepfather in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee. It so happened that at the date of the settlement all the children of the second marriage who were to be the ultimate beneficiaries were born, but it might have been otherwise—there might have been no children born of the marriage, and it would have been perfectly within her right to give the whole of her estate to her mother and stepfather in liferent and to the children of the marriage in fee, and although she had died before any of the children were born the will would have been effectual to carry the fee to any who were born afterwards.

A good deal is said in the minutes of debate about imputing intentions to the testator which he has not expressed. Nothing is more familiar; indeed few wills could be construed without implying a great deal that is not expressed in them. When a will says nothing about the term of vesting, the Court will imply a term of vesting—usually that vesting takes place a morte testatoris because as no one can have a claim to take anything under the provisions of the will unless he was intended to take a vested interest, anything which is given must be held as given on the consideration that the thing is meant to vest in the person at a particular period; but that result can only be reached by construction, if the will says nothing as to the term of vesting. Another familiar case of implied will occurs where a gift is so expressed as to be given to persons not by name but by description; it is there implied as a general rule that the will intends those to take who answer the description at the death of the testator. But instances of implying what is not expressed in a will or settlement are numerous, and I need not dwell further on them.

Now, I think that here no question as to the application of the conditio si sine liberis properly arises. The learned Judges whom we consulted seem to think that the only alternative is to admit the conditio or allow the legacy to lapse

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

Their Lordships refer to the case of Rhind's Trustees v. Leith as implying this. They say—"It was seen that if the conditio was made general in its application this would be equivalent to repealing the rule of law that a legacy lapses by the predecease of the legatee." Rhind's Trustees, I may observe, cannot be regarded as a binding authority upon the conditio, because as their Lordships point out, the claim there made in virtue of the conditio must have failed on another ground—viz., that the parent of the claimant was not instituted. So that in Rhind's Trustees we have merely obiter dicta but no judgment. Again the learned Judges at the close of their opinion say—"If the principle is to be further extended, it will be very difficult to find any other limit than the one indicated in the decisions, and the choice seems to be between confining it to the wills of parents or persons in loco parentis, and making the rule universal, and thus rescinding the rule that a legacy lapses by the predecease of the legatee." Well, if a legacy is so given that the subject of it if not effectually given will fall into residue or intestacy, that may or may not be a case which would fall under the conditio. If a man makes a provision in his settlement to A B, and A B predeceases him, then the gift lapses unless the conditio applies and A B has left issue. If the conditio applies, and A B has left issue, the falling into residue or the intestacy will be prevented, the conditio of the residuary gift or the intestacy being that the institute shall die sine liberis.

But here I venture to say we have no question about the gift lapsing. The provision that the fee of the whole estate shall go to and be divided equally among the children of the marriage stands and must have effect. The question before us is whether the meaning of the word "children," as we shall be judicially satisfied in regard to its proper meaning, comprehends "grandchildren," and that in my opinion is the only question. If the meaning comprehends "grandchildren," or if we shall be satisfied that it does not comprehend them, there is equally an end to the matter.

Now, when this daughter gives her whole estate to her mother and to her stepfather in liferent, and to the children of the marriage in fee, and further empowers her mother or the survivor of the marriage to distribute it among the children of the marriage as seems proper to them, I am of opinion that in such a case the meaning of the word "children" does include grandchildren. I think that she made this gift of her estate as a family provision to her parents' children, enabling her mother or her mother's husband to divide it among the children of the marriage as if it had been their own, and if they had divided this estate among their children, dealing with it as their own, I think that the word children would have been held to include grandchildren. That is the result which I have reached looking to the ordinary custom of this country, the good sense of the will, and the disposition of the testatrix as it appears in the deed. It is always legitimate to look at such considerations in construing wills, and the reasoning which estimates the intention of the testatrix in this settlement as being according to the ordinary good feelings of the people of this country in such matters leads me to give the same meaning to the word children in this settlement as if it had been used by the father of the children himself in his own settlement.

But the general question of the conditio has been raised, and the learned Judges have given their opinion upon it; it is therefore right that I should indicate my opinion upon the matter.

I shall suppose that this is a provision by one sister to another. One sister

No. 137.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Hall v. Hall.

may very well have a sister twenty years younger than herself to whom she has acted the part of a mother for the greater part of her life. Well, she makes a will giving this sister the whole estate she possesses. She has other relatives, —other brothers and sisters it may be—but she prefers to give her whole estate to one of them, her favourite sister. It is manifestly given from what may be called pietas materna, the mother-like feeling which the testatrix has to her sister twenty years younger than herself. The question is, if this younger sister should predecease her leaving issue, does what was intended for her go to her issue, or is it divided among the other brothers and sisters of the testatrix? In considering that question we are not entering upon a new field. The question has been considered and a conclusion reached in the case of a settlement by a father or mother in favour of their children; it has been considered, and a conclusion reached, in the case of an uncle or aunt giving a gift to a nephew or niece, and the question has been considered and the conclusion has been reached, not on the consideration of any rule positivi juris or of the provisions of any statute, but, as I have said, on the considerations which commend themselves as being right and proper according to the customs and feelings of the people of this country in such matters. Can you, with any regard to sound reason and sense, reach in such a case as I have put any other conclusion than that which has already been reached in the other cases to which I have referred? To my mind it is impossible to reach any other conclusion. I do not think that to apply the rule to this case would be to extend the principle; it would merely be to apply the same argument under the same circumstances. There is nothing suggested in the opinion of the learned Judges that will distinguish this case in principle from the cases in which the conditio has been held to apply. The question to be determined here is, whether the argument employed in these cases will lead to one result at one time and to another result at another? I think not. In those cases to which the conditio applies it has been put on the ground that the testator presumably had the same affection for the child of his child or for the child of his niece that he had for his own child or for his niece herself. It cannot be put on any other ground. I confess it appears to me to be a startling result that we shall impute to a father the same affection for his daughter's child as he had for his daughter, and the same affection to an uncle for his niece's daughter that he had for the niece, but that we shall not impute to a sister the same affection for a sister's child that she had for the sister herself. I think it is irrational.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the conditio applies, as well as that on the terms of this settlement we should hold that the word children is inclusive of grandchildren.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark and Lord Trayner agreed with the consulted Judges.

The Court answered the question in the negative.

Morton, Smart, & Macdonald, W.S—Macandrew, Wright, & Murray, W.S.—Agents.

No. 138.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

Alexander Muirden (Cowie's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—Strachan—Wilson.
Jane Cowie, Defender (Reclaimer).—Greenlees.

Personal or transmissible—Real burden—General conveyance—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 19, schedule L.—By general

No. 138.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

disposition a testator conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his son, declaring in the dispositive clause that the disposition was granted and was to be accepted under the following burdens, &c., "which are hereby declared to be real burdens on the estate and effects hereby conveyed," . . . inter alia, that the disponee should be bound to pay to a daughter of the testator an annuity of £35. The disponee made up his title to the different parcels of property that had belonged to his father, by notarial instruments in terms of schedule L of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, each of which set forth the declaration above written at full length, and was duly recorded.

Held (following Williamson v. Begg, 14 R. 720, aff. judgment of Lord Wellwood, diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark), that the annuity in favour of the daughter had not been validly constituted a real burden.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. M.

THOMAS COWIE, Montrose, who died on 9th April 1877, by a mortis causa trust-disposition and settlement, conveyed to his son, Alexander Cowie, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal. The dispositive clause proceeded,—"But declaring that this disposition and conveyance is granted, and is to be accepted of, under the following burdens, conditions, obligations, and declarations, which are hereby declared to be real burdens on the estate and effects hereby conveyed, viz.:— . . . Further, in the event of Jane Cowie, my daughter, surviving me and the said Mrs Margaret Falconer or Cowie, her mother, the said Alexander Cowie and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged to pay to my said daughter a free annuity of £35 sterling per annum, and that during the whole period of her life, after the deaths of both her said mother and me."

In 1882 Alexander completed a title to five heritable subjects which had belonged to his father, by notarial instruments conform to schedule L of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101).* Each of these instruments set forth Thomas' title and infeftment, and the general disposition granted by him in favour of Alexander, and each of them set forth specifically and at length the real burdens constituted by the disposition and settlement, and in particular the annuity in favour of Jane. The clause of annuity in her favour, declared to be a real burden on the disponee's right, was entered at length on the records, with each of the notarial instruments.

In 1886 Alexander's estates were sequestrated, and his trustee raised an action against Jane for declarator that the annuity of £35 had not been validly or effectually constituted a real burden on the heritable subjects described in the summons, being the same subjects as those to which the bankrupt had made up his title, as already described.

He pleaded;—(1) The annuity provided to the defender by the disposition and settlement of the late Thomas Cowie has not been validly constituted a real burden on the heritable subjects described in the summons. (2) The annuity in question not being a real burden affecting the heritable subjects described in the summons, the pursuer is, in the circumstances, entitled to decree of declarator to that effect.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The said annuity having been validly constituted a real burden, by the foresaid disposition and settlement, over

* Section 19 of that Act, which sanctions the employment of such a notarial instrument, provides further,—"And on such notarial instrument . . . . being so recorded, such grantee shall be in all respects in the same position as if a conveyance of the lands contained in such notarial instrument had been executed in his favour by the granter of the general disposition, . . . and as if such conveyance had been followed, when such lands are not held by burgage tenure, by an instrument of sasine of the said lands in favour of such grantee."

No. 138.

Mar. 17, 1891. Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

the subjects described in the summons, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) The said annuity being narrated at length in the notarial instruments as aforesaid, and having entered the records, affects and runs with the subjects in question.

On 15th November 1890 Lord Wellwood (Ordinary) repelled the defences, sustained the pursuer's first and second pleas, and found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusion.*

---

* "OPINION.—This is a hard case for the defender, but I am of opinion that the annuity provided to her, by the disposition and settlement of Thomas Cowie, has not been validly constituted a real burden on the heritable subjects described in the summons. Thomas Cowie's disposition and settlement was a general disposition. He thereby conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his son, Alexander Cowie, without specifying any particular lands. The mixed estate was conveyed 'under the following burdens, conditions, obligations, and declarations, which are hereby declared to be real burdens on the estate and effects hereby conveyed.' One of those was an annuity of £35 to the defender.

"I am of opinion that the annuity was not validly constituted a real burden by the disposition and settlement of Thomas Cowie, because the deed does not specify the lands upon which it is to be a real burden. In order to constitute a real burden, I think it is necessary, not only that the amount of the burden and the creditor in it should be named, but that the lands over which it is to be created a burden should be specified. The law is thus stated by the Lord President in the recent case of Williamson v. Begg, 18th May 1887, 14 R. 720-23,—'A general conveyance of all the granter's lands without specifying any lands—which is what is generally understood by a general disposition—cannot possibly create a real burden, because, in order to create a real burden, there must not only be a very precise specification of the amount and nature of the burden which is to be created, but also as precise a specification of the lands over which it is to extend.' And on p. 724, Lord Mure expresses himself to the same effect,—'It is better, I think, that this case should be decided upon the broader ground, and I am also of opinion that the payment of the legacy in question was not effectually created a real burden by the testator. There is, no doubt, a declaration to that effect in the deed, and there may have been a personal obligation imposed on the disponee to pay the debt, but the deed is a general conveyance of heritage, without any special conveyance of any particular estate, with directions that the legacy should be secured as a real burden over it. That being so, it is clear that, under the rules of law which were in operation at the date of the passing of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, no real burden was constituted, and I see nothing in the provisions of that statute which can be said to have relaxed or altered these rules.' It may be that there were other grounds sufficient to support that decision, but the passages quoted are authoritative, and even if I did not concur in them, I could not regard them as simply obiter dicta.

"Further, it is said that the annuity has been validly created a real burden by being narrated at length in the notarial instruments expede by Alexander Cowie; these are notarial instruments by which he made up a title to the various heritable subjects in which his father died infeft. Now, I think that if the annuity was not well created a real burden by the disposition and settlement, the defect could not be cured by the terms of the notarial instruments. The direction in schedule L of the Conveyancing Act, 1868, merely authorises the notary to insert those real burdens which are duly created by the deed, but it does not authorise him to insert burdens which have not been so created. The Lord President in Williamson v. Begg, p. 723, states particularly the province of the notarial instrument, of which the form is given in schedule L of the Act of 1868, and I need only refer to that statement. The notarial instruments in this case are therefore not conform to their warrant. In the whole circumstances, I think the pursuer is entitled to the declarator which he asks."

No. 138.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord President's opinion in Williamson's case[1] was only obiter, for there the declaration as to the real burden was not contained in the dispositive clause, nor was the real burden set out at length in the notarial instrument, so that it could never reach the record. Again, the form in which that action arose, viz., an action of damages against an agent who had failed to constitute the real burden, made it possible to decide it on another ground, viz., that the agent had no duty to do so, which was the ground taken by Lord Shand. Apart from authority, the effect of the insertion of the burden in the notarial instrument was this,—each notarial instrument wrote in and specified the particular lands in the general conveyance, which thus became a special conveyance of each particular parcel of lands in turn, and upon each particular parcel there was imposed the burden, which was thus carried into the record, and made known to all as affecting the lands. There was an obligation on the disponee to complete his title in such a way as to carry out the intention of the disponer.

Argued for the pursuer;—The question was closed by the decision in Williamson's case. There might be a personal obligation on the disponee, but that was not the question. The real burden never was properly constituted by the granter. The original disposition wanted one of the characteristics necessary to the creation of a real burden, viz., a specification of the lands. The notary could not supply that; he had no authority to do so. The notarial instrument was not habile for such a purpose. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—That is just what I doubt. By the statute this notarial instrument does more than feudalise, it specialises the general conveyance.]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case is whether or not a legacy left to Jane Cowie, the defender, has been validly constituted a real burden on the heritable subjects described in the summons. That legacy has been paid for some time by the testator's son, to whom the bulk of the property was left, and that was quite a proper course, for he was under a personal obligation to pay it. But he has become bankrupt, and the question as to the validity of the burden is raised by his trustee.

Although the testator no doubt directed that this annual payment should be a real burden on his estate, it is said that he did not do so in such a way as to be binding on his successor. The conveyance is in general terms, and the testator does not specify the lands on which the annuity is to be a real burden, and it is only in a notarial instrument executed after his death that the lands are specified. If we were considering this question for the first time, the leaning of my opinion would be to hold that what was done by the will, and the notarial instrument following upon it, would effectually constitute a burden over the heritable estate. But that matter is foreclosed. The case of Williamson, to which the Lord Ordinary refers, is as nearly on all-fours with this case as it is possible for one case to be with another. I do not feel myself at liberty to give any opinion that would be inconsistent with it.

Therefore, on the authority of that case, I think we must affirm the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The case of Williamson v. Begg is directly in [1] Williamson v. Begg, May 18, 1887, 14 R. 720.

No. 138.

Mar. 17, 1891.
Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

point, and if your Lordships think it right to follow it, as I believe you do, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be affirmed.

But I am not satisfied with that decision. In my opinion it should be reconsidered, and as the question is one of very general importance I think it right to explain the views which I entertain upon it.

We have here a general conveyance by Thomas Cowie of his whole estate, heritable and moveable, in favour of his son Alexander. That the disposition contains moveable estate is to my mind immaterial. It is not the less a conveyance of the heritable estate, and the legal effect of it, and of the title made up under it, is the same as if it had conveyed the heritable estate alone.

Taking the disposition in that light, I find that the heritable estate was conveyed to the disponee under certain burdens, which were declared to be real burdens on the estate so conveyed. Some of these burdens were of such a nature that they could not be made real. I am not concerned with them. But one of these was an annuity of £35 in favour of the defender, and it cannot be disputed that such an annual payment may be lawfully constituted a real burden. It was maintained, however, that a real burden could not be constituted by a general conveyance and by an infeftment taken by a notarial instrument in the manner provided by the Act of 1868. It is this question which I desire to examine.

Under the old law, it was impossible to make up a title under a general conveyance, because it did not specify the lands which were conveyed and could not therefore contain any effectual precept of sasine. But it was the warrant for an action of adjudication in implement, and the charter of adjudication would convey the specific lands adjudged on the conditions and under the burdens contained in the general disposition. If this course had been followed in the present case, I cannot doubt that when infeftment was expede on the precept contained in the charter, the annuity in favour of the defender would have been validly created a real burden on the lands.

Of course the disponee, if he were the heir of the disponer, which I assume to be the fact in this case, might neglect the general disposition and make up his title as heir. If he had done so, there might have been difficulty in getting the annuity made a real burden. But it is not necessary to consider what remedies would in that event have been open to the defender, though it is right to notice that the same difficulty would have occurred if the disposition had been special. For it is equally open to the heir to neglect a special disposition. It is sufficient, however, that the heir, so far from neglecting the general disposition, made up his title under it, and that in the infeftment which he took by recording the notarial instrument expede in virtue of the 19th section of the Act of 1868 the annuity was declared to be a real burden on the lands in which he was so infeft.

I have always understood that the new form of title introduced by this section was to enable the conveyancer to dispense with the cumbrous adjudication in implement followed by a charter of adjudication, and that it took the place of the old form with precisely the same legal effect. But if the judgment in Williamson v. Begg, and that which we are now going to pronounce are sound, it is the necessary consequence that the conveyancer cannot use the new form except in those cases in which the estate is conveyed without conditions or burdens, or in which he means to neglect them. I cannot bring myself to think that this can be the true construction of the Act.

No. 138.
Mar. 17, 1891.
Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

The purpose of the statute was, in my opinion, to enable a title to be completed under the general conveyance, and it seems to me that by adopting the statutory form the general conveyance is itself feudalised. Its defect at common law was that it did not specify the lands. The statutory remedy is that the disponee who makes up his title under it is required to produce to the notary the disposition in favour of the disponer and the infeftment following thereon, from which the notary inserts in the notarial instrument the description of the lands. The instrument then recites the general conveyance, and proceeds "whereupon this instrument is taken in the hands of" the notary "in terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868." It may then be recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines, and on this being done the 19th section declares that the grantee under the general disposition shall be in the same position as if a conveyance of the lands contained in the notarial instrument had been executed in his favour by the granter of the general disposition, and as if such conveyance had been followed by an instrument of sasine in favour of such grantee, expede and recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines. In other words, the general conveyance by the adoption of the statutory form is equivalent to a special conveyance of the lands described in the notarial instrument, and infeftment is taken under it as the disposition conveying these lands. It thus forms the disposition on which the lands are held, and on which infeftment is taken. The grantee is infeft under the general conveyance thus made specific.

But what about the burdens? The schedule L furnishes the answer. It directs that if the deed is granted under any real burden or condition the following words shall be inserted in the notarial instrument. But always "under the real burdens," &c. I am of opinion that these words refer to the burdens and conditions contained in the general conveyance, and intended by that deed to affect the lands thereby conveyed. The language of the schedule is express. If the deed,—that is to say, the general conveyance,—is granted under any real burden or condition, the burdens and conditions are to be inserted in the instrument. For what purpose? In order that they may enter the sasine and so be made real on the lands, or in other words, that the general conveyance may be feudalised under the burdens which the granter desired to impose on the lands. This is necessary in order to complete the system of making up titles introduced by the Act of 1868. For if the burdens contained in the general conveyance are not made real by being set forth in the recorded instrument, it follows that by adopting the statutory form the grantee will be infeft in an unburdened estate, and that the purpose of the granter will be defeated.

The statute declares that by expeding a notarial instrument, the granter shall be in the same position as if a conveyance had been executed in his favour of the lands contained in the instrument. But when it also prescribes that the burdens contained in the general conveyance shall be inserted in the instrument, I cannot read it as meaning anything else than that the supposed special conveyance shall be a conveyance under these burdens. The legal conditions on which burdens may be made real are therefore completely satisfied. For there is a special conveyance under burdens, and when the instrument is recorded in the Register of Sasines the effect is declared to be the same as if infeftment had been taken under such a conveyance.

In the case of Williamson v. Begg, the Lord President, after reciting the clause in which certain legacies were declared to "form real burdens over the heritable estate hereby conveyed," says, "If the effect of that clause was to create the legacies real burdens on the estate, no doubt the making up the title under the general disposition should have been so arranged as to feudalise the estate subject to these real burdens. But looking to the deed I am of the opinion, which indeed hardly seemed to be disputed, that this declaration is of no avail as creating a real burden." His Lordship further says that a general conveyance cannot create a real burden, "because in order to create a real burden there must be not only a very precise specification of the amount and nature of the burden which is to be created, but also as precise a specification of the lands over which it is to extend."

No. 138. Mar. 17, 1891. Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

I agree with his Lordship in thinking that the legacies could not be created real burdens by the general conveyance, and that if a real burden is to be constituted, it must be constituted over specific lands. But it must be added that no burden can be made real by any disposition. It must enter the infeftment. But I do not agree in the opinion that a burden is ineffectual and cannot be made real, because it is contained in a general disposition. Such a deed is as ineffectual to convey lands as it is to create a burden, and in precisely the same sense. For under the old law a general conveyance could not form any part of the feudal progress, inasmuch as the lands were not described, and as it could not be feudalised, it followed that no real burden could be created under it. It was merely a warrant for making up a title to the lands conveyed by means of an adjudication in implement and a charter of adjudication following thereon, but subject to the burdens contained in the general conveyance. For the grantee could use it only to take up the estate which was conveyed to him,—that is to say, to take up the estate under the burdens which the granter had imposed. His title was completed by taking infeftment on the charter, but by the very fact of taking infeftment the burdens were made real. The statute introduced a new form of completing a title under a general conveyance, and we are considering the effect of a title completed according to that system. I have shewn that under that system the general conveyance is part of the feudal progress. It is recited as such in the notarial instrument, and the statute declares that that instrument shall have the same effect as if a conveyance of the lands contained in the instrument had been executed in favour of the grantee by the granter of the general disposition. But are we to assume that this conveyance is to be unqualified? I see no reason for such an assumption. The statute provides a form of completing a title in conformity with the general conveyance, or in other words under the burdens and conditions therein contained. The statutory form of making up titles would be very incomplete if it did not. Hence, in my opinion, the conveyance which the statute conceives to be executed in favour of the grantee is a conveyance under the burdens contained in the general disposition. But an infeftment on such a conveyance makes these burdens real. The notarial instrument is equivalent to a conveyance of specific lands under the burdens contained in the general conveyance, and the recording of the instrument completes the infeftment on the supposed conveyance.

The Lord President considers the question whether the legacy could be made a real burden by means of the notarial instrument. I agree that it could not, unless there were a warrant for the insertion of it flowing from a person infeft in the lands. It is, of course, necessary in order to the constitution of a real burden that the lands shall be disponed under it. Without such a disposition there would be no warrant for inserting the burden in the notarial instrument. But here the necessary warrant exists. For the lands were disponed by an owner infeft, under the real burden of the annuity, and I think that there was not only a warrant for the insertion of it in the instrument, but that the notary would not have been following the directions of the statute if he had omitted it.

His Lordship then examines the schedule. After reciting it, he says,—"That shews that a notarial instrument may be recorded under schedule L upon a general disposition, containing a full description of the lands conveyed to the general disponee, and there is no doubt that by such a deed a real burden may be effectually created. Accordingly, the words of the schedule which I have quoted above are completely satisfied by referring them to such notarial instruments as may be executed in creating real burdens where these have been properly constituted. The argument upon that section accordingly fails."

The 19th section applies to all general dispositions whether they shall extend to the whole lands belonging to the granter, or be limited to particular lands belonging to him "with or without full description of such lands." I do not pause to consider for what purpose the Legislature has comprehended these different forms of disposition under one common term. I take the meaning of the Lord President to be that when the general disposition contains a full description of certain lands the notarial instrument may set out the burden under which they are conveyed, and that in these circumstances the burden will be made real by recording the instrument. I understand him to hold that the direction of the schedule with respect to the insertion of burdens applies to this case alone. It seems to me that on that construction of the schedule a general direction is dealt with as exceptional. I see no warrant for it. The section is universal. It applies to all general dispositions, and the schedule is given as the form under which all such dispositions, without exception, may be feudalised, subject to the burdens therein contained. I do not think that the words of the schedule are satisfied by referring them to a particular class of notarial instruments. In my opinion they cannot be satisfied without referring them to every notarial instrument which can be expede under the 19th section.

Lord Shand seems to proceed on the ground that the grantee was under no obligation to create the legacy a real burden, and that in consequence it had not been made effectual. I should hesitate to adopt this view of the position of the disponee. But it is not necessary to consider it. In this case, as well as in the case of Williamson, the grantee accepted the estate on the conditions on which it was conveyed to him. He made up his title in such a form as he thought would be effectual to make the burden real. The question is whether the form was sufficient for that purpose, and that question cannot, in my opinion, depend on the rights or obligations of the grantee, but on the legal effect of the title which he has actually made up.

Apart from the decision in the case of Williamson v. Begg I should have no difficulty in deciding in favour of the defender. But considering the weight of authority against me, I can feel but little confidence in the opinion which I have expressed. I cannot, however, bring myself to think that I am wrong, and I have thought it right to express my opinion at some length in case the question should ever come to be reconsidered.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think the question here raised is not an open question, and has been decided by the case of Williamson, to which the Lord Ordinary refers. For my own part I see no reason to doubt the soundness of that decision. On the contrary, I concur in the decision, and agree with the views expressed by the Lord President and Lord Shand.

No. 138. Mar. 17, 1891. Cowie's Trustee v. Cowie.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

A. LAURIE KENNAWAY, W.S.—WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 139. Mar. 17, 1891. M'Gilp v. Kilchoman School Board.

DONALD M'GILP, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—G. W. Burnet.
SCHOOL BOARD of KILCHOMAN, Defenders (Appellants).—D. Robertson—Graham Stewart.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Incompetency of appeal against interlocutory order of Sheriff who is empowered by statute to determine finally any matter—Local Government Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 50), secs. 86, 105.—The Local Government Act, 1889 (sec. 86), enacts that if under the provisions thereof a teacher appointed previously to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, shall be prejudiced in his right to school fees, he shall be entitled to compensation from the school board, "and such compensation, failing agreement, may be determined finally by the Sheriff."

In an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a teacher against a school board praying for declarator that the pursuer was entitled to a certain sum annually as compensation for fees under the above Act, the Sheriff-substitute appointed the pursuer to lodge a minute giving details as to fees previously received by him. The pursuer having appealed, the Sheriff allowed the pursuer a proof.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Held that the appeal was incompetent.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Argyll. I.

AT the passing of the Education Act, 1872, Donald M'Gilp was parochial teacher in the parish school of Kilchoman, Islay. Thereafter he was paid by a salary equivalent to the former heritors' salary, by fees, and by his receiving the Government grant allowed to the school.

In August 1889 the School Board of Kilchoman resolved under the Local Government Act, 1889, to remit as from 1st October 1889 the school fees previously charged, and they resolved to pay to M'Gilp £23, 15s. 8d. per annum as compensation in lieu thereof.*

In July 1890 M'Gilp raised an action against the School Board in the

* The Education Act, 1872, enacts, inter alia, sec. 55,—"Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained regarding the removal of the teachers of public schools appointed previously to the passing of this Act, such teachers shall not, with respect to tenure of office emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage, secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained, and such emoluments and retiring allowances shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such schools respectively."

The Local Government Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 50), which by sec. 22 provides that a certain sum of money shall be applied towards the payment of school fees in state-aided schools, enacts by sec. 86,—"If under the provisions of this Act, or of anything made or done in pursuance thereof, any teacher appointed previously to the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, shall be prejudiced in any right to school fees possessed by him at the passing of this Act, he shall, after the passing of this Act, be entitled to receive from the school board compensation, in respect of any loss so sustained by him, and such compensation, failing agreement, may be determined finally by the Sheriff, and shall be payable out of the school fund."

By sec. 105 "Sheriff" is thus defined,—"The expression Sheriff means the Sheriff of the county, and includes Sheriff-substitute."

No. 139.

Mar. 17, 1891.
M'Gilp v. Kilchoman School Board.

Sheriff Court of Argyllshire, praying the Court to find and declare that by virtue of his appointment made previously to the passing of the Act of 1872, he was entitled to the payment of the whole fees exigible for the scholars taught in the school, that he was now entitled under the Local Government Act, 1889, to compensation in respect of the loss sustained by him in consequence of the remission of the fees, and to fix £45 as the compensation to which he was entitled.

The School Board defended the action, maintaining that they had offered full compensation.

The parties were at issue as to the amount of the fees which the pursuer had drawn prior to the resolution to abolish fees.

The Sheriff-substitute (Shairp), on 1st November 1890, appointed the pursuer to lodge a minute giving in detail certain information as to arrears of fees.

He appealed to the Sheriff, and asked for a proof as to the amount of his compensation.

The Sheriff (Irvine) allowed the pursuer a proof, and to the defenders a conjunct probation.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The appeal to the Sheriff was incompetent. The determination of the matter lay with the Sheriff-substitute, or otherwise with the Sheriff if he entertained the case in the first instance, but not by way of appeal. If the Sheriff had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal the defenders were entitled to ask the Supreme Court to keep the Sheriff Court to its proper province, and therefore to recall the judgment. The question before the Sheriff-substitute was one of procedure, and the appeal to the Sheriff was therefore incompetent.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The appeal from the Sheriff Court was incompetent. The Sheriff had authority to decide on appeal from the Sheriff-substitute the whole merits of the question, as was shewn by the case of Bone, where, though the appeal was itself incompetent the Sheriff removed the whole subject-matter to himself and disposed of it, and the Court of Session held that they could not interfere. If that were so the Sheriff could surely dispose finally of a point of procedure. Where the determination of a question was committed by the statute to "the Sheriff" the ordinary procedure in the Sheriff Court was to be followed.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The arguments which were presented to us raised some difficulty in my mind, but in the view I take of the case, after consultation, these difficulties have disappeared. The Act of 1889, section 86, enacted—"If under the provisions of this Act or of anything made or done in pursuance thereof, any teacher appointed previously to the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, shall be prejudiced in any right to school fees possessed by him at the passing of this Act, he shall, after the passing of this Act, be entitled to receive from the school board compensation in respect of any loss so sustained by him, and such compensation, failing agreement, may be determined finally by the Sheriff, and shall be payable out of the school fund." That section

[1] Bone v. School Board of Sorn, March 16, 1886, 13 R. 768; Fleming v. Dickson, Dec. 19, 1862, 1 Macph. 189, 35 Scot. Jur. 96; Leitch v. Scottish Legal Burial Society, Oct. 21, 1870, 9 Macph. 40, 43 Scot. Jur. 21; Harrington v. Richardson, Jan. 20, 1854, 16 D. 368, 26 Scot. Jur. 174.

[2] Magistrates of Portobello v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Nov. 8, 1882, 10 R. 130.

No. 139.

Mar. 17, 1891.
M'Gilp v. Kilchoman School Board.

appears to me to mean nothing more or less than this, that the Sheriff, after such procedure as he thinks proper, shall determine the amount of compensation to be paid. I think it would be very proper that where any considerable sum is at stake he should make up a record and proceed to deal with the matter as if it was an ordinary Sheriff Court action, if the parties desire it. In my opinion, however, that is not a necessary proceeding; the Sheriff could, if he thought proper, call the parties before him and hear them, and then, without any formal proceedings at all, settle the question finally.

Therefore I think this appeal is incompetent, because while it was necessary for the Sheriff to acquire information to guide him in awarding compensation, this appeal arises out of something that he has done in the course of getting that information.

The facts are that the Sheriff-substitute ordered the pursuer to put in a minute stating the particulars of his claim. On appeal the Sheriff recalled this interlocutor and ordered a proof. I do not think, however, that in that state of facts the matter is brought outside the position in which it was placed by the Act. It was not, as I said before, a regular case proceeding in the Sheriff Court, but was merely a convenient means of settling what was the compensation due to the pursuer.

After this question has been finally decided and the amount of compensation fixed by the Sheriff, a question may arise whether an appeal would not be competent to this Court, not of course on the amount of compensation, but on the question whether the Sheriff in acting as arbiter to fix the amount of compensation had acted unfairly. On the question whether that would be competent, or whether what the Sheriff did could be interfered with otherwise than by reduction, I give no decision at present; all that I do say just now is that in my judgment the proceedings cannot competently be reviewed by the present appeal.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer here is a schoolmaster who claims and indeed is entitled to compensation under the Local Government Act of 1889. The Act provides that the school board and the schoolmaster shall agree as to the amount, but if they do not agree then the Sheriff shall determine what it is to be. Now, there is nothing in the case before us to indicate that when the Sheriff does decide the matter both parties will not be quite satisfied with the award. Before he has determined that matter I think it would be out of the question for us to inquire into the regularity of anything that the Sheriff may have done in the process of informing himself as to the amount of compensation due. Even in the case of ordinary actions in the Sheriff Court there are some appeals which are competent and some which are not, but if an incompetent appeal has been taken from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff we do not deal with the matter at once, but wait till the end of the case, and if we think that anything has been done under the alleged incompetent appeal that has had an effect upon the decision, then we can alter it. Here the Sheriff-substitute has adopted a particular form of process to obtain the information necessary and the Sheriff has allowed a proof. I do not think that any form of process is prescribed in the Act of Parliament. I think that the Sheriff might get the parties before him in his own room, and after hearing them he could determine the question of the amount of compensation finally. We have no jurisdiction until the matter has been determined by the Sheriff, and indeed only then if the parties complain of any irregularity.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. I think the appeal should be dismissed. I think it is an idle and useless appeal.

No. 139.

Mar. 17, 1891.

M'Gilp v. Kilchoman School Board.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with Lord Rutherfurd Clark. I think this is an idle and incompetent appeal. The Sheriff is the final judge in the matter, and to ask us to interfere with the way which the Sheriff takes to get the information he requires for his decision is out of the question.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

D. MACLACHLAN, S.S.C.—M'NEILL & SIME, W.S.—Agents.

HENRY ROY, Petitioner.—C. N. Johnston.
DANIEL TURNER, Respondent.—Party.

No. 140.

Mar. 18, 1891.

Roy v. Turner.

Expenses—Arrestments on the dependence—Recall.—A defender, against whom arrestments on the dependence had been used, after decree paid the whole sum decerned for. The pursuer having refused extrajudicially to loose the arrestments, the defender presented a petition for that purpose. Held (diss. Lord Kinnear) that the defender was not entitled to recover from the pursuer the expense of the petition.

1ST DIVISION. C.

ON 30th August 1890 Daniel Turner, solicitor-at-law, Edinburgh, brought an action against Dr Henry Roy, Gladstone Terrace, Edinburgh, for payment of two accounts for law expenses, amounting together to £88, 0s. 9d., with interest and expenses of process.

On 1st September Turner used arrestments on the dependence in the hands of the Caledonian Railway Company.

Roy lodged no defences, and the accounts were remitted to the Auditor for taxation.

The Auditor taxed the accounts at £64, 5s. 7d., and decree for that sum was given against Roy, with expenses of process, amounting to £10, 11s. as taxed.

On 9th December Roy paid Turner the sums found due to him, and Turner gave Roy a discharge therefor. Roy also asked Turner to deliver to him the execution of arrestment, with a discharge written thereon, or else to write such a letter as would put the railway company in safety to pay the arrested funds. Turner refused, except on condition of receiving payment of the expenses of using the arrestments.

On 9th March 1891 Roy presented a petition against Turner for recall of the arrestments, praying also that Turner should be found liable in the expenses of the petition, and such other procedure as might be necessary to get the arrestments removed.

Turner lodged answers, but opposed the petition only in so far as expenses were sought against him.

Argued for the petitioner;—A pursuer arresting on the dependence was not entitled to recover the expenses of using the arrestments,[1] and when the sum decerned for, with the expenses of process as found due, had been paid, the defender was entitled to have the arrestments loosed. The respondent had declined to allow the arrestments to be removed extrajudicially, and therefore, this petition being thus necessary, the respondent should be found liable in the expense of it.

Argued for the respondent;—The cases cited by the petitioner merely proved that the expenses of using arrestments on the dependence were [1] Symington v. Symington, June 11, 1874, 1 R. 1006; Black v. Jehangeer, Framjee & Co., March 19, 1887, 14 R. 678.

No. 140.
Mar. 18, 1891.
Roy v. Turner.

not expenses in the original action, but the respondent, had he chosen, might have declined to grant a discharge for the sum decerned for, except on condition of receiving payment of the expenses of using the arrestments, failing which, he could have brought a furthcoming, and recovered these expenses there.[1] He had not done so, but he was in no way bound to assist the petitioner in getting the arrestments removed, and ought not therefore to be found liable in the expenses of this petition.

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition for the recall of arrestments used on the dependence of an action by the respondent against the petitioner, and there is no question that these arrestments fall to be recalled. The question simply is, whether the petitioner is entitled to have his expenses in coming here, or whether he is to pay the respondent his expenses? As I understand the facts, they are these—As soon as the respondent obtained decree in the action the petitioner paid him the whole sum in the decree—that is, the principal sum sued for and the expenses of the action; and having done so, the petitioner obtained the discharge which the respondent was bound to give him. The respondent now says that he is not bound to loose the arrestments except on payment of the expenses of using them, but I think that an arrestment on the dependence does not cover the expenses of using the arrestments. It may or may not be that these expenses would have been recoverable in a subsequent forthcoming, but as soon as the principal sum sued for and the expenses are paid the decree is satisfied, and there is nothing further covered by it. It may be that the respondent ought to have given the letter which the petitioner asked him for, but I do not think that he was bound to do so. The petitioner, however, is entitled to have the arrestments loosed, and had he confined his application to that there would probably have been no question about the matter, but unfortunately for himself he asked for expenses against the respondent. I think that he is not entitled to expenses against the respondent. He is entitled to recall of the arrestments, but not to the expenses of obtaining that recall. Therefore the respondent was quite entitled to put in answers as he has done, in which he only opposes the application in so far as expenses are sought against him. I think the petitioner was wrong in asking for these expenses.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship that when arrestments are rightly laid on, in the exercise of a legal right to recover a just debt, the expenses of using the arrestments do not enter into the costs of the original action. Each party must bear his own costs, whatever they may be, in getting the arrestments out of the way.

On the one hand the arresting creditor cannot, unless by bringing a separate action, recover from the defender the costs of laying on the arrestments which he has used for his own protection. When the defender tenders the sum decerned for, and the costs of the action, this must be accepted as a satisfaction of the decree.

On the other hand, the arresting creditor is not, in my opinion, bound to discharge the arrestments voluntarily. He is not bound to grant a letter which will entitle the arrestee to pay or hand over the sum arrested.

As the pursuer is not bound to assist the defender in getting the arrestments taken out of the way, it follows, in my opinion, that he is not liable in the costs of the proceedings which the defender may take for that purpose. No. 140. Mar. 18, 1891. Roy v. Turner.

[1] Wight v. Wight, May 23, 1822, F. C.; May v. Malcolm, June 7, 1825, 4 S. 79; Mackay's Practice, ii. 105.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am sorry to say that I am unable to agree with your Lordships. I think Mr Turner was bound to grant the letter which the petitioner asked him for, or to withdraw the arrestment in some other form. He had brought an action against the petitioner, and for his greater security used the arrestments which are the subject of the present dispute. It has turned out that the arrestments were unnecessary, for the petitioner was able to pay the sum for which Mr Turner sued, and he in fact paid it as soon as decree was given against him. I think, therefore, that he was entitled to require the creditor, whom he had paid in full, to remove the unreasonable embargo which he had placed upon the petitioner's property. I say unreasonable, not because the embargo was unreasonable in its origin—for it is the right of a creditor to use arrestments upon the dependence of an action in which he sues for payment of his debt—but because it became unreasonable to continue it after the petitioner had paid the whole sum for which decree was given against him in the action. It was therefore, in my opinion, the duty of the respondent to write such a letter to the arrestee as would put him in safety to pay over the arrested funds. The respondent in his answers takes up a position which I understand both your Lordships to regard as untenable, for he maintains that he is entitled to the expenses of using the arrestments. Your Lordships are of opinion that such a contention cannot be maintained, and therefore the respondent has declined to assent to the recall of these arrestments upon a ground which in the judgment of your Lordships is untenable. Then what course, in these circumstances, was open to the petitioner? He could only present this petition to have the arrestments recalled. The respondent lodged answers to this petition, and as he has taken up a position which we all think wrong, I cannot see any reason why he should get his expenses.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT recalled the arrestment and found the respondent entitled to expenses, modified to two guineas.

T. & W. A. MACLAREN, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

GILBERT ARCHER, Pursuer (Respondent).—Young—Orr.
JOHN RITCHIE & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Jameson—F. T. Cooper. No. 141. Mar. 19, 1891. Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

Reparation—Slander—Newspaper—Innuendo.—A newspaper published a report of a meeting of a Good Templar Lodge, headed "Mr A.'s Crooked Ways." It was set out in the report that "Brother H.," who had been a candidate for the Grand Chiefship, stated that "Brother A." came to him and urged him to become a candidate, as he had no intention of standing again for the post; that subsequently, without giving him, "Brother H.," any notice of his change of mind, "Brother A." presented himself as a candidate, and was re-elected; and that he, Brother H., felt justified in making these explanations, as his conduct in opposing Brother A. was apt to be misunderstood. The same issue of the paper contained a short leading article, which substantially repeated the statement attributed to "Brother H." in the report, and added,—"It is to be hoped that this sharp practice, which is of a piece with the other proceedings of the official clique at the head of the Order, will not be lost upon the members." The news-bill of the day also contained the words,—"Mr A. and his Crooked Ways."

In an action by A. against the proprietors of the newspaper for slander, alleged

No. 141.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

to be contained in the above publications, which were innuendoed to mean that the defenders intended to represent, and did represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of deceitful and dishonourable conduct, and that he habitually indulged in conduct that was unfair, deceitful, and dishonourable, the Court held (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood) that the publications would not bear the innuendo proposed, and assoilzied the defenders.

1st Division. Ld. Wellwood. C.

On 6th November 1890 Gilbert Archer, 2 Wellington Place, Leith, raised an action of damages for slander against John Ritchie & Company, proprietors of the Evening Dispatch newspaper, Edinburgh.

The pursuer averred (cond. 1) that he was Grand Worthy Chief Templar in the Independent Order of Good Templars in Scotland. (Cond. 2) "On 2d September 1890 the defenders caused to be printed and published in the Evening Dispatch newspaper, of that date, the following paragraph:—'Mr Archer's Crooked Ways.—The usual weekly meeting of Sir Walter Scott Lodge, I.O.G.T., was held last night in Marshall Street Hall—the C. T. (Mr James R. Clark) was in the chair. Brother James Hamilton, Grand Councillor of the Order, was one of the visitors, and he was requested to occupy a seat on the platform, beside the Chief Templar. After the initiation of candidates, Brother Hamilton was asked to address the meeting. In the course of his remarks he referred to the business which had been before the Grand Lodge at Aberdeen. He stood before them that night as the defeated candidate for the Grand Chiefship, but he felt bound to explain how he happened to be a candidate for the office at all. Had he known that Brother Archer was anxious for the post again, he certainly would not have allowed his name to be proposed. The idea of being a candidate for the office had never entered his head until, some time before the meeting of the Grand Lodge, Brother Archer came to him and urged him to become a candidate, as he said he had no intention of standing again for the post of Grand Chief. That was the origin and history of his candidature, and while he was not in the least astonished at Brother Archer's name being proposed again for the G. C. T., they could fancy his feelings when he saw that Brother Archer was actually a candidate, and seemed to have no intention of withdrawing—for that was the first and the only intimation he ever received that Brother Archer had changed his mind, and was ambitious to again fill the chair. He felt he was justified in making these explanations, as his conduct in opposing Brother Archer was apt to be misunderstood and misrepresented by the brethren throughout the country. Brother Hamilton concluded by earnestly urging the members to work more energetically than ever. It was in the subordinate lodges, and not in the District and Grand Lodges, that the work must be done, if it is done at all. Brother Hamilton received a cordial vote of thanks for his address.' The meeting referred to in said paragraph was, as the defenders well knew, a private meeting of the Good Templar Lodge referred to, and as the defenders also well knew it is, and was, contrary to the rules of the said Order and the said Lodge to publish reports of the proceedings of the meetings. There were no reporters at the meeting, and the defenders obtained the information as to what passed at said meeting improperly and surreptitiously."

The pursuer further averred,—(Cond. 3) "In the same issue of the said Evening Dispatch newspaper the defenders also printed and published an editorial note or leaderette to the following effect:—'The mystery connected with the Chief Templarship becomes deeper than ever by the explanations given by Mr Hamilton in an Edinburgh Lodge last night. No one stands higher—few, indeed, so high—in the estimation of the Order, and any statement made by him regarding his candidature for the

No. 141.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

G. C. T.-ship may therefore be readily accepted. That candidature was none of his seeking. Mr Archer, about three months ago, intimated that he did not intend to offer himself for re-election, and he suggested that Mr Hamilton should stand. Mr Archer's resolution was referred to publicly in several lodges and elsewhere, and no whisper was heard of any change in his intention until his name was proposed again at the Grand Lodge Session, and the surprise of Mr Hamilton may be understood when he found that Mr Archer did not withdraw his name. The contest was thus forced upon Mr Hamilton under circumstances which he never contemplated, rendering his position very unpleasant. It is to be hoped that this sharp practice, which is of a piece with other proceedings of the official clique at the head of the Order, will not be lost upon the members.' And in another column of the same paper the defenders printed and published a third paragraph, for the purpose of calling attention to the said report, in the following terms:—'Mr Hamilton last night gave a curious explanation of the circumstances under which Mr Gilbert Archer stood again for the G. C. T.-ship.' The defenders also, on the same day, printed and published, and exposed publicly in the streets and other public places in Edinburgh, Leith, and other towns, a bill of contents, being a large placard, in which were prominently printed in large type the words 'Mr Archer and his Crooked Ways.'"

The pursuer then averred,—(Cond. 4) "The statements contained in the foresaid paragraphs, note, and placard, are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, and were printed and published by the defenders maliciously, and without probable cause. The pursuer never went to Mr Hamilton or urged him to become, or suggested that he should become, a candidate for the office of Grand Chief Templar, or said to Mr Hamilton that the pursuer did not intend to stand again for the office. By the statements above quoted, the defenders intended to represent, and did represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of deceitful and dishonourable conduct, and that he habitually indulged in conduct that was unfair and deceitful and dishonourable, and that he was unworthy of the confidence and respect of the members of the said Order. The said statements further represented that the pursuer had wilfully misled the said James Hamilton, by statements which he, the pursuer, knew to be false, and that the pursuer had been guilty of unfair and treacherous conduct towards Mr Hamilton, and that the pursuer was a man who was frequently guilty of wilfully misleading others by statements known by him to be false, and of unfair and treacherous conduct in his dealings with others, and that he was a man who was unworthy of trust or confidence."

The defenders admitted the publication in their newspaper of the matter complained of, but averred,—(Ans. 4) "Denied. The paragraph set forth in condescendence 2 was an accurate report of the remarks made at the said meeting by the said Brother James Hamilton. The statements made therein were substantially true, and are not calumnious. . . . . The said Brother James Hamilton, at a subsequent meeting of the said Lodge, corrected his reported statement by saying that the pursuer had not personally called on him, . . . but that a deputation, some members of which . . . had been informed by the pursuer that he did not intend to stand again, and had informed pursuer they proposed to ask Brother James Hamilton to stand for the vacant post, had waited on him (Brother James Hamilton) with that object. . . . The publication of said paragraph was justifiable, and the statements made therein were privileged, as being the fair and reasonable discussion and criticism of matters of public concern. The editorial note or leaderette quoted in condescendence 3, in so far as it is not a mere résumé

No. 141.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

of actual facts in connection with the election to the Grand Chief Templarship, is a fair and reasonable criticism of the public action of the pursuer in his relations with a public body—the Independent Order of Good Templars in Scotland. All the statements made in said leaderette are true, and are not libellous. The third paragraph mentioned in condescendence 3 appeared in the summary of news, and was simply a statement of fact, and was true, and is not libellous. The placard referred to in condescendence 3 merely contained an announcement to the public of the fact that in the issue of the newspaper of that day they would find information on the subjects advertised, and such announcement was true. All the matters set forth and complained of in condescendence 3 were not false, but were true, and were in any circumstances not calumnious. Explained that the reports of meetings of the Good Templar Lodges are most useful and important to the members of the Good Templar Order, besides being of general interest to the public at large. The Order has over 37,000 members in Scotland, and the officials of the lodges often furnish paragraphs to the newspapers, with the object of enabling the public to know the transactions of the body."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defenders having slandered the pursuer as condescended on, to his loss, injury, and damage, the pursuer is entitled to damages as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant, and the action should be dismissed. (2) The paragraphs, leaderette, and placard complained of, not being libellous, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced. (3) The paragraph complained of in condescendence 2 being an accurate report of a meeting of a public body and of matters of public and general interest, and separatim, being of especial interest and importance to the members of the Good Templar Order, its publication by the defenders was justifiable, and decree of absolvitor should be pronounced. (4) The statements in the paragraph complained of in condescendence 2 being substantially true, and being privileged, the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (5) The facts stated in the editorial note or leaderette complained of in condescendence 3 being true, the defenders should be assoilzied. (6) The said editorial note or leaderette, being a fair criticism on the pursuer in his public character, and on matters of public and general concern, is privileged. (7) The statements in the third paragraph, and in the placard mentioned in condescendence 3, being true, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 13th January 1891, the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) approved of the issue quoted below * and disallowed the counter issue.†

---

* 1.—Proposed issue for pursuer as amended and as approved by Lord Wellwood, Ordinary.—"It being admitted that the defenders are the printers, proprietors, and publishers of the Evening Dispatch newspaper, published in Edinburgh: It being also admitted that in the number of the said newspaper which bears date and was printed and published in Edinburgh upon the second day of † "OPINION.— . . . All that I decide at present is, that the publications admit of the construction put upon them by the pursuer. In allowing an issue I am, to a certain extent, influenced by the consideration that the reported statement of Brother Hamilton, on which the defenders' comments bear to proceed, is not admitted by the pursuer to be true. Indeed, the defenders admit in their fourth answer, as I read it, either that Brother Hamilton was wrongly reported, or at least that the statement he then made was not in accordance with the facts. Something also depends on the question whether the meeting of the lodge was public or private.

---

"The pursuer's proposed issue which I have allowed is framed on the footing

No. 141.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—There was no relevant case here, for, in the first place, there was no sufficient denial of the truth of the facts stated in the publications complained of,[1] and secondly, these statements were not in themselves libellous. With reference to the first point the pursuer did not deny that he had intimated that he would not stand; neither did he deny that Hamilton had stood because the pursuer inti-September 1890 there was printed the paragraph set forth in the schedule A* hereto annexed; as also the editorial note or leaderette set forth in the schedule B† hereto annexed: Whether the defenders, on 2d September 1890, printed and published and publicly exposed a bill of contents of said newspaper, or large placard bearing the words 'Mr Archer and his Crooked Ways'? and whether the said paragraph, note, and placard, or any of them, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer's conduct had been dishonourable, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500."

---

2.—Proposed counter issue for defenders as amended and as disallowed by Lord Wellwood, Ordinary.—"Whether, prior to the election of a Grand Chief Templar in August 1890, the pursuer represented to members of the Independent Order of Good Templars that he did not intend again to be a candidate for the office of Grand Chief Templar; and whether, by said representations being repeated to him, James Hamilton, a member of said Order, was induced to believe that the pursuer would not be a candidate for said office, and was, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the pursuer, induced to become a candidate for said office himself; and whether the pursuer, notwithstanding said representations, and without any notice to the said James Hamilton, did become a candidate for the said office, and was elected to said office, and thereby defeated the candidature of the said James Hamilton?"

---

of putting in issue the whole of the publications made by the defenders and reading them together as a whole. I am not prepared to say that that is an unfair way of putting the case before the jury. Indeed, it is more favourable to the defenders than if the pursuer were to separate the paragraphs, for instance, by taking a separate issue in regard to the printing and publishing of the placard.

"I have disallowed the counter issue proposed for the defenders, because it does not amount to a justification of the alleged slander. At the same time, I think that without a counter issue the defenders at the trial will be entitled to prove the circumstances in which the alleged libel was published. I do not think that such evidence will be excluded. In Paul v. Jackson, 11 R. 460, the Lord President, while stating that a defender is not entitled to prove the truth of the statements without a counter issue, or any part of them, in order to mitigate damages, or for any other purpose whatever, adds,—'It is equally well settled, however, that a defender charged with slander is entitled to lay before the jury the circumstances in which the slander was uttered, in order to prove the state of his information with regard to the subject-matter, and to shew that the offence and consequent injury to the pursuer is not so great as is represented and so to diminish the amount of damages.'

"It will also be open to the defenders at the trial, without a counter issue, to prove, if they can, that the report was one which they were entitled to publish, and that it was an accurate report, and to maintain to the jury that their comments were fair and reasonable criticism on a matter of public interest and the actions of a public man, and therefore not calumnious.—Wright & Greig v. Ondram & Co., 16 R. 1004.

"The concluding paragraph of the pursuer's issue seems to be justified by the terms of the issue adjusted by the Inner-House in the case of Macrae v. Sutherland, 16 R. 476."

---

* I.e., that quoted in cond. 2.

† I.e., that quoted in cond. 3.

[1] Campbell v. Ferguson, Jan. 28, 1882, 9 R. 467.

No. 141. Mar. 19, 1891. Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

mated that he would not stand. Then, on the second point, neither the statements nor the criticism was libellous, because nothing either immoral or dishonourable was imputed to the pursuer, and to found an issue the words must come up to that, except in cases of persistent holding up of a person to ridicule and contempt or in cases of trade slander. None of the expressions used implied, or could be construed to imply, a charge of untruthfulness. When the words founded on were not in themselves slanderous, the innuendo must be such as they would reasonably bear.[1] "Crooked ways" did not mean "deceitful ways," but merely that the pursuer after going a certain length in one direction, had changed his mind and gone in the opposite direction, i.e., that his way was zig-zag. Nor did "sharp practice" mean anything more than that the person charged with it looked after his own interests keenly. Nothing dishonourable was implied. It was not seriously disputed that the account of what took place at the meeting was substantially accurate, or that that account was not in itself libellous. The mere report of what Hamilton had said contained nothing in the least degree offensive; on the contrary, what Hamilton was reported to have done was to apologise for opposing one so well esteemed as Archer. The real ground of complaint was the criticism in the leaderette, and the heading, and placard. But the criticism did not exceed the bounds of fair and reasonable criticism, and the heading and the placard were to be treated as a heading and a placard and nothing more—mere intimations, that was to say, of what would be found in the body of the paper. The meeting was a public meeting in this sense, that a newspaper which published a fair and accurate account of what took place would be protected. If the order of Good Templars was not a public body in the strict sense their proceedings were at any rate a matter of public concern. The defenders were entitled to a counter issue, as otherwise they would not be allowed to prove their averments of veritas.[2] If their criticism of the pursuer's conduct was slanderous, they were entitled to an opportunity of proving that he had in fact acted as they said he did.

Argued for the pursuer;—The report complained of was the report of what was alleged to have taken place at a private meeting—a meeting to which newspaper reporters were not admitted. The defenders having somehow got hold of a more or less accurate account of what took place at that meeting, had seen fit to publish it. They did so at their own risk and could not be heard to plead the accuracy of the report, if in point of fact it was defamatory, as it was. Even if the report per se would not bear the innuendo, the heading, the placard, and the leaderette shewed the animus with which the defenders regarded the pursuer's conduct. Their object was to hold him up as a dishonourable and deceitful man. There could be no doubt that anyone reading the whole would come to the conclusion that the pursuer was charged with having acted dishonourably. A heading might be read into the body of a statement so as to support an innuendo.[3] All the alleged slanderous writings might be put into one issue. A separate issue for each was unnecessary.[4]

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is an action of damages for slander brought by a M:

[1] Fraser v. Morris, Feb. 24, 1888, 15 R. 454.

[2] Paul v. Jackson, Jan. 23, 1884, 11 R. 460.

[3] Andrews v. Drummond & Graham, March 5, 1887, 16 R. 568.

[4] Cunningham v. Phillips, June 16, 1868, 6 Macph. 923, 40 Scot. Jur. 533; Dunn v. Bain, Jan. 24, 1877, 4 R. 317; Cunningham v. Duncan, Feb. 2, 1889, 16 R. 383.

No. 141.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

Archer against John Ritchie & Company, the proprietors of the Evening Dispatch. The documents said to contain the slander consist of a report which appeared in the Evening Dispatch of a meeting of a lodge of the Good Templar Society, a leaderette, and a placard.

The first of these documents, namely, the report of the meeting, is headed "Mr Archer's Crooked Ways," and states that a meeting of a Good Templar Lodge had been held, and that after certain business Brother Hamilton made these remarks—(His Lordship then read the report of Brother Hamilton's address as given above). Now, this is a report of what Brother Hamilton is stated to have said, and it appears to me that it does not contain slanderous matter. What it reports Brother Hamilton to have said seems to me to be just this, that Brother Archer urged him to become a candidate for the Grand Chiefship, as he, Brother Archer, was not himself going to stand; that he, Brother Hamilton, consented, and that Brother Archer changed his mind—that is, after he had urged Brother Hamilton to stand,—and gave him no intimation of this change of mind. That seems to me to be the only reasonable construction that can be put upon the document, and I certainly fail to see that it is a slanderous statement to say that a person who had urged another to stand as a candidate for a particular office, for which he did not mean at the time himself to stand, afterwards changed his mind, and offered himself as a candidate without giving the other person notice of his change of mind. It may be an accusation of discourteous conduct, as Lord M'Laren called it in the course of the discussion, but it appears to me to be nothing more than that, and I can see nothing slanderous in it. No doubt the report is headed "Mr Archer's Crooked Ways," but while that may be rather a strong epithet to apply to the proceedings referred to, I do not think it alters the result. So far therefore as the report is concerned, it does not appear to me to contain defamatory or slanderous matter.

The next document—the leaderette—is perhaps even less objectionable—(His Lordship then read the leaderette already quoted). The difference between the leaderette and the report is just this—In the report it is stated that Mr Archer personally communicated to Mr Hamilton that he would not stand. In the leaderette all that is said is, that Mr Archer let it be known that he did not intend to offer himself for re-election, and suggested that Mr Hamilton should stand, and then that he changed his mind, and, as stated before, stood without giving Mr Hamilton any intimation of his change of mind. It appears to me that this is the reasonable construction of the document, and that being so, I can see nothing slanderous or defamatory in it.

No doubt, however, while there may be nothing slanderous upon the face of the documents, the pursuer is entitled to put an innuendo upon them, but, at the same time, he is not entitled to put upon them any innuendo he may choose to propose. In my view, the only innuendo which can be allowed is such as, on a fair and reasonable construction, the alleged slanderous documents will bear. The question, accordingly, which remains is, whether the proposed innuendo is one which can fairly be put upon the documents complained of? That innuendo is in these terms—"By the statements above quoted the defenders intended to represent, and did represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of deceitful and dishonourable conduct, and that he habitually indulged in conduct that was unfair and deceitful and dishonourable, and that he was unworthy of the confidence and respect of the members of the said Order." I fail to see that on a reasonable construction the documents contain any charge of deceitful or dishonourable conduct. If it had been said that Mr Archer intended himself to stand for the Chiefship at the time he urged Mr Hamilton to stand, and concealed his intention, that might have been a charge of deceitful conduct, but I should have thought it doubtful whether it was slanderous. No such statement, however, is made, and while the pursuer may be charged with discourtesy he is charged with nothing more. The innuendo proposed by the pursuer then goes on—"The said statements further represented that the pursuer had wilfully misled the said James Hamilton by statements which he, the pursuer, knew to be false, and that the pursuer had been guilty of unfair and treacherous conduct towards Mr Hamilton, and that the pursuer was a man who was frequently guilty of wilfully misleading others by statements known by him to be false, and of unfair and treacherous conduct in his dealings with others, and that he was a man who was unworthy of trust or confidence." I cannot see any possible reading of the documents which would lead to that construction. No false statement is alleged to have been made by Mr Archer. Nothing unfair or treacherous is alleged against him. In my opinion, therefore, the documents will not bear, on any reasonable or proper construction, the innuendo sought to be put upon them.

No. 141.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

That disposes of everything but the placard, which the defenders are said to have issued upon the same day as they published the report and leaderette, bearing the words, "Mr Archer and his Crooked Ways." Now, that placard simply indicates to the public the contents of the newspaper, and that anyone desirous to see it would find something in it which the publishers characterised as crooked ways. Now, that is a very strong expression, and probably comes being as near defamatory as can be, but, upon the whole matter, I do not think that any person reading that placard would put the construction upon it proposed by the pursuer, or would see anything in it detrimental to Mr Archer's reputation and character. Upon the whole matter, my opinion is that there is no issuable matter in the record, and differing from the Lord Ordinary, I think the action should be dismissed.

Lord M'Laren.—In this action, which is instituted against the proprietors of the Evening Dispatch newspaper, the pursuer claims damages for an alleged libel contained in (1) a report of a speech delivered by a gentleman designed as Brother Hamilton at a meeting of a branch of the Good Templar Society; (2) an editorial comment on this report, and (3) a placard in which the title of the editorial article is said to have been inserted, apparently by way of advertisement of the contents of the newspaper.

The Lord Ordinary has approved of an issue for the trial of the cause, and we are now to consider whether his Lordship's interlocutor is well founded—that is, whether an issue of libel can be extracted from the facts of the case as set forth in the summons and closed record.

As Mr Archer was not present at the meeting at which Mr Hamilton made the speech, he cannot in any view be held to have given a consent to the publication of the report of the proceedings, and therefore if the speech is a libel on Mr Archer, or if the speech contains expressions which may be properly sent to a jury on the issue of libel or no libel, the defenders are undoubtedly responsible for any damage which may have resulted from the publication. But it appears to me that the speech as reported does not contain any expressions reflecting on the pursuer's character or calling for vindication by legal proceedings.

No. 141.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

The substance of the speech (I mean the scheduled part of it) is this—Mr Hamilton refers to his own unsuccessful candidature for the presidency of the society, and he explains that Mr Archer, who is the President or "Grand Chief" of the society, had called on him at the end of a year of office, stating that he did not desire re-election, and inviting the speaker, Mr Hamilton, to come forward for the post. Then Mr Hamilton goes on to say that Mr Archer had eventually offered himself for re-election, but had not given the speaker any notice of his having changed his mind on the subject, and had thereby placed the speaker in an embarrassing position—in the position, which he did not desire, of appearing to oppose the re-election of his Chief.

The speech might possibly be construed into an imputation of want of courtesy on the part of Brother Archer towards Brother Hamilton. This is the only innuendo which, as I think, can be extracted from the speech. The law, however, does not take cognisance of charges of this kind, but leaves it to the party aggrieved to put himself right with his friends by making the necessary explanations, to which he will generally be able to give the same publicity which was given to the original attack.

It is right to add that, as I read this speech, it was not intended to convey any imputation whatever against Mr Archer. Mr Hamilton merely sought to explain the cause of his apparent antagonism to Mr Archer, and in doing so he could not avoid mentioning Mr Archer's omission to give him notice of his change of mind. But his references to Mr Archer are perfectly respectful, and the circumstance that he received a vote of thanks for his address indicates that they were so understood by the audience, as it is not likely that the members of the society would vote their thanks for a speech which contained a covert attack on the character of their Chief.

The question arising on the editorial article or "leaderette" involves somewhat different considerations. The article refers to Mr Hamilton's speech, of which it gives a summary, and in commenting on the proceedings of Mr Archer the writer uses the expression Mr Archer's "sharp practice." I do not find that the article misrepresents what took place at the meeting. This is not alleged in the record, nor are there any facts alleged which would give a meaning to the article different from the apparent meaning. The case then is, that on a true report of a speech, which is not in itself libellous, the writer of the article expresses an unfavourable opinion regarding Brother Archer's conduct. Now, the expression of an opinion as to a state of facts truly set forth is not actionable, even when that opinion is couched in vituperative or contumelious language. The Good Templars are a society constituted for public objects and appealing to the public for support, and observations on their proceedings cannot be said to lie outside the legitimate sphere of journalism. I see nothing in the expressions used which can be construed as an imputation on the moral character of the pursuer—nothing, indeed, beyond what persons taking a part in public work must be content to bear with good temper, and, if necessary, to meet by suitable reply.

There remains for consideration the publication of the placard alleged to contain the inscription "Mr Archer and his Crooked Ways." The difference between this case and the case in the report is that the placard, of course, goes to the public without the explanatory statement which renders innocuous the use of the same expression in the report. It is plain enough that a libel may be conveyed by a placard as well as by any other publication in print or writing. On the other hand, the proprietors of the newspaper are entitled to say that the primary and indeed sole ostensible purpose of the circulation of such placards is to call attention to the contents of the newspaper which is thus advertised. It is also to be observed that metaphorical expressions, such as "crooked ways," when applied to the acts of an individual, may be intended to refer either to his moral or intellectual characteristics, or, it may be, to such faults of temper or breaches of the minor morals as may be criticised without exposing the critic to an action of damages. In this case the placard merely announced a paragraph in the newspaper on the subject of Mr Archer's "crooked ways." No facts are averred giving a sinister meaning to this expression, which I take to be not necessarily or obviously defamatory. The words do not naturally import a charge of deviation from moral rectitude, but rather a habit or preference for getting at results by circuitous and indirect methods, instead of by proceeding in a direct line to the object in view. Such insinuations when made with respect to the public action of an office-bearer or member of a social or political association may be disagreeable, but they are not actionable. They do not, in my opinion, amount to a charge of dishonesty. The Lord Ordinary has proposed to put in issue whether the pursuer is charged with "dishonourable conduct." But the word "dishonourable" is a mere epithet; it does not import a substantial charge, and is not self-explanatory. It is, I think, an expression of the same character as "crooked ways," and is not injurious in a legal sense. In all the circumstances I am of opinion that there is no case here for a jury, and that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the action.

No. 141.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Archer v. Ritchie & Co.

Lord Kinnear concurred.

The Lord President was absent.

The Court assoilzied the defenders, with expenses.

Irons, Roberts, & Company, S.S.C.—Henderson & Clark, W.S.—Agents.

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

Margaret Latta or Panton or Cameron, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Asher—Aitken.

Robert Henderson and Others (Panton's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Dickson—Guy.

Discharge—Implied discharge—Annuity.—A widow was entitled under her marriage-contract to an annuity from her husband's estate. In an action by her for payment of certain half-yearly portions of this annuity her husband's trustees admitted that during the period in question she had not received the annuity directly, but stated that during that period she had resided with her husband's mother, who was liferentrix of the estate, that the money had been paid to the latter, and that the pursuer had agreed to her maintenance during that period being set against her annuity. They produced a minute of a meeting of the husband's trustees, of whom the pursuer was one, and at which she was present. The minute, which was not signed by the pursuer, bore,—"This annuity, Mrs Panton stated, had not been paid directly to her, but as she just lived in family with the late mother-in-law, "out of whose funds and the rents of Mr Panton's property the house expenses were defrayed, she was willing to let the annuity be set off against her maintenance." The pursuer deponed that she did not understand what took place at the meeting, and that she never agreed to give up her claim to the annuity during the time she resided with her mother-in-law. Parole evidence was led to shew that the pursuer acquiesced in and approved of the manner in which the annuity had been applied. The trustees also produced eleven receipts for half-yearly payments of the annuity subsequent to the death of the husband's mother. Held that no intention to discharge the trustees had been proved.

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

Question as to the competency of parole evidence to prove the discharge.

Receipt—Discharge—Stamp.—In defence to an action by a widow for certain half-yearly payments of an annuity, to which she was entitled under the will of her husband, his trustees alleged that the pursuer had agreed to hold her maintenance by the liferenter of her deceased husband's estate as equivalent to her annuity for the time, and produced a document titled an "acknowledgment" by her, which set forth certain half-yearly moieties of her annuity, including those sued for, and which concluded,—"I acknowledge that my annuity as above detailed has been duly accounted for to me by the trustees of the late" husband. It was signed by her, but bore no stamp. Held that the document was of the nature of a receipt, and being unstamped could not be looked at as evidence of the alleged agreement.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. I.

THIS action was raised on 23d May 1890 by Margaret Latta or Panton or Cameron, widow of Malcolm M'Bryd Panton, Glasgow, thereafter wife of the Rev. H. P. Cameron, against the trustees under Mr Panton's settlement for payment of five half-yearly payments, due at Martinmas 1880 and four following terms, of an annuity of £100, to which she was entitled under her marriage-contract.

It was not disputed that the pursuer was entitled on the death of Mr Panton, which took place on 23d June 1880, to an annuity of £100 during the life of Mr Panton's mother, and thereafter to an annuity of £250 (subject to a restriction in the event of a second marriage).

The defenders stated that after the death of Mr Panton the pursuer resided with his mother, Mrs Panton senior, till her death on 16th November 1882, and that in December 1882 the pursuer had stated to the trustees that she was willing to let the annuity be set off against her maintenance with Mrs Panton senior from June 1880 to Martinmas 1882, and that she had discharged her claim to these payments.

They further stated that since the death of Mrs Panton senior the pursuer had regularly received her annuity and had validly discharged all the termly payments. The defenders produced more than three consecutive receipts for these payments which contained no reservation of arrears.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The pursuer having discharged her claim to the sums sued for, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) The pursuer having set off or otherwise abandoned her claim for the arrears of annuity sued for, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (6) The pursuer having been in receipt of, and having duly discharged, without complaint or reservation, the termly payments of her annuity, for a period exceeding the last three years, she ought to be held to have discharged all arrears of said annuity beyond that period, and, in particular, the arrears sued for, and the defenders are therefore entitled to be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed a proof before answer.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . . Mrs Panton [senior] died on 16th November 1882. The defenders have produced receipts for payment of the annuity of £250 since her death. The series of receipts is not quite unbroken, but there are more than three consecutive receipts. The defenders plead that in respect of these payments she ought to be held to have discharged all arrears. They plead the apocha trium annorum, and it was maintained that the presumption of payment thence arising could only be elided by the writ or oath of the debtor. While I think the defenders are entitled to the benefit of the presumption, I think their plea goes too far.

"I consider that the presumption may be redargued by evidence—Cockburn v. Stuart, 1669, M. 11,398; Buccleuch v. M'Turk, 24th June 1845, 7 D. 927, 17 Scot. Jur. 483; Tait on Evidence, 472; Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, ii. 445. The case of Hunter v. Kinnaird's Trustees, 5th March 1829, 7 S. 548, 1 Scot. Jur.

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891. Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

It was admitted that from Mr Panton's death in June 1880 till the death of Mrs Panton senior the pursuer and her child resided with her. Mrs Panton senior drew the whole income of Mr Panton's estate, and had from that and other sources an income of about £600 per annum.

The defenders produced a minute of a meeting held by them after the death of Mrs Panton senior. It was not signed by the pursuer, although she was one of Mr Panton's trustees and was present at the meeting.

The minute, after stating that Mr Cowan, the agent for the trustees, had explained the provisions in favour of Mrs Panton under the marriage-contract, proceeded with regard to the annuity during the life of Mrs Panton senior,—"This annuity, Mrs Panton stated, had not been paid directly to her, but as she just lived in family with the late Mrs Panton, out of whose funds and the rents of Mr Panton's property the house expenses were defrayed, she was willing to let the annuity be set off against her maintenance prior to the term of Martinmas last."

The defenders further produced a document entitled "Acknowledgment" by the pursuer, and dated 18th April 1885. It was headed,—"Statement of the annuity due to the widow of the late Malcolm M'Bryd Panton under a contract of marriage between them." It contained a statement of each half year's annuity, under deduction of income-tax, from Martinmas 1880 to Whitsunday 1884, and then the following:—"I acknowledge that my annuity, as above detailed, has been duly accounted for to me by the trustees of the late Malcolm M'Bryd Panton." This document was signed by the pursuer, but bore no stamp.

The pursuer in her evidence mentioned various circumstances explaining her delay in raising the action, in particular that she was obliged to leave her second husband in April 1885 and go to Manitoba. It was before leaving Scotland that she signed, on 18th April 1885, the "acknowledgment" above referred to, which she said she did not understand. She returned to Scotland in 1888. The claim made in the action was first put forward on 23d December 1889. The pursuer's second marriage was terminated by her obtaining decree of divorce against her husband.

Mr Cowan, the agent, had died before the proof. The three trustees of Mr Panton who signed the minute above quoted deponed that at that meeting the widow had acquiesced in the proposal therein recorded.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . . (4) that the pursuer and her daughter resided in family with Mrs Panton senior until her death on 16th November 1882; (5) that Mr Panton's trustees paid the full income of his estate to his mother during her sur-

---

130, appears at first sight to favour the defenders' contention, where, in defence to an action for arrears of rent, discharges of rent for five consecutive years were produced, and Lord Corehouse, Ordinary, assoilzied the tenant, in respect the landlord did not offer to prove that the arrears were due by the writ or oath of the tenant. But that case presented this peculiarity, that each receipt bore to be for the balance of the rent, thereby, as observed by Lord Balgray in the Inner-House, 'necessarily implying that the balance had been ascertained, struck, and settled.' If this opinion be read along with the report in the Faculty Collection, it would rather appear that the proof was limited to the writ or oath of the debtor, rather because the receipts by their terms implied a settlement of all balances of rent than because of the force of the presumption arising from three years' consecutive payments.

"While I hold that the defenders are entitled to this presumption, I have not thought it necessary to affirm it at present in any finding, which might possibly be embarrassing, partly because I am unable to affirm any plea of the defenders on the point. . . ."

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

vivance of him; (6) that the pursuer while resident with her mother-in-law did not demand, and did not directly receive, payment of the said annuity; (7) that at a meeting of Mr Panton's trustees, held on 4th December 1882, the pursuer agreed to hold her maintenance by her mother-in-law as an equivalent for her said annuity; (8) that thereafter, and till immediately prior to the raising of this action, Mr Panton's trustees paid to the pursuer the annuity due to her under her husband's marriage-contract, and that she granted receipts therefor: Finds that in these circumstances the pursuer must be held to have discharged her claim for her annuity during the period of her residence with her mother-in-law: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns." *

---

* "OPINION.— . . . After careful consideration I have found myself unable to sustain the pursuer's claim.

"She had undoubtedly a good claim against her husband's trustees for her annuity. They could not have resisted her demand for it. But it is to be noticed that the payment of it was not imposed on them as a special trust duty. She did not demand her annuity while her mother-in-law was alive, and it has never been paid to her directly. Further, I think there is nothing in process which can be received as a written discharge of the annuity during the period in question. The document No. 14 of process bears to acknowledge that it has been accounted for; but I have great difficulty in accepting that document as a discharge, or receipt, or acknowledgment. If it be put forward as a receipt or discharge, it would, I apprehend, require to be stamped. But it is not holograph nor tested, and although the pursuer has admitted her signature, I think her admission must be taken with the qualification she attached to it, namely, that she did not fully understand it. It is besides rather fictitious, and does not represent the facts as they occurred. It acknowledges the annuity half-yearly, under deduction of income-tax, when, in fact, it never was paid at all. Had Mr Cowan been alive, and had he explained the circumstances, the case might have been different. As matters stand, I do not proceed on the document.

"The unfortunate circumstances attending the pursuer's second marriage, the condition of her health, and her absence abroad, afford some explanation of her delay in bringing this action, and some excuse for it; and cases might readily be imagined in which the presumption arising from consecutive termly discharges might be more conclusive than in this case.

"I have much more difficulty in accepting the pursuer's explanation that she did not fully understand the nature of her right to this annuity. Her husband had told her of it. She knew that her annuity after her mother-in-law's death was payable by her husband's trustees, and it is not easy to see how she took up the idea that during her mother-in-law's life it was payable by her and not by the trustees. Besides, it is not explained why, if she thought so, she made no demand for it against her mother-in-law's trustees.

"I consider that the case of the defenders depends on the circumstances set forth in the minute of the trustees of 4th December 1882. The pursuer lived with and was maintained by her mother-in-law. She knew that Mrs Panton senior was receiving the whole income of Mr Panton's estate, and she made no objection. It was very fair and reasonable that she should hold that the trustees had practically paid her annuity when they paid the whole income of the estate to her mother-in law, with whom she and her daughter lived in family. It was practically a payment to her; and I think if it be proved by parole that she assented to that arrangement, that such proof, taken along with the consecutive discharges for subsequent termly payments, will competently and sufficiently instruct a discharge.

"The minute of meeting bears that Mr Cowan explained the pursuer's rights under her marriage-contract, and that she stated her willingness to allow her claim for arrears of annuity to stand against her maintenance. The three trustees who sign the minute depone to its substantial accuracy, although naturally they

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891. Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The annuity was due under the marriage-contract. It was certain that it had not been paid. There was no sufficient evidence of implied discharge, nor that the pursuer had ratified a payment improperly made to someone else. The trustees produced the alleged acknowledgment, but that was in its nature a receipt, and was worthless as a receipt, for it was unstamped.

Argued for the defenders;—The debt was discharged by the actings of parties. Such a mode of discharge had often been sustained,[1] and here the facts proved implied a discharge. A presumption arose from the existence of receipts from 1882 onwards that the annuity before 1882 had been paid,[2] and that presumption had not been redargued. The "acknow-cannot speak to precise words. The evidence of Mr Lyon, who was one of Mrs Panton's trustees, is not, it is true, so satisfactory. But he is eighty-seven years old, and could not be expected to recollect precisely the details of a meeting in 1882.

"I am unable to hold the pursuer's evidence as meeting that of the three trustees. There cannot be any doubt that Mr Cowan went over the provisions in the marriage-contract. It is not a complicated deed, and the provisions in favour of the pursuer are clearly and simply expressed. I am really unable to accept the pursuer's explanation that she did not understand them. She is a lady of intelligence and clear apprehension as to matters of business, and I must think that, in this matter, her recollection is at fault. It would, considering her misfortunes and her illness, be no wonderful matter if it were, and the fact that she really did forget having received the £100 of aliment should not be left out of account.

"It is much to be regretted that Mr Cowan's evidence has been lost. The action, no doubt, was raised while he was alive, but his evidence would have been available but for the delay in the pursuer's claim. There can be no doubt about his view on the whole matter, for he was the author of the minute, and, perhaps, it is not going too far to say that Mr Cowan's character and professional standing exclude all doubt as to the minute expressing the facts as he understood them.

"On the whole, I think it proved that the whole liferent of Mr Panton's estate was paid to Mrs Panton senior with the knowledge of the pursuer; that the pursuer knew that she was entitled to £100 a-year out of this liferent; that she received it practically and substantially, although not directly; that she verbally agreed to accept her maintenance in her mother-in-law's house as an equivalent for her annuity; and that she afterwards, for a period of eight years, received and discharged her annuity; and I am of opinion that these circumstances amount to a discharge of the annuity during the period of her residence with her mother-in-law.

"When allowing a proof, I expressed the opinion that the receipt for so many consecutive years of the annuity gave rise to a presumption of discharge or satisfaction. That there is such a presumption is, I think, settled by authority, and it appears to me that the true question in this case is, has that presumption of satisfaction or discharge been displaced? I think not. The pursuer has proved, no doubt, that she did not receive the annuity directly, and I have held that it has not been shewn that she gave a written discharge; but the presumption of law cannot possibly be a presumption in favour of a written discharge, but in favour of a verbal or implied discharge. I consider that the weight of the evidence is not against, but is strongly in favour of such a discharge, and that the defenders are therefore entitled to absolvitor."

[1] Russell's Trustees v. Russell, Dec. 11, 1885, 13 R. 331; Laird of Polwart v. Laird of Halyburton, 1667, M. 12,704; Thomson's Trustees v. Monteath's Trustee, June 27, 1834, 12 S. 842; Ryrie v. Ryrie, June 26, 1840, 2 D. 1210, 1 Scot. Jur. 575; M'Laren v. Howie, Nov. 6, 1869, 8 Macph. 106, 42 Scot. Jur. 52. Henry v. Miller, March 18, 1884, 11 R. 713; Irvine v. Leng, March 6, 1840, 2 D. 804.

[2] Authorities in Note by Lord Ordinary, supra, pp. 729, 730.

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

ledgment" was not a receipt. It was rather of the nature of a fitted account, and therefore required no stamp.[1] It did not come within the definition of receipt in the Stamp Act, 1870.* It was good evidence of payment, though not stamped.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat curious case. It appears that the pursuer after her husband's death continued to live with his mother so long as that lady lived, and that during that time she did not demand from her husband's trustees payment of an annuity of £100 which was due to her during her mother-in-law's lifetime, and which after the death of her mother-in-law was to be increased to £250. The mother-in-law was well provided for. She had, we were told, about £600 a-year, and it could hardly be supposed that she intended to get the pursuer's £100 a-year, and to keep it as against her aliment. There is at least no evidence that such a thing was intended.

It appears that in December 1882, after the mother-in-law died, the trustees of Mr Panton held a meeting at which the pursuer was present, and at which questions were brought up as to her rights, and as to what money she was to receive. After dealing with the pursuer's mournings and interim aliment the minute of meeting bears to deal with "an annuity of £100 a-year so long as the late Mrs Panton was in life, commencing the first payment at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after Mr Panton's death. This annuity Mrs Panton stated had not been paid directly to her, but as she just lived in family with the late Mrs Panton, out of whose funds and the rents of Mr Panton's property the house expenses were defrayed, she was willing to let the annuity be set off against her maintenance prior to the term of Martinmas last." Now, that is the statement in the minute. It is signed by the three trustees, but by no one else. If Mrs Panton was to be bound by the statement in the minute there would have been no difficulty in writing a couple of lines at the foot of it and getting her, if willing to do so, to sign that. All will admit that that was what a man of business carrying out the matter in a businesslike way would have done if that was really the arrangement come to at the meeting. But I think the minute as it stands is a mere narrative of what the trustees and the agent understood to be in the mind of Mrs Panton at the time, and I do not think that she is bound by it, or that it can be regarded as a discharge by her to the trustees.

It is said, however, that Mrs Panton's claim is barred by lapse of time. That consideration, however, tells as much against the trustees as against Mrs Panton, because if the matter had been carried out in a businesslike manner there would have been no question of difficulty created by lapse of time.

---

[1] Fell v. Rattray, Jan. 28, 1869, 41 Scot. Jur. 236.

* The Stamp Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 97, enacts (sec. 120),—"The term 'receipt' means and includes any note, memorandum, or writing whatsoever whereby any money amounting to £2 or upwards, or any bill of exchange or promissory-note for money amounting to £2 or upwards, is acknowledged or expressed to have been received or deposited or paid, or whereby any debt or demand or any part of a debt or demand of the amount of £2 or upwards is acknowledged to have been settled, satisfied, or discharged, or which signifies or imports any such acknowledgment, and whether the same is or is not signed with the name of any person."

[2] M'Laren v. Howie, supra; Arnott v. Countess of Orkney, 1611, M. 16,960; Rule v. Aiton, 1628, M. 16,961; Stephen v. Pirie, Feb. 1, 1832, 10 S. 279, 4 Scot. Jur. 270.

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

The next thing founded upon is that the pursuer put her name to an account which we have had before us, and upon which we have heard a good deal of argument as to whether it is a receipt or not. The defenders say it is not. If it is anything I think it is a receipt, and, being unstamped, it is entirely invalid. The defenders say it is a fitted account. I think there is nothing of that nature about it. It is headed "Statement of the annuity due to" the pursuer. That is the sort of heading we might expect to find in an account which is to be settled or receipted. Then there follow entries of various half-yearly payments of annuity, income-tax being deducted, and at the foot, below the sum of £516, which is brought out, are these words,—"I acknowledge that my annuity as above detailed has been duly accounted for to me." There is nothing of the nature of a fitted account about that. That being so, I do not think the defenders can found on it as a discharge. They cannot therefore shew any writ entitling them to say that the pursuer has discharged them. Since then they have no writ, and have been unable to get Mrs Panton to say that she received her annuity, or discharged it, I am of opinion that we must give decree against them.

LORD YOUNG.—I am substantially of the same opinion. The pursuer sues her deceased husband's trustees for five half years' annuity due to her under the contract of marriage. There is no question that the annuity was well constituted by the marriage-contract, and that the sums sued for are due unless they have been paid or discharged, nor yet that the defenders are the debtors. The only question is whether they have been paid. It is not said that they have been paid to herself. Were they then paid to anyone else with her authority? or lastly, has she ratified a payment to someone else? The trustees say that they paid them to her mother-in-law, and that she ratified the payment as a good and effectual payment to herself. That is the only issue in the case, for it is not maintained that they were paid to someone with her authority. The sole defence is ratification or homologation of payment to the mother-in-law, and the question is if that is proved. I think that there is no evidence of that. There is some parole evidence that she stated that she was willing to set off these payments of her annuity against her maintenance with her mother-in-law, but without entering into detail I may say that I am not at all satisfied that there was any ratification.

The document founded upon as a fitted account contains a statement of the annuity from 11th November 1880 to 15th May 1884, and therefore contains more payments than the five half-yearly payments sued for. What is the acknowledgment it makes? It is,—"I acknowledge that my annuity as above detailed has been duly accounted for to me by the trustees of the late Malcolm M'Bryd Panton." That is certainly like a receipt. It is like nothing else. It is a receipt or nothing, and it is not stamped. I say this, though I think it was not intended as a receipt but as a ratification. I cannot regard it as a ratification any more than as a receipt. The defence is therefore not established, and decree must be given.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also think that the pursuer must prevail. The constitution of the debt is not disputed. The only question is whether the debt is discharged. There is no written discharge unless it be the document of 1885. I hold that to be a receipt, and a receipt only. It falls clearly within the definition of a receipt, and it is unstamped. The trustees cannot therefore by it prove that they are discharged. Is there then any other legal proof of discharge? It was maintained that the pursuer had homologated payment to her mother-in-law as a proper and sufficient payment of her funds. I entertain great doubt whether parole evidence was admissible on such a subject. Had a payment been made after a verbal agreement that it should be made, it might have been argued that the agreement could be proved by parole. But there is no such case. The payment was made to the mother-in-law without the pursuer's authority, and the question is whether she ratified or homologated that. I have great doubt if parole evidence was admissible to prove that, and apart from that legal question I am clearly of opinion that there is no sufficient proof of homologation.

No. 142.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Cameron v. Panton's Trustees.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. The constitution and amount of the pursuer's claim are not disputed. The question is if the claim was paid. It is clear that there is no competent evidence of payment. Payment is not said to have been made to herself. What is said is that it was made to another person, and that she subsequently ratified it as equivalent to payment to herself. I think the proof of that fails entirely.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

W. A. HYSLOP, W.S.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

ROBERT STEWART LIVINGSTONE, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Jameson—G. W. Burnet.
MISS MARY STEWART BEATTIE, Respondent.—C. J. Guthrie—Macfarlane.

Lease—"Crofter"—Tenant—Residence—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 34.—The 34th section of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, enacts,—"In this Act 'crofter' means any person who at the passing of this Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed £30 in money, and which is situated in a crofting parish, and the successors of such person in the holding, being his heirs or legatees."

Held that a subtenant was not a crofter within the meaning of the Act.

Held further, that a person who, between 1885 and 1888, lived at a distance from his holding, visiting it only occasionally for a week or a fortnight at a time to do necessary farm work,—the house being at other times during this period unoccupied,—was not a crofter within the meaning of the above definition, in respect that he had not complied with the condition as to residence.

(ANTE, March 19, 1890, 17 R. 702.)

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

In December 1889, Robert Stewart Livingstone, designed as residing at Tornain, on the farm of Barr, Morven, Argyllshire, brought a suspension of a decree of removing, obtained in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire by Miss Mary Stewart Beattie of Crieve and Glenmorven, proprietor of the farm of Barr, ordaining him to remove from the dwelling-house and lands of Tornain.

The ground of suspension was that the complainer possessed the house and lands of Tornain as a crofter within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, and as such was liable to be removed only in terms of that Act.

The respondent in answer denied that the complainer was a crofter in the sense of the Act:—(1) In respect that he was not tenant of the house and lands of Tornain, but only subtenant under James Thomas Shaw, the tenant of the farm of Barr at the date of the Act; and (2) in respect that the complainer was not resident at Tornain at that date.*

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

After a variety of procedure (ante, 17 R. 702) a proof was allowed. The parties put in a minute agreeing to hold the proof in the removing as proof in the suspension, and renouncing further probation.

No question was raised in the action of removing as to whether the complainer was tenant of Tornain in the sense of the Crofters Act. In the record in that action (which the complainer referred to and held as repeated in the record in the suspension) the complainer stated:—"At the date of the passing of the said Act, the defender was a yearly subtenant under the said James Thomas Shaw, of a holding at Tornain on the said farm of Barr, consisting of two acres or thereby of arable land, and right of pasturage in common with three other subtenants of the said James Thomas Shaw, together with a dwelling-house. In respect of the said holding the defender paid to the said James Thomas Shaw a rent of £6." The complainer also gave the evidence quoted below.†

---

* The Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 34, enacts, inter alia, "In this Act 'crofter' means any person who at the passing of this Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed £30 in money, and which is situated in a crofting parish, and the successors of such person in the holding, being his heirs or legatees."

The Act does not give a definition of "tenant," but provides that expressions other than those defined have the same meanings as in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62).

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, in sec. 42, contains, inter alia, the following definition:—"Tenant means the holder of land under a lease."

Sec. 24 of the same Act provides that a landlord on paying compensation under the Act to a tenant shall be entitled to obtain from the Sheriff authority to charge the holding or the estate of which it forms part in respect thereof, and continues—"The Sheriff shall have power, on proof of the payment, and on being satisfied of the observance in good faith by the parties of the conditions imposed by this Act, to grant authority to the landlord to charge the holding or the estate of which it forms part, by executing and registering in the Register of Sasines a bond and disposition in security over it for repayment of the amount paid or any part thereof, with such interest and by such instalments as the Sheriff may determine; or if the landlord has only a leasehold interest in the holding, by executing and duly registering in the Register of Sasines an assignation of the lease in security and for repayment of the amount paid, or any part thereof, with such interest and by such instalments as the Sheriff may determine."

† The complainer deponed,—"My father was born in Morven, and lived there most of his days, but went to Perth to learn his trade. I cannot tell when he returned, but it is more than sixty years since. When he returned to Morven he was a miller at Bunavullin to the Duke of Argyll. He was twelve or fourteen years miller there. He was shifted over with Miss Stewart bought the property, and she got a friend of her own as miller. He went then to Corry Kingairloch, and stayed there a year or two, and returned again to Miss Stewart. He then went to a place called Ardentibber. The size of holding we had there was a croft of two cows, a share of a horse, and a share of the pasture, which was common to ten in the township. He paid £7 for his croft in Ardentibber to Miss Stewart. He was in possession of that holding till Miss Stewart let the farm of Barr and Ardentibber to a tenant named Kirkpatrick. About eight or nine years after taking possession of the croft in Ardentibber, he was removed to a croft in Tornain. That is my present croft. We were at Ardentibber a few years after Mr K.

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Livingstone v. Beattie.

Upon the question whether the complainer was resident at Tornain in the sense of the Act (which was the only question raised in the action of removing), the facts established by the proof were these. At Whitsunday 1885, the complainer, who had till then lived at Tornain with his sister, left Tornain and went to live in Oban with another sister. He retained the holding, which he visited occasionally, for a week or a fortnight at a time, as the necessities of farming required. Except during these visits the house at Tornain was unoccupied, but during the whole time it remained furnished. The complainer and his sister returned there in 1888.

The Sheriff-substitute (Maclachlan) granted decree of removing on the ground that the complainer did not fulfil the condition as to residence required by the Act. The Sheriff (Forbes Irvine) adhered on the same ground.

On 5th August 1890, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor in the suspension:—"Finds (1) That, at the date of the passing of the Crofters Holdings Act, the complainer occupied a croft or holding at Tornain, on the farm of Barr, which was then under lease to Captain James Thomas Shaw; (2) That he was not then a tenant of said croft or holding in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act; (3) That he did not at said date reside on the said holding: Therefore finds that he is not a crofter, and that he was duly removed from said croft or holding at the instance of the respondent: Repels the reasons of suspension, and decerns."*

---

patrick got the farm. During all that time I was on the holding myself. . . . My father died twenty-five years ago. Before he died, he was disabled, and I worked the croft. After his death I became the subtenant. The croft is two acres, arable land and common pasture land. It was never measured. When I became subtenant of the holding Mr Oliver was the principal tenant. I continued in the holding on the same conditions as my father had left it. Mr Oliver was principal tenant for twenty-eight years, and continued to be principal tenant for about fifteen years after I got the holding. Captain Shaw had the farm after Mr Oliver, for seven years. He entered in 1880, and held it till 1887. I continued my holding under Captain Shaw on same conditions as under Mr Oliver. There was no change made in the conditions of holding when my father ceased to be Miss Stewart's tenant. The rent when I first took possession was £7. Captain Shaw reduced it in 1887 to £6. It is now £6."

* "OPINION.— . . . The questions then are (1), was the complainer a tenant of his holding on 25th June 1886? and (2) did he then reside on the holding?

"(1) Was the complainer a tenant of his holding on 25th June 1886?

"He was not at that time the respondent's tenant, but he was Captain Shaw's tenant,—that is to say, he was a subtenant. Nothing was said about this question in the Sheriff Court, because it was assumed that the word 'tenant' in the sense of the Act included subtenant. It was quite natural that this should have been assumed, because in one case the Crofter Commissioners decided that the term 'landlord' included a principal tenant or middleman—Keith v. Mackay, First Report, p. 103. This determination was, I understand, founded on the last paragraph of the interpretation clause, which runs thus,—'Other expressions have the same meanings as in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883,' language which appears to incorporate the latter interpretation clause in the Crofters Act, and I think it must be admitted that, in the Agricultural Holdings Act, the word tenant may mean subtenant. The second paragraph of section 24 of that Act seems conclusive to that effect.

"I ought probably to mention that, in the case of M'Dougall v. M'Allister, 6th March 1890, 17 R. 555, I decided that the word tenant or crofter used in the Act did not include subtenant, holding that the Act related only to the proprietor and his immediate tenant. My judgment was affirmed by the Second

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The complainer was a tenant within the meaning of the Crofters Act. He was not a subtenant Division, but that part of the judgment was not questioned, because the party in the Inner-House claimed only to be a cottar. I suppose therefore it was not considered. Their Lordships do not allude to it, and on that account that case cannot be quoted as a judgment on the point.

"I think, however, that when so deciding that point, I had not sufficiently considered the effect of the reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act, and I do not think I was referred to the deliverance of the Crofters Commissioners.

"The reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act gives certainly strong support to the view that a subtenant may, as such, be a crofter, and the opinion of the Crofters Commissioners is, no doubt, of great weight. Nevertheless, on a reconsideration of the question, and a renewed study of the Act, I have still great difficulty in holding that the words 'landlord' and 'crofter' can be read as meaning principal tenant and subtenant.

"But for the reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act, I would hardly have thought it doubtful that the Act dealt only with proprietors and their tenants. The interpretation clause defines a crofter as a tenant, but contains no express interpretation of the word tenant, but the word tenant may be substituted throughout the Act for crofter. Now, the various sections of the Act speak of two persons only—landlord and crofter or tenant—and none of them contemplates three possible persons—landlord, tenant, and subtenant. The landlord mentioned is the crofter's landlord. The crofter is the landlord's tenant, so that if in any section the meaning of either word is certain, the meaning of the relative word in that clause is also ascertained. It is not, I think, possible in any clause to understand proprietor by the word landlord, and subtenant by the word crofter.

"Now, if the Act be read giving the word landlord its usual meaning, and interpreting crofter as meaning the landlord's immediate tenant, there is no difficulty in so reading the Act. No contradiction or confusion or anomaly arises, at least no anomaly except what necessarily arises from the novel conception embodied in the Act. But if the attempt be made to substitute principal tenant for landlord, and subtenant for crofter, the difficulty of so reading the Act will be found to be very great.

"Section 1 specifies the statutory conditions of the crofter's permanency of tenure. Some of the subsections may be read intelligibly in whichever way the words landlord and crofter be understood, but in subsection 4 landlord can only mean proprietor, and if so tenant can only mean principal tenant, otherwise the subtenant might, with consent of the immediate tenant, subdivide or sublet the holding, or erect buildings on it, without regard to the wishes or interests of the proprietor, which, it is to be supposed, was not intended.

"The purposes for which the landlord is authorised by subsection 7 to enter on the croft are proprietary purposes.

"If crofter in subsection 8 can mean subtenant, then a house for the sale of intoxicating liquors might be opened against the proprietor's wishes if the consent of the principal tenant were obtained.

"Section 3 provides for resumption by the landlord, and the purposes mentioned are plainly purposes which only a proprietor could entertain, and it is almost impossible to imagine a case in which a tenant could resume land from a subtenant under that section.

"Under section 5 the existing rent seems to be stereotyped, unless altered by the commission or by subsequent agreement, but it would, it is thought, be strange to empower a tenant with a merely temporary right, which might be expiring, to fix by agreement with a subtenant the rent which would be payable to the proprietor, after the principal lease had run out, without the landlord having anything to say in the matter.

"By section 7 a crofter may renounce his croft on intimation to his landlord, and by section 8 he is entitled to compensation for permanent improvements. If he were a subtenant, he would intimate his renunciation to the principal

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Livingstone v. Beattie.

in the sense that his holding had been let to him by Captain Shaw, the tenant of Barr. He and his father had been on the farm before Shaw tenant, and not to the proprietor, and I suppose the tenant would have to pay the compensation for permanent improvements for which he might obtain no benefit, and the landlord, who might be greatly benefited, would escape. None of these difficulties arise if the words landlord and tenant be understood in their ordinary sense.

"The provisions in division V. of the Act in regard to enlargement of holdings appear manifestly to refer only to proprietors and principal tenants. For it is surely very difficult to hold that it was intended to empower a subtenant to claim from the principal tenant an additional portion of the land held under lease. (Section 13.)

"These remarks illustrate the difficulty of holding subtenants to be within the scope of the Act.

"Taking a more general view, it appears to me that it would be very odd to hold that a tenant with a mere temporary right could put a subtenant in a position to acquire a permanent right, and that against the proprietor with whom he had no contract or relation of any kind.

"It appears to me, besides, that the Act does not contemplate that the crofter shall have a right more permanent in its character than that of the landlord from whom it is derived. It is only, I consider, a proprietor's land, and not a tenant's, which the Act appropriates.

"But no doubt the reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act creates considerable difficulty. The contention is that the interpretation clause in the Crofters Act is itself to be interpreted by the interpretation clause in the Agricultural Holdings Act. That is surely a very rough and dangerous method of construing an interpretation clause.

"The scope and general purposes of the two Acts are perfectly different. The one Act is almost limited to the regulation of the tenant's compensation on the expiry of his lease. The object of the other Act is to make the tenant's right permanent. Now when, in the Agricultural Holdings Act, an artificial meaning is put on certain words, and among others, on the words landlord and tenant, which is supposed to be adapted to the particular provisions and purposes of that Act, it could only be by a lucky chance that these artificial meanings could be appropriate to a totally different Act, which has a totally different and very much wider scope and purport, and therefore I think that the reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act must really be read with this qualification, that the interpretation clause of that Act is to be adopted only where the context permits, and that, where such an interpretation is opposed to the fair scope and meaning of the Act, it is not incumbent to adopt it.

"Accordingly, the artificial phraseology of the Agricultural Holdings Act, while it does suit that Act, does not appear to square at all with the Crofters Act.

"An illustration may be found in the word 'lease.' It does not occur often in the Crofters Act, but I think it impossible to understand the word lease in section 11 in accordance with the interpretation clause in the Agricultural Holdings Act.

"I have thought it desirable to notice this point at some length, because it is raised directly by the pleadings, and it is a point of great general importance, as to which an authoritative judgment, should this interlocutor be taken to review, might be desirable.

"It is true that the proof has not been specially directed to this point, because it does not seem to have been taken in the Sheriff Court. But the facts seem sufficiently ascertained. The case no doubt presents a certain amount of speciality, because, having in view the length of time during which the complainer and his father have occupied this croft, their position certainly approximated closely to that of other crofters who were direct tenants of the landlord. But it is fully admitted that the complainer was not, at the date of the Act, a tenant of the proprietor, but of Captain Shaw, and the case must be taken so, and

No. 143.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

became tenant, and were taken over with it by Shaw. Such cases were common in the Highlands, and it would to a large extent defeat the purpose of the Crofters Act to hold that it did not apply to them. Even taking it that the complainer was a subtenant, he was within the Act. The word "tenant," if construed by reference to the definition of tenant in the Agricultural Holdings Act (as the interpretation clause of the Crofters Act directed it should be), must be held to include subtenant, for sec. 24 of the earlier Act plainly shewed that that Act applied to subtenants. (2) The complainer also fulfilled the condition as to residence. He had not at the date of the Act left the croft with the intention of not returning to it. In point of fact he must be held to have had his residence there constructively, in the first place because he was in the practice of visiting the croft for considerable periods, secondly, because he kept the house furnished for use; and thirdly, because he had no residence elsewhere at the passing of the Act; he merely happened to be visiting his sister.

Argued for the respondent;—The complainer admitted on record and in his evidence that he was a subtenant, and subtenants were not within cannot depend on that speciality, but on the general question whether the Act authorises the appropriation of the land of a tenant, or only of the land of a proprietor.

---

"The Sheriffs have, however, decided the case on a totally different ground. They have held that the complainer did not at the date of the Act fulfil the condition of residence on his holding. The case on this point seems to me to be narrow; but, on the whole, I concur in the judgment in the Sheriff Court. It would be of little use to refer at any length to the evidence. There is little or no discrepancy in it, and the import of it is plain enough.

"From Whitsunday 1885, and for two years or three afterwards, it is quite certain that the complainer lived chiefly in Oban. Oban was, no doubt, within tolerably easy reach of Tornain, and the complainer visited Tornain whenever the performance of the agricultural operations connected with it was required. During the half year before the Act passed, he spent, I think, between thirty and forty days at Tornain, and the rest of the half year at Oban. I do not think that it was intended by the Act that a crofter should be always living on his croft. I think it was contemplated that he should sometimes be absent eking out a livelihood elsewhere—as, for example, by fishing, or the like. But I think it was contemplated that he should make his home on the holding, and not anywhere else. It was well remarked at the debate that the statute contemplated occupiers of crofts who did reside on their holdings, and occupiers who did not, and that the complainer was an example of an occupier who did not reside. He used it as an agricultural subject, and he allowed the dwelling-house on it nearly to fall into ruin. He was not absent on a mere occasion, or from a temporary cause, but was absent habitually, with only occasional visits to the holding.

"Reference was made to recent poor-law cases in which the principle of constructive residence has been carried very far; for example, in the case of Dow v. Nixon, 17th June 1884, 11 R. 945, a man was held to have retained a residential settlement in the parish of Port-Glasgow who had been in Australia for above five years, but who had maintained his wife and family during that time at Port-Glasgow. In the recent case of Watt v. M'Guire, 21st Dec. 1888, 16 R. 263, the same principle was applied in a question as to a qualification to vote as an inhabitant occupier. But I do not see any room for the application of that principle here. For when the complainer was absent the house was left empty altogether, and nobody resided in it. I think that a closer analogy is to be found in cases relating to the residence of a tenant on a farm, and reference was made to the case of Edmund v. Reid, 26th May 1871, 9 Macph. 782, where an offer by a tenant to keep a furnished house on the farm, with a servant therein, and to reside in it for ten days in every two months, was held an offer to implement an obligation to reside on the farm."

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

the Act. In the first place, the definition of tenant in the Agricultural Holdings Act did not expressly include subtenants, and it was, at the utmost, the definitions only of that Act which were to be imported into the Crofters Act, which was to be construed as if the mere definitions had been written in it. Assuming, however, that it was legitimate to import the definition as construed by the substantive provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, the argument of the complainer failed, for sec. 24 had reference only to subtenants under long leases, which might be registered. (2) The complainer had failed to establish the condition as to residence in his holding.

LORD ADAM.—The question raised here is whether the complainer was a crofter in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, at the date of the passing of that Act. The 34th section of the Act contains a clear definition of what the Act regards as a crofter; it is, "Any person who at the passing of this Act is tenant of a holding from year to year, who resides on his holding, the annual rent of which does not exceed £30 in money, and which is in a crofting parish." Among other things, therefore, a person to be a crofter must be a tenant from year to year, and he must reside on the holding. The respondent says that the complainer possesses neither of these qualifications. The first question, accordingly, is whether the complainer was tenant of his holding within the meaning of the Act.

Now, in that matter the position of the complainer in point of fact is not doubtful. In the third article of his statement of facts the complainer refers to his defences in the action of removing, and states that they are "here held as repeated brevitatis causa." That reference makes it necessary to refer to the record in the action of removing, and we there find this averment by the defender:—"At the date of the passing of the said Act the defender was a yearly subtenant under the said James Thomas Shaw, of a holding at Tornain, of the said farm of Barr, consisting of two acres or thereby of arable land, and right of pasturage in common with three other subtenants of the said James Thomas Shaw, together with a dwelling-house. In respect of the said holding the defender paid to the said James Thomas Shaw a rent of £6." Then on coming to the evidence we find that this averment is in conformity with the fact, for in his evidence the complainer makes the following statement,—"The croft is two acres, arable land and common pasture land. It was never measured. When I became subtenant of the holding Mr Oliver was the principal tenant, I continued in the holding on the same conditions as my father had held it. Mr Oliver was principal tenant for twenty-eight years, and continued to be principal tenant for about fifteen years after I got the holding. Captain Shaw had the farm after Mr Oliver for seven years. He entered in 1880, and held it till 1887. I continued my holding under Captain Shaw on same conditions as under Mr Oliver. There was no change made in the conditions of holding when my father ceased to be Miss Stewart's tenant. The rent when I first took possession was £7. Captain Shaw reduced it in 1887 to £6. It is now £6." Now, that makes it quite plain that the complainer's holding was part of the farm of Barr let to Captain Shaw, and that he was not tenant of that holding, but was subtenant under Captain Shaw. The fact that Captain Shaw regulated the amount of the rent to be paid by the complainer to him makes that quite clear. I have no doubt that Captain Shaw was the tenant of the holding, and think further that there cannot be two separate tenants of the same holding,

No. 143.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

and if, therefore, Captain Shaw was the tenant, that is sufficient for the decision of the case, because it follows that the complainer was not the tenant.

The pursuer, however, maintained that he derived aid from the interpretation clause of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. The last clause of the interpretation section of the Crofters Holdings Act says that "other expressions have the same meanings as in the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883," and the complainer argued that as there is no definition of tenant in the Crofters Act we must go back for a definition to the Agricultural Holdings Act. Now, that Act defines "tenant" as "the holder of land under a lease," which is as accurate a definition as could be given of Captain Shaw's position at the date of the Crofters Act, and it is not said that it necessarily includes subtenant, but it is argued that if the definition is construed by reference to the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, "tenant" is shewn to include subtenant. Upon this point the Lord Ordinary, in commenting upon a recent decision of the Crofters Commissioners, makes these observations,—"This determination was, I understand, founded on the last paragraph of the interpretation clause, which runs thus:—'Other expressions have the same meanings as in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883'—language which appears to incorporate the latter interpretative clause in the Crofters Act, and I think it must be admitted that in the Agricultural Holdings Act the word tenant may mean subtenant. The second paragraph of section 24 of that Act seems conclusive to that effect." There seems to me to be a fallacy in what the Lord Ordinary here says, because if you turn to the part of the 24th section of the Agricultural Holdings Act to which the Lord Ordinary refers, you find it to be there provided that the Sheriff may authorise a landlord who has paid compensation to charge the holding therewith by executing and registering a bond and disposition in security over it for repayment, "or, if the landlord has only a leasehold interest in the holding, by executing and duly registering in the Register of Sasines an assignation of the lease in security, and for repayment of the amount paid, or any part thereof, with such interest and by such instalments as the Sheriff may determine"; but the Lord Ordinary has, I think, failed to see that this provision does not refer to ordinary leases, but to long leases, and the powers given under the Registration of Long Leases Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 26), which are of the nature of proprietary rights. Therein, I think, probably lay the fallacy which induced the Crofter Commission to take a wrong view of the effect of the Agricultural Holdings Act, and also led the Lord Ordinary to the conclusion that in that Act the word tenant included subtenant.

In my opinion, therefore, the complainer has failed to shew that he was a tenant of the holding in question within the meaning of the Crofters Act.

The other question, namely, in regard to the residence necessary to entitle a person to the benefits of the Crofters Act, also involves a question of fact,—that is to say, the question whether or not the complainer was resident on his holding at the date of the passing of the Act. On that matter the evidence stands thus—At Whitsunday 1885 the complainer and his family left the holding and settled in Oban. He resided there till 1888, when he returned to his holding. During this interval, which included the date of the passing of the Act, no one was left in occupation of the holding, but at various periods when the farm required his presence the complainer returned to the holding, and lived in the house, which had been during his absence standing empty. The length of his residence on the holding during these visits varied from a week to a fort-

No. 143.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

night or even longer. Now, I cannot say that such occasional visits by the complainer between the years 1885 and 1888 are sufficient to constitute residence upon the holding in the sense of the 34th section of the Crofters Act. During that period his real residence was in Oban. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that poor-law cases have no bearing on this question.

On the whole matter therefore I am of opinion that we should adhere.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and I have very little to add. It appears to me that the theory on which the Crofters Act proceeds is that a proprietor having incurred a responsibility by encouraging persons of small means to live on his estate as annual tenants of small portions of land, and having brought this class of tenant on to his estate, should not be allowed without good cause to deprive them of their tenancy by eviction. I do not know that there was any reason to apprehend that this would be done to any considerable extent, but still it was thought desirable that, within reasonable limits, tenants of this class should have fixity of tenure so long as they fulfilled the obligations of their tenancy. If that is the principle of the Act, it is plain enough that it has no application to the case of a subtenant, because it is against all reason that a proprietor should be bound to maintain in perpetuity on his land any number of crofters who have been brought there not by himself, but by a tenant holding, it may be, only under a nineteen years' lease. Accordingly, I am not surprised that the Act contains no provision applying to subtenants. I agree in thinking that the omission is designed, and I think it is perfectly clear. The statute, whether taken by itself or with the gloss sought to be put upon it from the Agricultural Holdings Act, intends by the word "tenant" a person holding direct from the proprietor of the ground. This, I think, receives indirect confirmation from the special clause in the Agricultural Holdings Act applying to leaseholders. The terms of that clause could not be used with reference to an ordinary agricultural or pastoral lease, for they refer to leases which are capable of registration in the Register of Sasines. That a person holding under such leaseholders should have certain rights is certainly no reason for extending these rights to persons holding under an ordinary tenant farmer, who in fact are mere labourers brought on the farm for the sake of their labour.

I think, therefore, that the complainer has not made out his claim to be considered a tenant in the sense of the Act.

I am also disposed to think, though I have greater difficulty on this point, that owing to his non-residence he has not fulfilled another condition which is one of the elements in the definition of a crofter.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree on both points.

I only desire to add a single observation. We were told that there are many places in which crofters' holdings have been included within the bounds of large farms, and it was urged very strenuously that these occupiers ought not on that account to be deprived of the benefits of the Act. If it is true that there is such a class of occupiers, nothing we have now decided will, in my opinion, affect the question between such persons and their landlord. It may well be that an occupier of such a kind may be a tenant of the proprietor notwithstanding the fact that his holding lies within the bounds of a farm, and notwithstanding even the fact that he pays rent to someone else than the landlord; but if he is a tenant he must hold of the proprietor; and the ground of our judgment, I conceive, is that the complainer by his own statement negatived the idea that he

No. 143.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Livingstone v. Beattie.

held under the proprietor at all, because he says that he was "a yearly subtenant, under the said James Thomas Shaw, of a holding at Tornain on the said farm of Barr," and the evidence does not in any way displace that averment, but on the contrary confirms the view that he held under no agreement with the proprietor.

LORD M'LAREN.—I desire to express my concurrence in the additional observations made by Lord Kinnear. There may be such a class of occupiers as has been described holding another position from that with which we have here to deal, and I should not like to say anything to prejudice their case.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

D. MACLACHLAN, S.S.C.—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 144.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

JOHN LAWRENCE REID, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Shaw—Kennedy.
MRS MARY SANDERSON OR HALDANE AND OTHERS (Haldane's Trustees).—D.-F. Balfour—Clyde.

Proof—Property—Marches—Admissibility of plan as evidence.—In a dispute in 1889 as to marches between two landowners, whose lands had at one time formed parts of the same barony, the pursuer tendered as evidence a plan bearing the date 1842. It had been found in the possession of a third person, owner of another part of the original barony, who had at one time had a claim over the disputed ground identical with the claims of the pursuer, who had bought up his rights. It was not known on whose instructions or for what purpose the plan had been made. It had at one time passed with the titles of the defenders' predecessors, and a copy of it had been used by them in connection with a projected sale of their lands. Held that it was competent evidence.

Property—"Right and privilege"—Superior and Vassal—Subject feu.—Jus quæsitum tertio—Res inter alios acta.—On 19th August 1723 the proprietor of the barony of Struie granted feus of four portions thereof to different persons,—(1) The wester half of Mains of Struie, with the privileges and haill pertinents thereof as marched from the other half, "with half of the right and privilege of the loan leading to and from that hill belonging to the haill Mains of Struie called Douchrie," about 600 yards distant, "according as the said loan lies meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie." (2) The easter half of Mains of Struie described in the same way, mutatis mutandis. (3) Whitehill, "reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Struie leading to the hill of the said Mains called Dochrie, as the said loan lies and is meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and lands of Baulk of Struie from Powstink to the Overnook of Tamacreich Dyke, in which space the said loan is not to be cast upon by the possessors of Mains of Struie." (4) Baulk of Struie, "reserving the loan belonging to Mains of Struie, which leads to the hill of the said mains, . . . all along, as the said loan lies meithed and marched betwixt the said lands of Baulk and Whitehill of Struie."

In 1889 the proprietors of the wester half of Mains of Struie, who had also acquired right from the proprietor of the easter half to the latter's right to the hill of Dochrie, and to the loan, brought an action against the proprietor of Whitehill and Baulk for declarator that the pursuer had the right of property in the loan. The defender maintained that it belonged to himself, or alternatively to the superior, who, however, had no right of access to the loan. There was no trustworthy evidence of possession, the whole lands having been possessed together in tenancy for upwards of forty years. Held on a construction of the titles, aided by an estate plan dated in 1842, which shewed Whitehill and Baulk as non-contiguous, and included the loaning within the boundary lines of Struie and Dochrie (1) that it was not to be presumed that the property in the loaning had been retained by the superior; (2) that the property in the loaning had not been given out to Whitehill and Baulk; and (3) that the phrase "right and privilege" was sufficient to carry it with Mains of Struie.

No. 144.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.
2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 19th August 1723 Dr Robert Hay, proprietor of the barony of Struihay, granted feus of portions of the barony as follows:—

1. To Edward Rutherford the wester half of All and Whole the Mains of Struie, with the privileges and haill pertinents of the same, "as this half stands presently meithed, marched, and divided from the other half of the said Mains of Strowie, presently fewed to David Condie, portioner, of Pitquhanatrie, and speciallie, without prejudice to the generality foresaid, with the rights, priviledges, and liberties after mentioned, to witt, the half of the tree yeard, and half of the right and priviledge of the loan leading to and from that hill belonging to the heall Mains of Strowie called Douchrie, according as the said loan lyes meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Strowie."

2. To David Condie the easter half of Mains of Struie with the rights and privileges described in the same way, mutatis mutandis.

3. To John Robertson, one just and equal half of All and Haill the town and lands of Whitehill of Struie, "reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Strowie leading to the hill of the said mains called Dochrie, as the said loan lies and is meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and lands of Baulk of Strowie from Powstink to the Overnook of Tamacreich Dyke, in which space the said loan is not to be cast upon by the possessors of the Mains of Strowie."

4. To Robert Niving All and Haill the east half of Whitehill of Struie, reserving as in the previous lot.

5. To William Carmichael All and Haill the town and lands of Baulk of Struie, "reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Strowie, which leads to the hill of the said Mains called Douchrie, all along, as the said loan lyes and is meithed and marched betwixt the saids lands of Baulk and Whitehill of Strowie; and reserving right and privilege to the feuars and possessors of the Milne of Strowie, and of the lands of Mains and Barnhill of Strowie, to lead their elding from the said hill of Strowie Mains called Douchrie through the saids lands of Baulk, conform to use and wont."

In August 1889 Mr John Lawrence Reid, then proprietor of the wester half of the Mains of Struie, who had also in 1888 obtained a disposition from Mrs Vale, proprietor of the easter half of the Mains of Struie, of her pro indiviso half of the hill of Dochrie, with her "half of the right and privilege of the loan leading to said hill," presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire against the trustees of Robert Haldane, who had acquired Whitehill and Baulk from Mr Condie, of Perth, in 1828, praying the Sheriff to find and declare that the pursuer was proprietor of the hill belonging to the haill Mains of Struie called Dochrie, "and of the loan leading to and from said hill, according as the said loan lies meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie, belonging to the defenders, but subject always to a servitude of road or passage, as enjoyed at present near . . . for access between said lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie belonging to the defenders; to find and declare that the pursuer is entitled to erect fences on both sides of said loan, and to interdict the defenders from encroaching in any way on said loan, except in the exercise of said servitude right."

The loan in question was about 600 yards long, and of varying width, averaging from 20 to 25 yards. There was a feal dyke at either side of it, but these were much worn, and no longer served as adequate fences.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Pursuer being proprietor of the loan in question, but the defenders contesting his right, he is entitled to declarator, in terms of the prayer of the petition, subject to the defenders' servitude

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

right of road across the loan. (2) Pursuer is also entitled to erect fences on each side of the loan, and interdict should be granted against the defenders' interference. (4) In any view, the pursuer having the right and privilege of the loan, and the defenders having no right therein except the servitude right of road across it, they are not entitled to object to his fencing the loan on both sides, subject always to defenders' due exercise of such servitude right.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) On a sound construction of the titles, the pursuer is not entitled to decree, as concluded for. (4) The said loan being the property of the defenders, and the pursuer having only the right and privilege of using the same as a passage between his said properties, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The pursuer having no right in or to the said loan, except that of using it as a means of passage between his said properties, has no right to interfere with the state of possession of the said loan by the defenders, as the same has subsisted from time immemorial, or to exclude the defenders from the said loan, or to fence the same, and has no right to the interdict craved.

When the record was closed the defenders prayed to have the process transferred to the Court of Session, and this was done.

A proof was allowed by the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), with a view of establishing the state of possession, and the course of custom as regarded the fencing of the loan. The result was quite inconclusive on both points, for this reason, that from 1845 till shortly before the date of the action, the whole lands in question—both those of the pursuer and those of the defenders—were occupied together by the same tenants; while prior to 1845 the evidence was not only extremely meagre, but related to a period when, the whole country being more or less open, little attention was paid to such questions as those at issue between the parties.

Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary), on 20th March 1890, assoilzied the defenders.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . What has to be decided is, whether upon the just construction of these titles the property of the loan is with (1) the pursuer, or (2) the defenders, or (3) the superior. The pursuer of course requires to establish that it is with him. It is enough for the defenders on the other hand that the property is either with them or was not given off at all, but was reserved (intentionally or unintentionally) by the superior.

"I am unable to hold that the pursuer's title, even when construed by the aid of the defenders' title, establishes his alleged right of property. Prima facie a grant of a right and privilege of way or passage implies servitude and not property, and in this view it is not material whether a right of 'loan' is a mere right of passage or a right of passage plus pasturage. In either case the grant is a grant of a right and privilege, and it would require in my opinion very cogent grounds of construction to justify the conclusion that a right of property was conveyed by that expression. I do not say that such a construction is impossible, but in the first place I find nothing in the pursuer's title which at all helps such a construction. The purpose in view is quite satisfied by a grant of servitude. There seems no reason why, if a grant of property was intended, it should not have been expressed. And, on the other hand, the pursuer's argument on the application of the words 'right and privilege' to the half of the 'tree yeard' seems much too remote and conjectural, at all events in the absence of information as to what the tree yeard was, and what was the nature of the right to it which the superior possessed. Altogether, if the question had to be decided on the pursuer's title, I hardly think there could be room for doubt. The pursuer's case really rests on an appeal to the terms of the defenders' title, and assuming such an appeal to be competent (which for purposes of construction it probably is), the defenders' title appears to me to do no more at best than raise a difficulty. It is no doubt in the pursuer's favour that the reservation of the loan is not expressed as the reservation of a servitude, but as the reservation of the loan

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed.

On 15th July 1890 the Second Division allowed a plan to be lodged by the pursuer, and allowed a proof with reference to it. That proof was taken before Lord Rutherfurd Clark on 18th November. The plan shewed the properties of Baulk and Whitehill separated from each other, each enclosed within a coloured line of its own. On the other hand, one continuous coloured boundary enclosed Struie and the hill of Dochrie, running up and down the side of the loan, so as to embrace the loan and both these properties within the same line. No evidence was led to shew by whom the plan had been prepared, or upon whose instructions. It was dated 1842. It was found in possession of a person who had purchased an adjoining estate called Pitquhanatrie, also shewn on it, from Mrs Vale, but it was shewn to have been handed in 1857, along with the titles of Baulk and Whitehill, at that time belonging to Mr Condie, to the law-agents in Perth who acted as trustees under a voluntary trust-deed granted by Mr Condie on his bankruptcy. A copy of it was also referred to in correspondence which passed in 1860 between these trustees and a person who wished at that time to buy Baulk and Whitehill.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The plan was competent evidence, or at least the defenders, whose predecessors had used it, could not be heard to object to it, and, if it were admitted, it went far to prove the pursuer's case. His case was also supported by the evidence of the feal dykes. It was not disputed that in the circumstances the superior must be presumed to have given out to one or other of the parties all he had, but he had clearly not given the loan to Baulk or Whitehill, therefore he must have given it to Struie. The phrase "right and privilege" was habile to convey a right of property.[1] And, again, since "one-half" of this "right and privilege" was conveyed, that implied that "right and privilege" meant something more than a servitude, which could not be cut into halves.

Argued for the defenders;—The plan was not competent evidence, for no one knew for what purpose it had been made or in whose interest.[2] It might well be that the superior had not given out the property in the loan to anyone, and in that case the pursuer, being the owner of a mere itself, and of the loan as a subject belonging to Struie, and lying betwixt the lands of Baulk and Whitehill. It is also in the pursuer's favour that at least in the Whitehill title there is an exclusion of the right of the possessors of Struie to cast (i.e., I suppose, to cast peat) on a certain part of the loan. But this last clause is at least extremely obscure; and with respect to the terms of the reservation itself, it seems to me that the defenders have at least two answers to the pursuer's argument. In the first place, the language may probably be more suggestive of a reservation of property than of servitude, but making allowance for looseness of expression, it is, I think, quite consistent with, and quite satisfied by, the hypothesis of servitude. In the second place, if that be held otherwise, and the reservation be construed as a reservation of a right of property, I do not see how anything else follows than that the right of property so reserved is still in the superior. Ex hypothesi he has in a question with the defenders reserved the property in express terms, but ex hypothesi also he has in terms not less express confined the pursuer to a servitude. There is, in short, no more reason for construing the pursuer's title favourably to him by the help of the defenders' title, than for construing the defenders' title favourably to them by the help of the pursuer's title. In other words, as I have already said, the defenders' title, if appealed to, raises a difficulty, but does no more.

---

"I therefore decide the case on the titles and in favour of the defenders. . . ."

[1] Duke of Hamilton v. Graham, July 28, 1871, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 98, 43 Scot. Jur. 491.

[2] Place v. Earl of Breadalbane, July 17, 1874, 1 R. 1202.

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

right of road across the loan. (2) Pursuer is also entitled to erect fences on each side of the loan, and interdict should be granted against the defenders' interference. (4) In any view, the pursuer having the right and privilege of the loan, and the defenders having no right therein except the servitude right of road across it, they are not entitled to object to his fencing the loan on both sides, subject always to defenders' due exercise of such servitude right.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) On a sound construction of the titles, the pursuer is not entitled to decree, as concluded for. (4) The said loan being the property of the defenders, and the pursuer having only the right and privilege of using the same as a passage between his said properties, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The pursuer having no right in or to the said loan, except that of using it as a means of passage between his said properties, has no right to interfere with the state of possession of the said loan by the defenders, as the same has subsisted from time immemorial, or to exclude the defenders from the said loan, or to fence the same, and has no right to the interdict craved.

When the record was closed the defenders prayed to have the process transferred to the Court of Session, and this was done.

A proof was allowed by the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), with a view of establishing the state of possession, and the course of custom as regarded the fencing of the loan. The result was quite inconclusive on both points, for this reason, that from 1845 till shortly before the date of the action, the whole lands in question—both those of the pursuer and those of the defenders—were occupied together by the same tenants; while prior to 1845 the evidence was not only extremely meagre, but related to a period when, the whole country being more or less open, little attention was paid to such questions as those at issue between the parties.

Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary), on 20th March 1890, assoilzied the defenders.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . What has to be decided is, whether upon the just construction of these titles the property of the loan is with (1) the pursuer, or (2) the defenders, or (3) the superior. The pursuer of course requires to establish that it is with him. It is enough for the defenders on the other hand that the property is either with them or was not given off at all, but was reserved (intentionally or unintentionally) by the superior.

"I am unable to hold that the pursuer's title, even when construed by the aid of the defenders' title, establishes his alleged right of property. Prima facie a grant of a right and privilege of way or passage implies servitude and not property, and in this view it is not material whether a right of 'loan' is a mere right of passage or a right of passage plus pasturage. In either case the grant is a grant of a right and privilege, and it would require in my opinion very cogent grounds of construction to justify the conclusion that a right of property was conveyed by that expression. I do not say that such a construction is impossible, but in the first place I find nothing in the pursuer's title which at all helps such a construction. The purpose in view is quite satisfied by a grant of servitude. There seems no reason why, if a grant of property was intended, it should not have been expressed. And, on the other hand, the pursuer's argument on the application of the words 'right and privilege' to the half of the 'tree yeard' seems much too remote and conjectural, at all events in the absence of information as to what the tree yeard was, and what was the nature of the right to it which the superior possessed. Altogether, if the question had to be decided on the pursuer's title, I hardly think there could be room for doubt. The pursuer's case really rests on an appeal to the terms of the defenders' title, and assuming such an appeal to be competent (which for purposes of construction it probably is), the defenders' title appears to me to do no more at best than raise a difficulty. It is no doubt in the pursuer's favour that the reservation of the loan is not expressed as the reservation of a servitude, but as the reservation of the loan

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed.

On 15th July 1890 the Second Division allowed a plan to be lodged by the pursuer, and allowed a proof with reference to it. That proof was taken before Lord Rutherfurd Clark on 18th November. The plan shewed the properties of Baulk and Whitehill separated from each other, each enclosed within a coloured line of its own. On the other hand, one continuous coloured boundary enclosed Struie and the hill of Dochrie, running up and down the side of the loan, so as to embrace the loan and both these properties within the same line. No evidence was led to shew by whom the plan had been prepared, or upon whose instructions. It was dated 1842. It was found in possession of a person who had purchased an adjoining estate called Pitquhanatrie, also shewn on it, from Mrs Vale, but it was shewn to have been handed in 1857, along with the titles of Baulk and Whitehill, at that time belonging to Mr Condie, to the law-agents in Perth who acted as trustees under a voluntary trust-deed granted by Mr Condie on his bankruptcy. A copy of it was also referred to in correspondence which passed in 1860 between these trustees and a person who wished at that time to buy Baulk and Whitehill.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The plan was competent evidence, or at least the defenders, whose predecessors had used it, could not be heard to object to it, and, if it were admitted, it went far to prove the pursuer's case. His case was also supported by the evidence of the feal dykes. It was not disputed that in the circumstances the superior must be presumed to have given out to one or other of the parties all he had, but he had clearly not given the loan to Baulk or Whitehill, therefore he must have given it to Struie. The phrase "right and privilege" was habile to convey a right of property.[1] And, again, since "one-half" of this "right and privilege" was conveyed, that implied that "right and privilege" meant something more than a servitude, which could not be cut into halves.

Argued for the defenders;—The plan was not competent evidence, for no one knew for what purpose it had been made or in whose interest.[2] It might well be that the superior had not given out the property in the loan to anyone, and in that case the pursuer, being the owner of a mere itself, and of the loan as a subject belonging to Struie, and lying betwixt the lands of Baulk and Whitehill. It is also in the pursuer's favour that at least in the Whitehill title there is an exclusion of the right of the possessors of Struie to cast (i.e., I suppose, to cast peat) on a certain part of the loan. But this last clause is at least extremely obscure; and with respect to the terms of the reservation itself, it seems to me that the defenders have at least two answers to the pursuer's argument. In the first place, the language may probably be more suggestive of a reservation of property than of servitude, but making allowance for looseness of expression, it is, I think, quite consistent with, and quite satisfied by, the hypothesis of servitude. In the second place, if that be held otherwise, and the reservation be construed as a reservation of a right of property, I do not see how anything else follows than that the right of property so reserved is still in the superior. Ex hypothesi he has in a question with the defenders reserved the property in express terms, but ex hypothesi also he has in terms not less express confined the pursuer to a servitude. There is, in short, no more reason for construing the pursuer's title favourably to him by the help of the defenders' title, than for construing the defenders' title favourably to them by the help of the pursuer's title. In other words, as I have already said, the defenders' title, if appealed to, raises a difficulty, but does no more.

---

"I therefore decide the case on the titles and in favour of the defenders. . . ."

[1] Duke of Hamilton v. Graham, July 28, 1871, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 98, 43 Scot. Jur. 491.

[2] Place v. Earl of Breadalbane, July 17, 1874, 1 R. 1202.

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891. Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

servitude, would have no right to fence or to the interdict craved.[1] The pursuer had nothing more than a right and privilege, that was a right of loaning, well known to the law as a servitude right.[2] A servitude which would exhaust the whole possibilities of use, as a "right and privilege" to take coal, was not a servitude, but a right of property.[3] That was the principle of the Duke of Hamilton's case cited on the other side, but it had no application where the right and privilege did not involve the complete use or consumption of the subject, but was merely a burden on the property as here. "Right and privilege" must have its ordinary meaning, all the "rights and privileges" in the Struie titles being similarly halved. If, however, the superior were to be presumed to have given out all he had, then the defenders had the property in the loan, all that was reserved being what was given to Struie by its own title, viz., a "right and privilege," i.e., a servitude.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer is proprietor of one-half of the Mains of Struie in Perthshire, and of a hill called the Hill of Dochrie, which is at some distance from the Mains. The access from the Mains to the Hill of Dochrie, to which hill the pursuer has now the sole right, is by a loan about 600 yards long which passes between the properties of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie, both belonging to the defenders, Whitehill being on the east and the Baulk of Struie on the west. This loan, which is from 20 to 25 yards wide, was formerly marked off by peat dykes, which are sufficiently indicated still upon the ground to mark its lines.

The pursuer maintains that this loan is his property, or at least that he has sole right to it in a question with the defenders, and he proposes to fence it on either side. This is objected to by the defenders, who maintain that the properties of Whitehill and Baulk of Struie are conterminous and include the solum of the loan, and that the pursuer has only a right of passage along it.

The pursuer in support of his contention founds upon the description of the loan in the titles, where it is described as the "loan leading to and from that hill belonging to the haill Mains of Strowie called Douchrie, according as the said loan lyes meithed and marched betwixt the lands of Whitehill and Baulk of Strowie," and the way in which the right is described in the pursuer's title is "the right and privilege of the loan."

There can be no doubt that these expressions in the pursuer's title are not altogether such as would be expected in a conveyance of property, but at the same time they can hardly be said to be words usual in a description of a mere right of passage. Being words not common in titles, and somewhat ambiguous, they require construction, and can only be construed satisfactorily with relation to the state of things existing at the time of the grant as this can be ascertained from contemporaneous documents, aided by such evidence as is necessary to make them intelligible, and by such evidence of the character of the possession had in past time as may tend to throw light on the question in dispute.

It appears that prior to 1723 the whole lands of the pursuer and defenders,

[1] Haignes v. Haliburton, 1705, M. 10,623; Hagart v. Fyfe, Nov. 15, 1870, 9 Macph. 127, 43 Scot. Jur. 97; Irvine v. Robertson, Jan. 18, 1873, 11 Macph. 298, 45 Scot. Jur. 209.

[2] Erskine, ii. 9, 12; Chatto v. Lockhart, March 5, 1790, Hume, p. 734; Malcolm v. Lloyd, Feb. 4, 1886, 13 R. 512.

[3] Dyce v. Hay, July 10, 1849, 11 D., Lord Justice-Clerk at p. 1376, 21 Scot. Jur. 506.

along with certain others, were parts of a barony called Struie. In that year it was feued off in portions, one portion going to the pursuer's authors, one portion forming the lands of Baulk, and a third the lands of Whitehill, these latter two portions being the lands which lie on either side of the loan in question, and which now belong to the defenders. These properties were possessed by separate proprietors till 1828, when they were united in the person of Mr Condie of Perth, who disponed them to the defenders' author Mr Haldane.

It appears that for many years the whole properties of the pursuer and defenders were in one occupation, but that prior to 1844 they were all separately occupied.

The title given to the pursuer's author has been already noticed. The titles given to the feuars of Baulk of Struie and Whitehill are—as regards the loan—expressed in very similar terms. In the Baulk title the following appears:—"Reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Strowie which leads to the hill of the said Mains called Douchrie, all along as the said loan lyes and is meithed and marched betwixt the said lands of Baulk and Whitehill of Struie." Again it is referred to as "the loan belonging to the said Mains of Struie." In the titles of Whitehill the loan is described in the same manner, "reserving the loan belonging to the Mains of Strowie."

Thus the defenders' titles, obtained from the same author and on the same date, describe the loan in question as a reservation from the lands conveyed to the defenders' authors, and as "belonging" to the Mains of Strowie, and describe this loan so belonging to Mains of Strowie as "meithed and marched" between the properties of Baulk and Whitehill, which were then being feued off as separate estates. And accordingly the marching seems to have been accomplished not by mere indications defining the lines within which the loan was to run, but by peat dykes, the usual mode at that time of separating off one piece of hill ground from another.

It is very difficult to see how, in the face of the reservations and the titles of Baulk and Whitehill, the defenders' authors could at that time have asserted a right to take possession of and use as their own any part of the loan. The claim of each could only have been to come up to the centre line of the loan, crossing by a few yards only the peat dykes which were then erected, or if erected previously were recognised as existing by their titles. The value of such an addition to their properties would necessarily have been infinitesimal, and the properties being separate there could be no practical inconvenience in a strip of hill ground being interposed between them, while there would be great inconvenience in having the march of their properties left undetermined in the middle of a loan. The loan being described both in the pursuer's title and in the defenders' as "marched betwixt" the lands of Baulk and Whitehill, seems to indicate that the loan itself is to form the boundary of each property. The loan being a definite piece of land, marked off by fences, is described as marched betwixt two other properties named. It is very difficult to read such a description—which is common to the titles on both sides—as meaning that there is nothing between these two properties, but that they lie together, having only the imaginary line of a march between them. Had the loan been a mere reserved servitude to Mains of Struie as a dominant tenement, while the property went with the lands of Baulk and Struie respectively, it would have been reasonable to expect that this would have been clearly, as it certainly could have been easily expressed. It is to be noted that the loan is described as already existing in the earliest titles, and if it was at that time only a servitude

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

of right of passage and pasturage in passage, the language chosen to describe it in all the titles is most unhappily chosen. It is quite true, as the Lord Ordinary points out, that the language in the pursuer's title is not that usual in describing a right of property, in so far as it speaks of it as "a right and privilege," but it is equally true that the description of it as "meithed and marched" between the defenders' properties of Baulk and Whitehill is unlike a description of a servitude over two properties directly marching with one another, and that the description of it as "reserved," because "belonging" to Mains of Struie, is scarcely consistent with its having been conveyed in halves to those to whom Baulk and Whitehill were conveyed.

The proof which has been led affords scarcely any light upon the question before us. Indeed, it was hardly to be expected that it could do so, seeing that for so many years the question of right to this loan was of no importance to anyone, as the Mains and Baulk and Whitehill were all occupied by the same tenant. But a plan has been produced at the additional proof, which, if it be competent to look at it as evidence, throws considerable light upon the matter. After mature consideration I have come to be of opinion that the plan is competent evidence for our consideration. That plan is, I think, on too small a scale to admit of very accurate test by measurement of areas, and I throw out of view altogether the evidence by which it is endeavoured to shew that the loan is not part of Baulk and Whitehill. But the really important thing to be noticed in regard to that plan, which was an estate plan dated in 1842, is that upon the face of it, it does not make the lands of Baulk and Whitehill to march with one another when they are opposite the one to the other. Baulk, Whitehill, and Mains of Struie are each enclosed by a coloured margin, and the coloured margins of Baulk and Whitehill leave the loan distinctly marked between them. It is worthy of remark that a lithographed copy of this plan was before an intending purchaser of Baulk and Whitehill in 1859, and that on examination he discovered a discrepancy between the acreage as marked on each field and the acreage marked upon the margin of the plan. The question of the contents of the plan was therefore carefully gone into, but it does not seem ever to have been suggested in the correspondence that the area of the loan had anything to do with it. Now, the plan as presented to the intending purchaser upon the face of it indicated that there was a strip of ground dividing the lands of Baulk and Whitehill from one another. Each was enclosed in lines of its own, and these lines did not touch at any point. On the other hand, the lines of Mains of Struie and of the hill of Dochrie are continued along the sides of the loan, enclosing the Mains, the hill, and the loan within one line. It seems to me to be clear that the sellers, in laying that plan before the proposing purchaser, with the boundaries of Baulk and Whitehill distinctly delineated as not marching on the same line, but as separated by a strip of ground not included in the bounds of either, and included in the continuous bounds of another property, must be held to have represented the solum of the loan as not forming part of the lands to be conveyed, and that no purchaser buying on missives applicable to that plan could immediately after the bargain was concluded have demanded with any chance of success a conveyance including that solum. The preparation of a plan on behalf of the proprietor of Baulk and Whitehill, such as that now produced, would be wholly incomprehensible if it were assumed that the solum of the loan formed part of these two properties respectively, and that it was his intention to convey the loan to a purchaser buying the property as shewn upon the plan

No. 144.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Reid v. Haldane's Trustees.

Now, this plan was made in 1842, and must either have been made in respect that the older plans, if any existed, were similar, or that the titles as interpreted by the possession before 1842 were held by the proprietor of Baulk and Whitehill to exclude the right of these estates to a claim of property in the loan. It was against the interest of the estate, in whose office the plan was prepared, to have the boundaries shewn as they were when the properties of Baulk and Whitehill were intended to be sold together, and that they were so intended to be sold together is plain from the advertisement and correspondence.

The suggestion might possibly be made, that although the loan is held to be a strip of property lying between Baulk and Whitehill, and not forming part of these properties, that nevertheless it does not belong in property to the proprietor of Mains of Struie and Dochrie Hill, but remains still unfeued off by the superior, the feuar of Mains and Dochrie having only a privilege of loaning, and not having right to the solum. I am not prepared to say that the titles might not be so read, but, on the other hand, I do not think that such a reading should be adopted unless no other reading is reasonable, looking not only to the titles, but to the character of the possession. Now, it is plain that if the loan were to be held not to have been conveyed, and that only a privilege of passage and pasture was granted to the feuar of Mains and Dochrie, the anomaly would exist that the superior would possess a piece of property to which he had reserved no access, and which, it is plain, could be of no beneficial use to him after he had given off the Mains of Struie and the hill of Dochrie, on the one hand, and the lands of Whitehill and Baulk, on the other. No access to it is reserved, and none has existed except through these lands, and the possession has been entirely adverse to the idea of any such useless reservation. Holding the words of the titles not to be inconsistent with a grant of property, I am of opinion that there is no ground disclosed in this case for interpreting them in any other sense.

I have come, therefore, to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the Court should find and declare in terms of the prayer of the petition, and grant interdict as craved, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found and declared in terms of the prayer of the petition, and granted interdict as craved.

GREGOR MACGREGOR, S.S.C.—W. S. HALDANE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

JAMES ROBERTSON THOMSON AND OTHERS (Dunlop's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Pearson—Dickson.
THE CLYDESDALE BANK, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—R. V. Campbell—Ure.

Bank—Stock Exchange—Fraud.—A stockbroker, whose bank account was overdrawn, paid into it a sum of money by endorsing a cheque received by him from another broker, to whom he had sold certain shares, on instructions from a body of trustees to sell and invest the price on deposit with certain colonial banks. The ordinary course of business on the Stock Exchange is that the selling broker receives the buying broker's cheque, and makes payment to his own customer by his own cheque, or, where he has instructions to re-invest, by delivery of the new investments. The sum paid by the broker into his account did not extinguish the overdraft. The broker made no re-investment for the trustees, and within a few days absconded without having further operated on his bank account to any substantial extent. The trustees sued the bank for the sum paid in. The bank officials deponed that they believed the money to have come into the broker's hands in the course of his business as a broker.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891. Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

Held that the bank was not liable to the trustees—diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion (1) that the pursuers had proved that the sum paid into the bank by the broker was their property; (2) that in the circumstances the bank must be held to have known that the sum was not the property of the broker, and (3) that the bank was not entitled to withhold it from the owners.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. I.

THE trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Thomas Dunlop, through Mr John Ross, W.S., one of their number, instructed David B. Thomson, stockbroker, Edinburgh, to sell certain Commercial Bank shares belonging to the trust-estate, and to deposit the proceeds with certain Colonial banks. The shares were sold on 7th March 1890 for settlement on the 13th, the settlement being afterwards delayed till the 19th, in consequence of there being no meeting of directors to pass the transfer till that date.

The price of the shares was received by Thomson in the form of a cheque from the buying broker for £2921, 10s. 6d., the price of the stock being £2906, 5s., the balance being stamp-duty and the bank's fee for the transfer. Thomson on 19th March endorsed the cheque to the Clydesdale Bank in Edinburgh, and directed the bank to place £2000 to his own account, which was, before that payment, overdrawn to the extent of £4870, 15s. 1d. He got a draft on London for £900, and paid it in to his account with the same bank in London, which was then overdrawn to the extent of £805, 10s. 9d. The balance he got in cash.

Thomson made no re-investment for the trustees, and on Monday the 24th March he absconded, being hopelessly insolvent. The trustees then sued the bank for the £2900 paid into Thomson's accounts in Edinburgh and in London. They set forth the facts of the sale, payment, and lodging of the money with the defenders. They averred further that the bank were aware "that the said moneys did not belong to the said D. B. Thomson, and that they were trust-funds, which he had no right or title to deal with as his own property, or to use or apply for his own purposes." The last averment the bank denied.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The sums sued for being trust-funds belonging to the pursuers, and having been paid to the defenders without pursuers' knowledge or authority, and being still in the hands of the defenders, the defenders are bound to deliver the same to the pursuers. (2) The said funds having been handed to Mr Thomson for a specific purpose, he was merely custodier thereof, and could transmit no right of property in said funds to the defenders, who are therefore bound to restore same to the pursuers as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support their pleas. (2) The cheque in question having been paid into the bank in the ordinary course of business, and the defenders having no knowledge whatever of the purpose for which the same came into Mr Thomson's hands, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced, with expenses.

A proof was led, in which the details of the transactions narrated above were ascertained. It was proved to be the ordinary course of business for the buyer's broker to give a cheque for the price of shares bought to the seller's broker, and for the latter to give his own cheque to his employer for the price, after deducting his commission, or when he has instructions to re-invest to deliver the new investments. As regards the bank's knowledge, it was proved that the bank had no knowledge of the source of the cheque in question, but that they believed that the cheque had come into the stockbroker's hands in the ordinary course of his business as a stockbroker; and that, in the course of the previous six months, they had received in the ordinary course of business several cheques from him for sums over £2000. It was also proved that they had been informed sometime previously that the broker's overdraft was in part due to a transaction in Commercial Bank shares, which he had sold out for clients, and the proceeds of which he had re-invested before receiving the price;* they did not know that these were the pursuers' shares, and did not identify the cheque in question as having to do with that transaction.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

On 3d July 1890, Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary) assoilzied the defenders.†

---

* "Copy letter, H. T. Thomson (who was the father of David B. Thomson, and an agent of the bank at one of its branches in Edinburgh) to Mr Henderson, joint manager of the bank at Edinburgh.—Edinburgh, 24th February 1890.—Dear Sir,—Owing to the serious illness of the sole trustee upon an estate, who had sold 58 shares of the Coml. Bank of Scotland through my son David, and the re-investment of the proceeds of same having been effected, I will thank you to allow an overdraft upon David B. Thomson's a/c. with you to the extent of three thousand five hundred pounds stg. (£3500), and I undertake to see the same repaid you. This I expect will be shortly, as the other parties interested are taking steps to go upon the bank's register.—I am, yours faithfully."

† "OPINION.—The material facts of this case appear to be these. The pursuers (a body of trustees) instructed a stockbroker to sell for them certain Commercial Bank shares, and to re-invest the proceeds in deposits in certain colonial banks. The shares were duly sold, and the stockbroker received the price, and paid it into his account-current with the defenders, the Clydesdale Bank. That account was at the time overdrawn, and the sum paid in did not wipe out the overdraft. Some days afterwards, and before further operations on the account, except to a small amount, the stockbroker absconded, and was found to be insolvent. It was also found that he had made no investment on behalf of the pursuers. In fact, he had informed them that there was a difficulty about the transfer of the Commercial Bank shares, and that in consequence he had been unable to obtain the price. In these circumstances, the pursuers demand from the defenders the price of the shares paid in, as above mentioned, to the stockbroker's account, and they have brought the present action to enforce such payment, maintaining alternatively that they are entitled (1) to the whole sum paid in, less the broker's charges, which, it is admitted, he fell to deduct in settling with his client; or (2) to such part of the sum paid in as was not drawn out by the stockbroker previous to his absconding.

"These are, I think the only facts which are really material. But I may notice, lest in other views of the case other facts may be thought important (1) that the price of the shares was received by the stockbroker in the form of a cheque by the buying broker, which cheque included the price of the shares, plus stamp-duty and charges; (2) that in the ordinary course of business the cheque in question fell to be paid into the selling broker's account, as it in fact was, he giving his own cheque to his clients for the amount, less charges and commission; (3) that the bank had no knowledge of the source of the cheque in question beyond this, that they believed that the cheque had come into the stockbroker's hands in the ordinary course of his business as a stockbroker; (4) that, in particular, although they had been informed sometime previously that the broker's overdraft was in part due to a transaction in Commercial Bank shares, which he had sold out for clients, and the proceeds of which he had re-invested before receiving the price, they did not know that these were the pursuers' shares, and did not identify the cheque in question as having to do with that transaction.

"In these circumstances, the legal question is whether the pursuers have a good claim against the bank. After considering as carefully as I could the pur-

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891. Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The bank dealing, as they were with a stockbroker, and being therefore aware that in all probability the money was not his own, were bound to make inquiries as to whose property it was.[1] There was no distinction in principle on this matter between suers' argument, and the various authorities on which they found, I have come to be of opinion in the negative.

---

"The broad view of the matter, as it presents itself to my mind, is this—that the case at best for the pursuers is just the ordinary case of a person paying his just debt with money fraudulently obtained or dishonestly appropriated, but received by the creditor in ignorance of the fraud or of the dishonesty. I know no authority for holding that, in such a case, the creditor is bound to restore. It may be doubted whether a cash payment can be recovered from a just creditor in any circumstances short of actual complicity on the part of the creditor with the fraud to which the payment owes its source; but at least knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the creditor seems essential; and such knowledge on the part of the bank is here, I think, excluded by the proof. It is true they knew, or may be held to have known, that the money was probably the price of stock sold for a client; but the right of the broker to pay such money into his own bank account depended not merely on the source of the money, or on the state of his (the broker's) bank account, but also upon the state of accounts between him and his client, and perhaps also upon the prospects which he had fide had of meeting his obligations to his clients from other funds. And into those matters I do not hold that the bank was bound to inquire, or that it would be consistent with the ordinary course of business that a banker should do so.

"The pursuers founded on three classes of cases, all of which, however, are in my opinion distinguishable.

"I.—(1) Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank, 1888, L. R., 13 App. Cas. 333; (2) Cooke v. Eshelby, 1887, L. R., 12 App. Cas. 271.—These cases, as I read them, only establish or rather recognise that, where a person deposits securities, or sells goods to which he has in the knowledge of his creditor or buyer a limited or merely representative title, he cannot confer on his creditor or buyer a higher title than he himself holds. They also, no doubt, recognise that knowledge may in certain circumstances be inferred from the nature of the business which the parties do, and the course of dealing between them; but they were not cases relating to cash payments; nor do they lay down any principle which, so far as I see, can apply to the relations between a stockbroker and his bankers.

"II.—Ex parte Cook, 4 Ch. Div. 123; Knatchbull, 1879 and 1880, L. R., 13 Ch. Div. 696.—These cases again merely establish this, that where, e.g., a stockbroker has sold stock for a client and the proceeds are still extant or traceable in the broker's possession, the client has a preference in bankruptcy as against the broker's general creditors. This doctrine has, I think, obviously no application to the present case.

"III.—Wardlaw v. Mackenzie, June 10, 1859, 21 D. 940, 31 Scot. Jur. 515, and other cases which apply the maxim nemo debet locupletari aliena jactura.—These again are cases which do not at all apply to cash payments in the ordinary course of business. In particular, the case of Wardlaw related to a cautionary obligation obtained by a curator for the benefit of his ward, by means of fraud, without consideration, and challenged while matters were still entire. I do not consider that the principle there applied applies here, (1) because the defenders are not in any sense taking advantage of the fraud of their agent, or of anybody acting as their agent; and (2) because it cannot be said here that matters were entire when the bank was apprised of the fraud. It may be that the sums drawn out by the defaulting stockbroker after the payment in question were inconsiderable, but nearly a week elapsed before the pursuers' demand, and in the meantime the broker had left the country.

"Altogether, I have not been able to come to any other conclusion than that, however hard the pursuers' case may be—and it is a very hard case, undoubtedly—the defenders are not legally liable to restore the money."

[1] Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint Stock Bank, 1888, L. R., 13 App. Ca. 333.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

money and negotiable securities. There was a fiduciary relation between the pursuers and the broker, for he should have invested the price for them; he could not retain the money as against them, nor could anyone who had no higher right than he had. This consideration excluded the doctrine of Mackenzie & Aitken's case.[1] The condition figured by Lord Shand in that case was present here, and made all the difference. It let in the doctrine of Knatchbull's case,[2] viz., that you could follow the fund entrusted to the trustee, if you could earmark it, which undoubtedly you could here. The same rule prevailed in Scotland, as might be seen by a reference to the case of Macadam,[3] and a comparison of it with the case of Mackenzie & Aitken. In Macadam's case the trust relation was plain, and the remedy of vindication was given. It was not given in Mackenzie & Aitken's case, because there there were two separate transactions, viz., first, the employment of the Edinburgh broker by the client; and second, the employment of the Glasgow broker by the Edinburgh broker. The client was never put into any relation with the Glasgow broker. Nor did the case of Gibbs,[4] and the case of Eyre v. Burmester,[5] there cited, apply. In the first place, the doctrine of Lord Sheffield's case affected these decisions. In the next place, a distinction was to be taken between the case where, on the one hand, a debt was paid with stolen money, in which case the money might be vindicated by the true owner, and where on the other, an article was bought and paid for at the moment with stolen money, in which case the money could not.

The defenders argued;—The pursuers did not take the precaution they might have taken. They did not demand that the buyer's money should be paid to them directly, in which case they would have been safe. They were content to let the one broker pay the other, they themselves to get their own broker's cheque. Therefore the purchase money became Thomson's property, and he followed the ordinary course in paying it into his own bank account. That brought in the rule of Mackenzie & Aitken's case, and excluded that of Lord Sheffield's case, even if cash and securities could be treated on the same footing, which was far from being admitted. The bank then was in bona fide, and it gave valuable consideration for the money by discharging pro tanto Thomson's overdraft. The money then ceased to be Thomson's, and became the bank's, under the obligation, no doubt, if there were a balance, to repay it.[6] The bank was independent of Thomson's constituents and customers, just as his tailor would be.[7] The duty of a solicitor (Macadam's case [3]) or of a trustee was different. They must set client's or trust moneys aside in a separate account.

After the argument had been fully heard and the Court had made avizandum with the whole case, the Court desired the defenders to furnish them with further information as to Mr David Thomson's accounts with them. A minute was accordingly lodged, from which it appeared that the account with the Edinburgh office was opened on 2d January 1889, a sum of £100 being then paid in to his credit. The account with the London office was opened on 2d March 1889. The bank held as security for Mr David Thomson's overdraft two letters of obligation (the second of which is quoted on p. 753, the first being letter of obligation in ordinary

[1] Mackenzie & Aitken v. Robertson, Jan. 22, 1886, 13 R. 494.
[2] Knatchbull v. Hallett, 1879 and 1880, L. R., 13 Ch. Div. 696.
[3] Macadam v. Martin's Trustees, Nov. 5, 1872, 11 Macph. 33, 45 Scot. Jur. 31.
[4] Gibbs v. British Linen Co., June 23, 1875, 4 R. 630.
[5] Eyre v. Burmester, 1862, 10 Clk's. H. of L. Ca. 90, and 1863, 4 De Jex, Jones, and Smith, 435.
[6] Foley v. Hill, 1848, 2 Cl. and Fin. 28.
[7] Cf. Westbury, C., in Eyre v. Burmester, quoted in 4 R. p. 436.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

form), one for £600, the other for £3500, both granted by Mr H. T. Thomson, his father, who was the bank's agent at their branch in the High Street of Edinburgh. Both of these sums were paid by Mr H. T. Thomson, by cheque on his own account, and after crediting them a balance of £796. 12s. 9d. appeared as the amount of loss incurred by the bank on Mr David Thomson's account, after crediting the sum in question in this action. It was also stated in a letter from the manager of the Clydesdale Bank in Edinburgh to the manager in Glasgow, dated 29th March 1890, that the father had requested a joint manager in Edinburgh to help his son "at settlement time when required." Mr H. T. Thomson's account at the date of the second letter of obligation stood thus:—There was an overdraft of £5300, and in security the bank held securities estimated to be worth £8270.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers here are a body of trustees who gave instructions to a Mr Thomson, who was a stockbroker in Edinburgh, to sell for them certain stock which they held in the Commercial Bank—and to re-invest the money on deposit in certain colonial banks. They put him in the position of selling, and he accordingly sold to another broker those Commercial Bank shares. He received the price in the form of a cheque from the other broker, which cheque included the price and what other charges the other broker was bound to pay, and he paid the money into his bank account. It appears that he did not invest the money in these colonial deposits, but represented to his clients that there was some difficulty about the settlement of the Commercial Bank shares, and led them to understand that he had not received the proceeds. He was at that time very deep in debt, and ultimately he absconded. Of the £2900 odds he had received, £900 was transmitted by his direction to an account which he had with the agency of his own bank in London, he having an overdraft there. It appears that he had opened his account with the Clydesdale Bank some time before, and had got some security through his father towards advances which the bank might make on his account, and that security was afterwards added to by securities of considerable value. But in point of fact when he absconded his account was still overdrawn, and the bank now maintain that they are entitled to retain, as having been paid to them in payment pro tanto of their overdraft, the sum which he paid in upon that occasion.

Now, the Lord Ordinary has found that the bank are entitled to maintain that position; and after giving the matter the best consideration I can I have come to the same conclusion. There is no doubt whatever that the business as it was done was perfectly in the ordinary course of business of a stockbroker. He is entrusted by his clients with shares for sale; he is entrusted by them with the custody of the money after effecting the sale; and he is entrusted by them with the duty of making a special re-investment for them. Having sold the shares and got the money, he pays the money into his bank account, and I think that the bank are entitled to hold that money. All his banking transactions were in ordinary course; there is no suggestion that there was any collusive or fraudulent arrangement between him and the bank. It is frankly admitted by the manager of the bank that he believed this and other large sums which were passing through Mr Thomson's account to be sums which were clients' money; but as regards the transactions themselves the bank had no cognisance of them and had nothing whatever to do with them. The question comes to be whether or not this sum paid by a customer of the bank into his overdrawn bank account is a payment in cash which other parties having a claim against the customer and able to make charges against him of improper conduct are entitled to follow up and insist upon being paid to them. As I have said, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right in the decision at which he has arrived, and I so entirely concur in the reasons which he has given for his decision that I adopt them, and do not think it necessary to add anything else.

No. 145.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

My judgment therefore would be in favour of the bank, and of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think the money that was paid to the bank was a payment in extinction pro tanto of the debt then due to the bank, and that that payment cannot be gone back upon. It seems to me that was a perfectly good payment to the bank, and I do not need to enlarge upon the case, for that is the ground of my opinion. I quite assent to the views of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD TRAYNER.—I, like your Lordships, agree with the Lord Ordinary, and upon the grounds which his Lordship has stated. I entirely concur in what he has said, and think it unnecessary to add anything.

LORD YOUNG.—The pursuers are trustees under the will of the deceased Thomas Dunlop, and as such vested with the testamentary estate. Part of it consisted of shares of the Commercial Bank, which they in 1890 sold through Mr Thomson, a stockbroker, who on 19th March 1890 received the price from the buyer, and at once paid the amount (£2900) to the defenders to be put to his credit with them. The pursuers now claim this money as their property. It is at the foundation of this claim that the pursuers shall trace the price of their undoubted property (the Commercial Bank shares) into the hands of the defenders, so as to identify it with the money which they received on 19th March. This they do by proving that the payment was made by transferring to them the cheque for the price which Thomson had got from the buyer only a few minutes before. It is now, I think, well settled that in order to the application of the rules of law and equity regarding the following and recovery of trust property, money may be traced and identified so that the receiver shall be answerable according to these rules, although the particular money may have disappeared.

I am of opinion therefore that the defenders must be answerable to the pursuers for the trust money thus traced into their hands, and must pay the amount, unless they have shewn that it was well transferred to them by Thomson, the broker,—that is, in such manner as to become their own,—or that they have some legal ground for withholding it from the pursuers. Whether they have done so or not is I, think, the only question in the case.

It appears that Thomson had an account-current with the defenders, which, at the time of the payment in question, was overdrawn and shewed a large balance due to the defenders, and their case accordingly is that they are, and from the first were, entitled to impute the payment in reduction of this balance. I assent to the proposition that when a customer pays money to his banker to be put to the credit of his account, the banker is prima facie entitled to assume that it was the customer's own money, and that he defrauded no one by paying his debts with it. I also agree that a payment to the credit of an account prima facie operates reduction or extinction of any balance then due upon it, and is thus in a sense payment of debt. But these propositions are too general and abstract to be of much practical utility in a particular case, the facts of which in detail are before the Court to be dealt with. I think it is proper, and indeed essential, to inquire into and consider the character of the particular account, the position of the customer, as the bank knew it, and also the banker's knowledge, even general knowledge, of the sources from which the money paid in came, and for the brief safe custody of which the account was opened and existed. Take for example the account of a rent and debt collector. The banker titles the account as that of "A B, rent and debt collector," and knows, or believes on sufficient grounds, the true sources of the money paid in. I could not in such a case assent to the applicability of the general abstract propositions which I have expressed. Again, to instance a case much resembling that before us, take a stockbroker's account—so entitled in the banker's books—and the purpose of which is, to the banker's knowledge, the temporary safe custody of the money of the broker's employers. Suppose that the banker lends this broker—customer—say £6000 on his bond or bill or I O U, or (worst of all) on his cheque, when he had nothing at his credit. Suppose further that in this state of matters the broker pays in £2900, which in fact is not his own money but an employer's, as the banker well knows, or on sufficient grounds believes. In such circumstances it is at least not clear that the banker could successfully support his claim to appropriate the money by the general legal propositions which I am now referring to. These are applicable (and probably sufficient for the decision) in every case of an account of such character, that it is reasonable to impute to the banker the belief that the money paid in is the customer's own, so that he may, without breach of trust, pay his debts with it. It would be unreasonable to subject a banker's claims upon money paid by a customer to his credit in account to the result of an inquiry as to the source from which it came. Take the case of a man of business who pays to the credit of his own account with his banker the money of a client entrusted to him for investment. The man of business acts with grave impropriety, and the client may lose his money, but the banker will not be allowed to suffer unless the bona fides which is prima facie imputable to him is displaced by positive evidence. Whether he would be permitted to gain, at the expense necessarily of the defrauded client, is, I think, not clear. If he knew the truth when the payment was made, he would certainly not be permitted to retain the money and apply it in payment of his customer's debt. If he did not at the moment, but received notice of the truth immediately thereafter, and before anything had occurred in consequence of the payment whereby he would or might be prejudiced if it were withdrawn, I am not sure that the case would be substantially different.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891. Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

I now proceed to consider more closely, first, the character of the account and dealings between the defenders and the broker Thomson, and second, the defenders' knowledge with respect to facts, their knowledge or excusable ignorance of which I have sufficiently indicated as being material, in my opinion, to the decision of the case. These topics, though in some respects separable, run into each other, the first having certainly a very distinct bearing on the second. I therefore premise what I have to say on both by observing that by the knowledge of the defenders, who are a joint stock company, I mean the knowledge of the officers in their branch office in George Street, Edinburgh, where the business

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

we are inquiring about was conducted, and particularly the knowledge of their agent and chief officer there.

1. The account is on the face of it a stockbroker's account with his banker. In the title of it in the defenders' books Thomson is designed as "stockbroker, 26 George Street"; and their agent in their George Street branch says, as a witness, that he knew him as the son of "the agent in our High Street branch in Edinburgh," and that his office was "quite near our bank." The account was opened on 2d January 1889, apparently at the request of the broker's father, "the agent in our High Street branch," who became security for it to the amount of £600, according to his letter of 14th January 1889, the terms of which shew pretty well the character of the account. He (the father) appears also to have used his personal influence with Mr Henderson, who was at the time joint agent along with Mr Greenhill for the defenders in their George Street office, to help his son at a pinch "at settlement time,"—that is of course to lend him money,—which was natural and excusable on his part. This appears from Mr Greenhill's letter of 29th March 1890, which I refer to only as shewing the character of the account, and as some explanation, although no justification, of the very large loan that was in fact given, and as I think most improvidently and irregularly given.

The account opened with a credit entry of £100, and was continued to the close without any security except that of the unfortunate father referred to in Mr Greenhill's letter of 29th March 1890. On 14th February 1890 it is balanced with the sum of £833, 10s. at the broker's credit. At the close of the following day (15th February) the balance to his debit is £1193, 1s. 7d. It thereafter goes on with balances due to the defenders, fluctuating from over £1000 to over £5000, till 18th March when the balance is £4870, 15s. 1d. due to the defenders, the broker not having had a shilling at his credit since 14th February. On the following day (19th March) the broker's cheque for £1400 was presented, and it is not surprising that the teller should have hesitated to pay it, and asked instructions from his superior, Mr Nicolson, and that he before authorising payment should have seen fit to communicate with Mr Thomson, who accordingly, as Mr Nicolson says in his evidence, "came over" on the same day, and stated "that he would be paying in in the afternoon." What he had in view was manifestly the price of the pursuer's stock which he expected to receive, as he in fact did, that afternoon from the buyer. From the order of the entries on 19th March it would seem that this cheque for £1400 was not honoured till the balance on the account was reduced by the payment immediately in question, which Thomson made after bank hours. But the teller (Riddell) explains that the cheque was honoured first—so that at the close of bank hours on 19th March Thomson was the defenders' debtor to the amount of £6200—for money which was simply lent to him within about a month, during which there was not a shilling at the credit of his account. They had, indeed, Mr Thomson senior's guarantee to the extent of £4100, and have, as they say, since got his cheques for that amount, but as his account is (independent of these cheques) overdrawn to the amount of £5300, as stated in the defenders' minute of 31st January, it is unlikely that these cheques have yielded any money.

There must, I should think, be some explanation of this very remarkable state of matters as the result of what ought to have been very familiar and commonplace banking business. What is it? Had the defenders' agents in Edinburgh authority to act as they did—that is, to advance money to Thomson to the amount of £6200? If not, they are plainly liable for any loss on this account so occasioned. Mr Greenhill in his letter to the manager in Glasgow of 29th March, already referred to, alleges no authority, and refers, as explanatory of the advances, only to Mr Thomson senior's guarantee and his verbal request to Mr Henderson, "to help David at settlement time when required." Do the defenders accept this as a justification of their agents' conduct? If the agents are truly responsible for the loss, the defenders may of course beneficently relieve them of it if they please. But such beneficence must be at their own cost.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

2. With respect to the knowledge of the defenders,—that is, of their agents, who acted for them in this business,—it is proved, I think to the exclusion of any reasonable doubt, that they knew perfectly well that the money paid in by Thomson was not his, but his employers'. Res ipsa loquitur. From January to December 1889 he paid in sums to the amount of £147,465. None of these payments were allowed to remain undrawn for more than a couple of days, very few of them for more than one, and some were drawn out the same day. But sums of £7000, £8000, £9000, and even up to £11,000 stood at his credit for a night, or even two—I suppose over a Sunday or holiday. The defenders' agents who did business with him were the personal friends of himself and his father, who had requested them "to help David at a settlement time when required," and a suggestion that they honestly believed that this money was his own, which he might, without breach of trust, pay his debts with, would be extravagant. No such suggestion is made. Mr Greenhill says,—"I made no inquiry as to whether the money paid into Mr Thomson's account was in his hands as broker or otherwise. I believed that it was in his hands as broker acting for clients." Knowledge of the individual clients whose money was paid in is not necessary to knowledge of the character of the account and the sums paid into it. All that the pursuers need, in my opinion, shew is that the purpose of the account and the use made of it was the reception of clients' money for safe custody till it was paid over to the owners within a very brief period, and that the defenders were not deceived or misled, but quite knew the fact.

I have been assuming that the money paid to the defenders by Thomson on 19th March was, when he made the payment, the property of the pursuers, and that, if he meant it as a payment of debt due by him to the defenders, he committed a breach of trust. This is certainly my opinion, founded on what I think was the legal relation in which the pursuers and Thomson stood to each other, viz., that of principal and agent, and I should have thought it superfluous to say a word in support of this view had it not been seriously disputed by the defenders on the authority of the case of Mackenzie v. Robertson, 13 Ret. 494. I think it clear that a broker is the agent of his employer, and that his relation to his employer is consequently fiduciary. Nor is this proposition affected by the fact that by a rule of the Stock Exchange, quite in accordance with law and legal principle, a purchasing and selling broker are inter se, or with respect to each other, principals—that is, stand in the relation of buyer and seller. It is not inconsistent with this rule, or with any of its consequences, that each of the brokers who are inter se principals should, with respect to his employer, be an agent. In the case of Mackenzie v. Robertson the dispute was between a selling broker and the general creditors of another broker, to whom he had sold (a purchasing broker),—the employer of neither of them having any interest in it; and the decision proceeded on the character of the relation of the two brokers inter se, which the Court held to be that of principals—buyer and seller. A similar question would have arisen here had Hyslop, the broker who bought from Thomson, become bankrupt without paying Thomson, and had Thomson in competition with Hyslop's general creditors been claiming a preference over a cheque or money which Hyslop had received from his employer. As it is, the case of Mackenzie v. Robertson is, in my opinion, inapplicable.

The property which Thomson was employed by the pursuers to sell for them consisted of bank shares, and when he received from them the transfer to be delivered to the buyer in return for the price, he was entrusted with the property itself, and the price when he received it was his employers' money in his hands, which he was bound to deal with accordingly by handing it over to his employer, or disposing of it according to instructions. If he appropriated it to his own use, keeping it and absconding with it, or paying his own debt with it, he was not a mere defaulting debtor, but a criminal guilty of the very serious crime of breach of trust and embezzlement. We have not here to consider any question of criminal law, but I notice in passing that we have no such technicality as I believe prevails, to some extent at least, in England, that in order to the crime of embezzlement the delinquent must stand in the relation of a clerk or servant to the person defrauded. The cases in our criminal Court to the contrary are numerous and familiar. It appears from the evidence that Mr Ross, the pursuers' man of business, having occasion to go from home on the 19th of March, instructed Thomson to deposit the money in certain banks (having agencies in Edinburgh) in the pursuers' name, which he says he would have done himself had he remained in town. Instead of doing so, Thomson paid the money to the defenders. He was, on this 19th March, as the event proved, at the end of his resources, indebted to the defenders in £6200, resolved to abscond, but without money enough to take him out of the country. In these circumstances, the resolution which he took, as shewn by his conduct, is remarkable, and may throw some light on the relation between him and the defenders' officers in Edinburgh, from whom, or by whose means, he had received this large sum of £6200 within a month. He resolved to defraud the pursuers of their money then in his hands. This is plain from his false and fraudulent letters spoken to by Mr Ross. These letters were obviously meant to delay inquiries after him till he had time to be off. They could have no other meaning or object. Further, he resolved to pay his debt to the defenders with the pursuers' money, and so benefit them to the exact extent that he defrauded the pursuers, minus £55 to carry him out of the country. What is the explanation of this conduct, for there must be one. It is hard to believe that he spontaneously and willingly wrote deceptive letters and committed a heinous crime only from a kindly disposition towards this joint stock company, the Clydesdale Bank, or an ill feeling towards the testamentary trustees of the deceased Thomas Dunlop, or the family of whose interests they had charge. But whatever the motive, the fact is certain that Thomson did deliberately resolve to rob these testamentary trustees of £2900 in order to relieve, to that extent, the defenders or their agents of the loss consequent on advances which had been made to him between 14th February and 19th March, and which I think the defenders will now acknowledge ought not to have been made. I should indeed have been the reverse of surprised had the defenders disdained to take benefit by this very gross fraud, the fact and purpose of which they cannot fail to see. But they have judged otherwise, and we have therefore to decide whether or not they have the legal right which they urge.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

The view of the matter on which the defenders rely as true in fact and sound in law is stated by the Lord Ordinary, who adopts it, thus,—"The broad view of the matter, as it presents itself to my mind, is this, that the case at best for the pursuers is just the ordinary case of a person paying his just debt with money fraudulently obtained or dishonestly appropriated, but received by the creditor in ignorance of the fraud or of the dishonesty. I know no authority for holding that in such a case the creditor is bound to restore. It may be doubted whether a cash payment can be recovered from a just creditor in any circumstances short of actual complicity on the part of the creditor with the fraud to which the payment owes it source, but at least knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the creditor seems essential, and such knowledge on the part of the bank is here, I think, excluded by the proof. It is true they knew, or may be held to have known, that the money was probably the price of stock sold for a client, but the right of the broker to pay such money into his own bank account depended not merely on the source of the money, or on the state of his (the broker's) bank account, but also upon the state of accounts between him and his client, and perhaps also upon the prospects which he bona fide had of meeting his obligations to his clients from other funds. And in those matters I do not hold that the bank was bound to inquire, or that it would be consistent with the ordinary course of business that a banker should do so."

This broad view of the matter assumes that there is no distinction, with respect to the right and duty of the banker, between a stockbroker's account opened and used for the purpose, and substantially only for the purpose, of enabling him to pay into bank the money of his clients to be kept safe till he can pass it over to them, and any other account between a banker and a customer. My opinion is adverse to this assumption. I think the distinction may be material to the duty and consequently to the right of the banker. The subject is of general importance and very material in the case before us. In order to explain my opinion upon it, I must take leave to offer some remarks on the familiar enough expression "overdrawn account," and on another cognate to it, and used by the Lord Ordinary, "to wipe out an overdraft," not that the meaning of either expression is doubtful, but that it is important to see and appreciate clearly what is the reality and legal character of the things signified by them. Now, I venture to say that an account with nothing in it, either at the credit or debit, is no account at all. Accordingly, every account is opened with a sum put to the customer's credit, whether consisting of money paid in by him or of money which he has arranged with the banker to place to his credit, with or without security, so that he may draw on it, which last is in its legal character a loan from the banker. Money at the credit of an account, whether originally the property of the customer, or borrowed by him from the banker, or a third party, is drawn upon by cheques which are legal instruments for that purpose and no other. When the money at the credit of the account is all drawn out there is plainly nothing to draw on, or for a cheque to operate on, and if the customer desires to continue to draw he must have more money placed to his credit—whether his own, or borrowed from the banker, or a third party as before. This is the regular business course with respect to every account, and in business or trade banks is always strictly followed—so that when the money at the credit is all drawn out no cheque is honoured till money is paid in, or till by arrangement with the banker such sum as may be required is placed to the credit. In family banks (such as Coutts') the same strictness is not always observed, and in business banks in Scotland (not in England) it is sometimes neglected. When the regular course is followed an account cannot be overdrawn although the customer may very well be his banker's debtor for money placed to his credit by arrangement, and which his cheques shew that he has in fact received from the lender. An account is overdrawn when a banker honours the cheque of a man who once had an account with money at his credit, but who has ceased to have such account—for a longer or shorter period,—I know of no rule for limiting the period. Such conduct by a banker is safe or not according as the confidence in the drawer of the cheque, which he necessarily acts on, is misplaced or not. If not misplaced, and the drawer of the cheque subsequently pays in as much as he had thus through the banker's confidence in him personally been permitted to draw in anticipation, the overdraft is wiped out. But this is not regular banking. It may be practically safe and the irregularity insignificant when the account is such that no others besides the banker and the customer have any legitimate interest in it or in the manner in which it is kept, or the amount of loans or advances by the former to the latter. A stockbroker's account with his banker is I think clearly not of that character. The defenders not only admitted but contended that when a selling broker receives a cheque for the price of a client's property which he has sold, it is in the ordinary course of business that he shall pay it into his own bank account, giving his own cheque to his client for the amount, less charges and commission; and the Lord Ordinary in his judgment refers to this "ordinary course of business" as indisputable and well known. I assume that such is the ordinary course of business, and that it is known all round—that is, to bankers as well as to stockbrokers and their clients. It seems to follow that the accounts of stockbrokers with their bankers ought to be kept and operated on with a due regard to this ordinary course of business respecting them and the interests therein thence legitimately arising. Nor does there seem to be any reason why the duty in this respect, if there be any, should be confined to the stockbrokers and not be extended to their bankers. The ordinary course of business, thus appealed to by the defenders themselves, necessarily and of itself announces to the clients of stockbrokers the bankers with whom they have accounts into which their (the clients') money is paid and out of which they get it on the broker's cheques; and the bankers are parties to the announcement. Now, I would ask this plain question,—Are there any bankers who would venture to notify to all concerned,—that is to the public who employ stockbrokers,—that while they allowed accounts to be kept with them into which in the ordinary course of business stockbrokers paid their clients' money they held it to be consistent with their duty to permit overdrafts to any amount they pleased and that on the footing that they should be wiped out with clients' money? So long as this ordinary course of business prevails no stockbroker can conceal from his clients who are the bankers with whom he keeps his account, and I much doubt whether any broker could afford to continue his account with bankers who were known, or even suspected, to be capable of acting on such a view of their duty; he would be so likely if he did to experience the effect of —well the effect of "exclusive dealing." He would cease to be employed. The only alternative view, and it is simple and obvious enough, is that a stockbroker's account ought to be kept with strict regularity, and so that it shall never be overdrawn even for an hour. The banker may of course accommodate a stock-

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

No. 145.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

broker to any amount and on any terms he pleases, but he ought in my opinion to do it if so minded by putting to his credit in account the sum he is willing to accommodate him with—the broker becoming his debtor therefor as for so much money lent to him on the terms agreed to. This course is attended with no hardship or inconvenience to either the broker or the banker, and any other exposes innocent clients, to whom not even the least negligence or inattention can be imputed, to the risk of being scandalously defrauded.

I have pointed out that between 14th February and 19th March the defenders allowed Thomson to overdraw on his Edinburgh account to the amount of £6200, his own drafts to that amount standing as a debt against him unwiped out when the pursuers' money was paid in. In London his account was within the same period (or about the same period) allowed to be overdrawn to the amount of £672, 18s. 6d., which was the sum at the debit on 18th March. Adding this to £6200, it appears that this needy broker was allowed by the defenders within a month to overdraw £6872 on the account into which he was invited and expected in the ordinary course of business to pay the money of his clients. I am of opinion that having regard to the character of the account, and as in a question with the pursuers, it was a violation of duty on the part of the defenders to allow these overdrafts. As in a question with Thomson himself, who got the money, I have no occasion to consider the matter, but suggest no doubt of his liability.

But the defenders are entitled to have their case and claim considered as if they had done what I think they ought if they were willing to accommodate Thomson to the amount of £6872, so as to enable him to continue his drafts on these two otherwise exhausted accounts, viz., as if they had put £6200 to the credit of his account in Edinburgh, and £672 to the credit of his account in London. In this view the case is not one of overdrawn account and the wiping out of overdrafts, but a simple case of loan by the defenders to Thomson—not the less so because the lent money was put to the credit of the borrower's account to be drawn out as it suited him.

I have already expressed my belief, and the grounds of it, that Thomson intended to benefit the defenders with the pursuers' money, which he intended should never reach the pursuers at all, and this may be represented as intention by him to pay to that extent his debt to the defenders. Did the defenders receive the money in the knowledge of this intention on his part and with a corresponding intention on their own? If they did, and I regret to feel obliged to say that there are in my opinion very serious grounds for believing that they did, it is, I think, impossible to regard the proceeding as one "in the ordinary course of business." If they did not, but, in ignorance of Thomson's fraudulent intent, received the payment from him "in the ordinary course of business," according to which, to use the Lord Ordinary's language, "the cheque in question fell to be paid into the selling broker's account, as in fact it was, he giving his own cheque to his clients for the amount, less charges and commission," then they did not in fact receive it as or towards payment of their own debt for money lent to the broker.

There are no doubt cases in which a creditor who has in good faith received payment from his debtor of a just debt will not be ordered to restore the money on proof that it was not the debtor's own, and that he committed a breach of trust in paying it away. But it is the primary condition of every such case that the money was bona fide received in payment of the debt, and this condition fails here. If it were otherwise, we should have to determine whether the equities on both sides here are equal, taking account of all the facts to which I have referred at great, I fear too great length, and I have to express my own opinion that they are not. I think, indeed, that there is no equity on the defenders' side.

The case then comes to this, that the defenders having lent Thomson £6872 on such security as they were content to accept, subsequently received from him a sum of £2900, and in the ordinary course of business put it to his credit in his broker's account, which, for the reasons I have explained, I must decline to regard as an overdrawn account. The money is identified as the price of the pursuers' property, and paid into this account "in the ordinary course of business" in its passage from Thomson to the pursuers. Thomson then became bankrupt, and absconded, and the question is, ought the defenders to be allowed to impound this money in payment of his debt to them? In support of their contention that they ought, they say that when they lent Thomson £6872 on insufficient security they had in view that, should misfortune overtake him, there would certainly or probably be some of his clients' money within their reach through the medium of this account into which clients' money was paid in the ordinary course of business, which they might seize in payment. What does this amount to? I think to this, that the defenders regarded and meant to use this account as a snare which might trap for their use and benefit the money of innocent people. If this view be admissible it is a grave misfortune to the defenders, which no doubt they deplore, that there was only £2900 in the trap when the collapse came. Had there been £7000 they would have seized it all, arguing that it was (again to use the language of the Lord Ordinary) "just the ordinary case of a person paying his just debts with money fraudulently obtained." And what, I venture to ask, would have been the result in the view I am now considering had this just debt been well secured to the defenders by the bond of solvent cautioners or by a heritable bond? Thomson was the debtor in it, and if the case is to be dealt with on the footing that he paid it the cautioners would apparently be relieved, and any security held for it set free. Would the case be different if the defenders held Thomson's bond with sufficient (or insufficient) security for the amount of his debt to them? I can conceive no reason for thinking so. Nor can I see any ground for thinking the nature or origin of the debt material. It might have been on a bill or bond of caution for the debt of another customer of the defenders. The question of their right to retain the pursuer's money in payment would have been precisely the same. They got it from Thomson, who was their debtor in a just debt, with which the pursuers could not possibly have less concern than they have with the loan or advance to him of £6872.

The money was paid in after bank hours on the 19th March. Suppose that Thomson had at the same time handed his cheque to his clients for the amount, less charges and commission, and that they had presented it to the defenders on the opening of the bank next morning. Could they have refused to honour it "in the ordinary course of business," on the ground that they had received the money honestly and in good faith in payment of their own debt? Or is their claim to keep the money to be rested on Thomson's failure to give his cheque to his clients, and his success in artfully delaying their application therefor till he was safe out of the country? If the first alternative is maintainable the facts on which the second is based are quite immaterial. If, again, the first alternative is ill-founded the second cannot possibly be maintainable. It seems to me, at least, that there are no grounds for holding that the pursuers have lost their claim, which they once had, by undue delay in asserting it.

No. 145.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Dunlop's Trustees v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited.

I am of opinion that the defenders have instructed no good ground in respect of Thomson's prior debt for withholding from the pursuers the £2900 which they received on 19th March.

With regard to their claim to retain the money in respect, and to the extent, of subsequent advances to Thomson, I do not feel myself in a condition usefully to say much. Your Lordships, agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, are of opinion that the defenders are entitled to prevail in respect of the prior debt, which greatly more than exhausts the money in question, and so have not adverted to the subsequent advances. The Lord Ordinary refers to them as inconsiderable, and only, I think, with reference to the topic of the time that elapsed, and of matters not being entire, when the defenders were apprised of Thomson's fraud. We really had no argument on the subject, and as the case is necessarily, according to the opinion of your Lordships, to be decided irrespective of it, it would really be useless for me to enter upon it. It is, of course, speaking quite generally, indisputable that advances made in good faith in respect of money received in good faith may be made good out of that money.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 146.
Mar. 19, 1891.*
Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

THOMAS WATT, Petitioner (Respondent).—Dickson—C. N. Johnston.
JOSEPH BACKHOUSE (Mr and Mrs Burgess' Trustee), Respondent (Appellant).—Blair—Sym.

Property—Tenement in burgh—Conveyance of attic storey—Right to roof.—A, the proprietor of a building feu within burgh, having built thereon a tenement of houses, disponed to B "these two dwelling-houses or flats, being the second flat above the shops and the attic story of the tenement with two cellars, a necessary-house, and a right to the water-pipe in common with the other proprietors, under burden of payment of one shilling of feu-duty, and a fourth part of the expense of upholding the roof of the said tenement." Other flats were disponed to other persons in terms mutatis mutandis identical with the above, but the granters retained part of the basement and of the upper flats in their own hands.

A disponee of B to the attic flat presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for authority to convert the attic flat into a square story, and to build another story above it.

A opposed the petition.

The Court refused the petition, in respect (1) (dub. Lord Trayner) that as a question of contract each buyer from A obtained right only to the parts of the tenement as described in his disposition, and the claim of the petitioner amounted to a claim to more than that; and (2) that as a question of real right A, the proprietor of the solum on which the tenement was built, had not conveyed to B the right of indefinite extension upward, but only the right to the stratum of space occupied by the attic story.

2D DIVISION, with three consulted Judges.
Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

IN 1799 Mrs Margaret Fell, wife of the Reverend Richmond Fell, was infeft in All and Whole that lodging or dwelling-house, stables, coach-house, and pertinents thereto belonging, lying on the south-west corner of St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, together with the area or lot of ground

* Decided March 18, 1891.

No. 146.

Mar. 19, 1891. Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

whereon the said subjects were built, and together also with the area or lot of ground lying immediately to the south thereof, and reaching to the Meuse Lane between St David Street to St Andrew Street, which dwelling-house and stables had been built by David Hume, and had (with the other subjects) been disponed by him to his brother, John Home, of Ninewells, who obtained a charter therefor from the magistrates in 1779.

Between 1799 and 1804 Mr and Mrs Fell erected on the back-ground, and on the ground occupied by the stables and coach-house, a tenement of houses, which became Nos. 13, 15, 17, and 19 South St David Street.

In 1804 the Fells sold to John Cockburn "these two dwelling-houses or flats, being the second flat above the shops and attic storey" of this tenement with two cellars and a necessary-house, and a right to the water-pipe in common with the other proprietors, under burden of payment of one shilling of feu-duty, and a fourth part of the expense of upholding the roof of said tenement.

In 1820 Peter Hewat, who had come to be in right of the subjects sold to Cockburn, disponed the attic storey to Michael Carr, "with a cellar, together with a right to the water-pipe in common with the other proprietors of the said tenement," and the disponee was taken bound to pay sixpence as his proportion of the feu-duty, and "to be at one-eighth part of the expense of upholding the roof of said tenement, being the proportion it has been agreed on he is to bear of the same, in all time coming, and also to keep in repair the pavement above his cellar."

After various transmissions this attic storey was in 1889 conveyed by the trustee of the late Mordaunt Gray to Thomas Watt, saddler, in terms similar to those last above quoted.

Besides the subjects sold to Cockburn in 1804, Mr and Mrs Fell sold other parts of the tenement in terms mutatis mutandis identical with those in the disposition to Cockburn, but had retained, of the tenement, a dwelling-house and two shops and part of the basement.

In November 1889 Watt presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court for warrant to convert the attic storey belonging to him into a square storey, and to erect another storey above the same.

Answers were lodged by the trustees under the settlement of Mr and Mrs Burgess, who were in right of the whole remaining rights belonging to the Fells under their original infeftment.

The respondents stated;—(Stat. 2) With exception of the subjects sold by them, "the respondents' authors retained the sole right of property in the whole subjects contained in the original charters and infeftments thereof, and the respondents are now feudally vested in, and are the heritable proprietors of the same." (Stat. 4) "The titles produced by the petitioner shew that his rights are confined to the attic storey. The respondents are proprietors of the roof, or at least they are proprietors thereof in common with the other owners of the tenement. The respondents and their authors have retained said roof, and have upheld the same and kept it in repair since the tenement was erected nearly a century ago, . . . and have by themselves or their agents recovered from the other owners the proportion of the expense for which they are respectively liable to relieve the respondents."

The petitioner pleaded;—2. As the proposed operations are confined to the petitioner's own property, and can be executed without danger, and without infringing the rights of the respondents, or any of them, the answers ought to be repelled, with expenses.

The respondents pleaded;—2. The petition should be refused, with expenses, in respect (1) that the proposed operations encroach on the rights and property of the respondents; (2) that the proposed operations are unsafe and dangerous; (3) that the petitioner has not produced or condescended on any right or title to execute said operations.

No. 146. Mar. 19, 1891. Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

On 20th February 1890 the Dean of Guild, after a report by men of skill, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the proposed operations are confined to the petitioner's own property, and, if carefully executed, can be carried out without prejudice to the other portions of the tenement, provided that an inside cast-iron 9 inch by 9 inch beam be introduced over the triplet windows on the third floor; and in respect that the petitioner has now shewn on his plans a beam of the specified dimensions and in the specified situation, approves of the plans as altered; repels the pleas in law for the respondents: Grants warrant to the petitioner as craved, but on condition that he find caution de damnis before extract."

Burgess' trustee appealed.

After a hearing the cause was appointed to be heard before seven Judges.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant's author had not conveyed to the respondent the right of extension upwards. All that had been conveyed, on a sound construction of the respondent's titles, was the property in the attic storey. The solum remained with the appellant, whose right was a centro ad cœlum except in so far as he or his author had conveyed away strata of space, termed stories.[1] The obligation of the respondent was not an obligation to maintain the roof, but an obligation to pay the appellant a proportion of the expense of maintaining the roof. Such an obligation was inconsistent with a right of property in the roof being in the respondent.[2] Taylor v. Dunlop[3] decided no question as to raising the height of the walls, but at most shewed that the property of the roof was in the proprietor of the upper storey; and even if the respondent had a right of property in the roof, that gave him no right to build additional stories if, as was contended, everything a centro ad cœlum remained in the disponer of the undivided tenement, except in so far as expressly disponed. But assuming that the appellant's title to object was only one of common interest with the other part owners of the tenement, that was a sufficient title. No one proprietor in common was entitled to impose additional burdens on the other proprietors without their consent and for his own sole advantage. It was not necessary to shew danger. Mere prejudice was enough; but in any case a report by men of skill was no answer to an allegation that the proposed alterations involved danger to the whole building, or at least alteration of the gable.[4]

Argued for the petitioner;—The appellant merely had a right of common interest; the property in the roof was in the petitioner, and he might make any alterations thereon that he pleased, provided he did not prejudice the other proprietors.[5] Here there would be no prejudice, for there would be no danger. The Dean of Guild had held that there would be no danger, and the Court would not readily interfere with that finding. The petition ought therefore to be granted.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The petitioner, Thomas Watt, is the proprietor of the upper most or attic floor of a four-storey tenement in St David Street, Edinburgh, and

[1] Sharp v. Robertson, Feb. 5, 1800, M. App. "Property," No. 3.

[2] Barclay v. M'Ewen, May 21, 1880, 7 R. 792.

[3] Taylor v. Dunlop, Nov. 1, 1872, 11 Macph. 25, 45 Scot. Jur. 24.

[4] Gellatly v. Arrol, March 13, 1863, 1 Macph. 592, 35 Scot. Jur. 360; Arrol v. Inches, Jan. 27, 1887, 14 R. 394.

[5] Taylor v. Dunlop, supra; Johnston v. White, May 18, 1877, 4 R. 721; Lamond v. Cumming, June 11, 1875, 2 R. 784.

No. 146.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

he claims to be entitled to dismantle his dwelling and to rebuild it in the form of a two-storey house, interfering as little as possible with the underlying part of the tenement. The petition is addressed to the Dean of Guild, and is in the usual form, praying for authority to dismantle and reconstruct according to plans to be approved by the Dean of Guild Court.

The application is opposed by the proprietors of the subjacent storeys, and the defences include a denial of the petitioner's right to extend his possession, and an averment that the proposed extension cannot be made consistently with the stability of the tenement.

The Dean of Guild, proceeding in this matter on the report of builders, has found "that the proposed alterations can be carried out without prejudice to the other portions of the tenement," provided certain precautions are used; and having also considered the objections which depend on legal grounds, he granted the desired warrant by his interlocutor of 20th February 1890, being the interlocutor appealed from. In the argument addressed to us it was admitted, or at least assumed, that the walls are capable of supporting the new building, and the appeal was maintained solely on legal grounds.

The rights of the parties, so far as expressed in the title-deeds, may be very shortly stated. The original feu-right of the tenement is a charter granted by the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh in the year 1777, which is said to include other subjects; and on this site, about the commencement of the present century (the exact date being immaterial) the tenement was built by Mrs Margaret Carmichael or Fell and her husband. The tenement was originally constructed for occupation in flats, and it consists of a basement and shop flat, and three upper flats, the uppermost floor only being the property of the petitioner.

By disposition, dated 6th September 1804, Mrs Fell, with her husband's consent, sold and conveyed to John Cockburn, baker in Edinburgh, "All and Whole these two dwelling-houses or flats, being the second flat above the shops, and attic storey lately built by us." The property is then described in terms which it is not necessary to read at length. Cockburn is then put under an obligation to relieve the granters of the payment of one shilling of feu-duty, and as the deed proceeds, "he is likewise to be at one-fourth part of the expense of upholding the roof of the said tenement, being the proportion it has been agreed on he is to bear of the same in all time coming, and is also to be bound to maintain and keep in repair the pavement above his cellars."

The two dwelling-houses or flats thus sold to Cockburn came to be vested in separate owners; and the petitioner's possession is described in the title-deeds as the attic storey with a cellar and right to the water-pipe in common with the other proprietors, together with the whole pertinents thereto belonging. The petitioner's right is then declared to be burdened with the payment of sixpence of feu-duty, and it is declared that he is to be at one-eighth part of the expense of upholding the roof of the said tenement, being the proportion it was agreed by said disposition should be borne in all time coming by the disponees.

It thus appears (1) that the title-deeds of the petitioner's property do not contemplate any extension of the building in a vertical direction; (2) that no right to extend is conferred in express words or by implication on the disponees of the attic storey; (3) that so far as depends on the title-deeds the petitioner has only the same kind of right in the roof as the other proprietors, because that right is given to each in the form of an obligation to uphold, which is divisible amongst the proprietors of the different flats approximately in proportion to the values of their several possessions; (4) there is no conveyance of the solum to the owners of the flats, and so far as it can be held to exist as a separate subject in this peculiar kind of position of property the solum would seem to remain untransferred in the persons of the heirs or singular successors of the original proprietors of the basement.

No. 146.

Mar. 19, 1891. Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

If then the proprietor of the attic floor has the power to build which he asserts, this power or faculty must be rested on some inherent quality of the right of a proprietor of an urban tenement, and not on the title-deeds of his possession, because these deeds give to the petitioner an attic storey and no more. The difficulty which meets the petitioner in this view of his case is very evident. If the power of extension is a quality of the right it cannot be confined to the proprietor of the attic, but must belong to all the proprietors within the tenement. That their rights as to extension are identical is easily seen if we consider the case of a tenement which is destroyed by fire or pulled down.

In a question of rebuilding, everyone would admit that the tenement must either be rebuilt according to the original design, or that each proprietor should be entitled to duplicate his storey.

It has not been contended by anyone that in the present condition of the building the proprietors of the first or second floor should be allowed to build above the petitioner's floor, and it is materially impossible that they can interject a new storey below the attics. So the condition of the question is, whether the petitioner can insist on a supposed right of adding to his possession under circumstances in which it is impossible that the other proprietors (all having equal rights) should exercise corresponding privileges.

If the question is to be decided by authority there is a very distinct authority to the contrary in the case of Sharp v. Robertson, decided in the year 1800. The Faculty report of the case, which is transcribed verbatim in Mor. Dic., App. voce "Property," 3, does not say much regarding the grounds of judgment. In this respect the report is not different from the other reports of that period. But I have had the opportunity of reading the arguments in the Faculty Collection of Session Papers. These are ably written and instructive, and they prove that the case was argued (and presumably decided) on general principles, and not on the specialties of the particular case. Specialties indeed it had not, no more than the present case. In the absence of any contrary authority, I must hold the decision in Sharp v. Robertson to be entitled to all the weight due to a precedent in point.

It has, however, been thought desirable that we should consider the present case on its merits apart from authority. The question may be considered from the point of view of contract, or as a question of real right. The former is probably the less influential consideration of the two. Yet it is not undeserving of consideration that when the tenement came to be divided the bargain which each purchaser made was a bargain for one flat in the tenement. The price which he paid was the estimated value of a flat already built; and the price paid for the attic floor in all such cases is less than the price paid for any of the other floors, because the attic floor, from its situation and construction, is the least valuable.

But when the question is considered as one of real right, the condition of the case is that the first proprietor of the undivided tenement had the right of indefinite extension of his use of this fraction of the earth's surface, upwards and downwards, without any limitations except such as result

No. 146.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

from physical difficulties. His right to this small area of land was, in law, of the same nature as that of the proprietor of a substantial estate, who may work mines below the surface and build above it as high as he pleases. He parted with that right only to the extent, so far as the petitioner is concerned, of conveying to the petitioner's predecessor in title a stratum of ten or twelve feet in height defined as a storey in the tenement. I am unable to find in a conveyance so defined any possibilities of extension against the will of the proprietor from whom the conveyance proceeds. The estate of the petitioner is merely a stratum carved out of the larger estate, which extends theoretically from the centre of the earth upwards, and it follows in my opinion that whatever is not conveyed remains with the granter. It is true that the granter is not himself entitled to build above the petitioner's storey. But this disability, as it appears to me, is the result of implied contract, because a proprietor who has sold a subject described as the uppermost of a certain number of storeys could not, without derogating from his grant, put an additional storey on to the tenement. These considerations lead to the conclusion that there can be no expansion of the right of any of the proprietors of the different floors. The representatives of the original grantee in the feu-charter, who retained the basement floor, are barred by implied contract, or by warrandice, which is the same thing, from interfering with the property which they conveyed for value to the owners of the upper floors, and the owners of the upper floors are disabled from extending their possessions upwards, because they have no right under their conveyances to anything beyond the particular strata respectively conveyed to them.

I have not overlooked the distinction which is taken in reference to cognate questions between common property and common interest. If it were clearly settled that the interest of the defenders in the roof was only common interest, that would be an important, though in my view not a decisive, argument in favour of the petitioner's contention. But as the nature of the right to the roof has not been itself the subject of an authoritative decision, this undetermined point cannot be used as a step to the solution of any other question. I have therefore considered the question in this action on its own merits, and will only add, that as I read the title-deeds, the petitioner is not able to establish such an exclusive right of property in the roof as would displace the inference resulting from theoretical considerations depending on the way and manner in which the different parts of the tenement have been given off. My opinion is that the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild ought to be recalled, and the prayer of the petition refused.

LORD ADAM.—I agree in the opinion that has just been delivered.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur generally in the opinion which has just been given by Lord M'Laren. I shall state shortly what is the import of my opinion upon the matter which I think is sufficient for the decision of the case.

The house in question was built between 1799 and 1804 by Mr and Mrs Fell, who had acquired the property of the solum, i.e., the feu, and who built the whole tenement, let me say, in 1804. They sold it to different parties, and eventually the parties to this case acquired different parts of it. Now, I regard this case in the same way as if the original proprietors had sold this garret to the present respondent, the petitioner in the Dean of Guild Court, retaining the rest of the property and the solum in their own hands.

No. 146.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Watt v. Burgess' Trustee.

In my opinion, when the proprietor of a tenement, containing it may be two or three storeys and an attic, sells the attic, he sells nothing else, and he sells no right to the buyer of the attic to load the solum with anything more. I do not think that this case is different from what it would have been if this tenement had consisted of three square storeys only, and the proprietor of the solum had sold—as he might have done—the right to someone to erect an attic. The right that was sold in that case would not give the purchaser a right to erect anything else. I think the position of the seller and of his disponee are exactly the same, whether he builds an attic and sells it, or whether he sells the right to build an entirely new attic.

I wish only to guard myself from being thought to say anything that would prevent improvements from being carried out on any house. I think that if the proprietor of the solum were to object to any of the improvements being carried out on a house which the civilisation of the day thought were proper and expedient improvements, that his objections would be unreasonable and would probably not be carried into effect. But converting a garret into two square storeys is a perfectly different matter from making such improvements, and one that will not be sanctioned here any more at this time than if the Feu had sold the garret directly to the petitioner.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am able to agree with Lord M'Laren in so far as he puts his decision upon the question of real right. I am not so sure that I agree with the further deduction that the warrant for this proposed operation should be refused as being contrary to the contract.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD ADAM intimated that the LORD PRESIDENT, who was not present at the advising, concurred in Lord M'Laren's opinion.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the judgment of the Dean of Guild, and remitted to him to refuse the petition.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—BLAIR & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 147.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

EDWARD BARNETT AND OTHERS (Liquidators of the Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited), Pursuers (Respondents).—J. C. Lorimer—C. J. Guthrie.

JOHN M'MAHON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Jameson—Dundas.

Company—Liquidation—Forfeiture of shares prior to liquidation—Liability for unpaid calls—Fraud.—When shares in a public company are forfeited for non-payment of calls, the holder of such shares ceases to be a member, and becomes merely a debtor of the company, and therefore is not barred by the subsequent liquidation of the company from pleading in answer to a demand for payment of the calls that he was induced to take the shares through the fraudulent misrepresentations of the company.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. C.

THE Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, was incorporated under the Companies Acts on 25th October 1886, with a capital of £200,000 in 200,000 shares of £1 each.*

* Among the articles of association of the company were the following:—"(20) If any member fails to pay any money payable by him to the company in respect of his shares, on the day appointed by the directors for payment

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

John M'Mahon, photographer, Aberdeen, applied for and had allotted to him 100 shares of the company, and paid 2s. per share on application and 3s. on allotment.

On 25th November 1886, the directors resolved that the remaining 15s. per share should be called up by three calls of 5s. each, payable respectively on 22d December 1886, and 4th February and 12th March 1887.

M'Mahon declined to pay these calls, and on 24th March 1887 the directors passed a resolution declaring his shares forfeited, and thereafter removed his name from the register.

Early in 1887 various actions had been raised against the company, and petitions for the liquidation of it were presented, and on 19th April a committee of shareholders was appointed to investigate its affairs. The committee returned a report, dated 25th July 1887, in which they stated that they had made inquiry about the property of the company in Queensland, and were of opinion that it should be retained and developed, and that the vendors had agreed to return 50,000 fully paid-up shares, which had been a part of the original price, to pay £5000 in cash, and to pay legal expenses not exceeding £2000, on condition that they and the promoters should be released from further claims. The committee recommended the acceptance of these terms, and further, that the company should be wound up voluntarily with a view to its reconstruction.

The committee also reported that the holders of forfeited shares should be entitled to the benefits accruing from this arrangement.

This report was approved of, and at an extraordinary general meeting thereof, the directors may at any time afterwards, during such time as such money remains unpaid, serve a notice on him, or his executors or administrators, requiring payment of such money, together with any interest that may have accrued by reason of such non-payment.

---

"(21) The notice shall name a further day, and a place or places on and at which such money is to be paid. It shall also state that, in the event of non-payment at the time and place appointed, the shares in respect of which such money is payable will be liable to be forfeited.

"(22) If the requisition of any such notice as last aforesaid shall not be complied with, any share in respect of which such notice has been given may be declared forfeited by a resolution of the directors, and may thenceforth be treated by the directors as a forfeited share.

"(23) Any money which shall be payable to the company in respect of any forfeited share shall, notwithstanding the forfeiture, continue to be payable to the company, and shall be recoverable by them, with interest, from the forfeiting member or his representatives.

"(24) The directors may sell, or otherwise dispose of, re-allot, re-appropriate, or extinguish any forfeited share in such manner as they may think proper; and the directors may, in their absolute discretion, remit or annul the forfeiture of any share, upon payment of all arrears and of all interest due thereon, together with such sum of money, if any, by way of fine, or upon such other terms and conditions as the directors shall determine.

"(25) A declaration made by the secretary (in the form and manner required by law in the case of declaration in lieu of voluntary oaths) that the former holder of a forfeited share made default in payment of the calls thereon, and that the share had been declared forfeited at a board meeting after due notice, and the receipt of any two directors and the secretary of the company, for the price or purchase-money of such share, shall together constitute a good title to the purchaser, and he shall be discharged from liability to any calls which may have become due prior to his purchase (unless otherwise expressly agreed), and his title to the share shall not be affected by any irregularity in the proceedings in reference to any such forfeiture or sale."

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

of the shareholders, held on 9th August, it was resolved (1) that the company should be wound up voluntarily; (2) that certain persons should be appointed liquidators; and (3) that they should be authorised to enter into an agreement with the new company for the sale and transfer of their assets, after payment of all liabilities, on the terms set forth in the draft agreement submitted to the meeting.

These resolutions were confirmed on 25th August, the directors having previously on the same day passed a resolution cancelling all forfeitures of shares which had been declared, subject to compliance on the part of the forfeited shareholders with the terms of the reconstruction agreement.*

On 5th September the liquidators issued a list of contributories, of which the third head was entitled, "Holders of shares not fully paid up and which were forfeited, but forfeiture since cancelled." M'Mahon's name was entered under this head without his consent, and without compliance by him with the terms of the reconstruction agreement.

Thereafter the liquidators raised an action against M'Mahon in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen for payment of the amount of the calls which had not been paid by him.

In defence M'Mahon stated that he had been induced to take the shares by fraudulent misrepresentations in the prospectus, and that these misrepresentations had been knowingly made by the directors for the purpose of inducing the public to take shares in the company.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The sums sued for being due by the defender as calls and interest on calls on shares in a company of which when the calls were made he was the duly registered proprietor, the pursuers, as liquidators, are entitled to decree as craved, with expenses. (3) Notwithstanding the forfeiture of the defender's shares and his removal from the register of members, he is, in respect of the 23d article of association, liable for the said calls, with interest as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender is not due to the pursuers the sum sued for in respect that he is not liable as a contributory to or member of the said company; or otherwise, if the said sum is sued for as an ordinary debt, that he is not liable therefor in respect of the fraud after mentioned. (3) The defender should be assoilzied in respect that he was induced to apply for shares in said company by false and fraudulent statements contained in the said prospectus. (4) The alleged liquidation having been in fact no more than a reconstruction of said company.

---

* The agreement, signed 5th September, inter alia, provides that the new company shall be incorporated with a nominal capital of 150,000 shares of £1 each: (2) that the old company shall sell all its property to the new company; (3) that the liquidators of the old company shall pay its debts; (4) that the new company shall issue to each holder of a fully paid-up share of the old company one fully paid-up share of the new company, under the exceptions and conditions specified (5) that the new company shall fulfil the contracts of the old company. Clause (6) embodies the agreement with the vendors to the effect stated in the committee's report above mentioned. Clause (8) regards forfeited shares, and provides that "if the holders of forfeited shares should pay the full amount unpaid upon their shares," then the forfeiture should be cancelled, and the holders should be forthwith entitled to require the new company to allot to them fully paid-up shares equivalent in amount to the shares held by them in the old company. Clause (12) provides for the rescission of the agreement in case of the old company finding it impracticable, from dissent of shareholders or otherwise, to carry it out. Clause (13) provides that "these presents are intended to operate as an agreement, and not as a conveyance, transfer, or assignment."

The new company was thereafter incorporated, and the agreement was on 5th October 1887 confirmed by the newly incorporated company.

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

and no new liabilities being thereby imposed upon the defender, he is not barred from pleading fraud as aforesaid.

On 4th March 1889 the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) allowed a proof on the question of fraudulent misrepresentation,* and on 10th June the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) adhered.

The pursuers having appealed for jury trial, the Court on 18th July remitted to Lord M'Laren (Ordinary) to allow a proof before answer, the defender to lead.

The necessity for proof was to a great extent obviated by a joint minute of admissions, in which, inter alia, the pursuers admitted that the prospectus of the company contained misrepresentations which would have entitled the defender to rescind his contract for taking the shares in question if he had raised an action for that purpose before the liquidation and reconstruction.

It further appeared that other shareholders had had their names removed from the register of the company by order of the High Court of Justice in England (where the company was registered), on the ground that they had been induced to take the shares through the fraudulent misrepresentations of the company, and the amount already paid by them on their shares had been returned. It also appeared that all the ordinary debts of the old company had been paid.

On 16th July 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that 100 shares of the company in liquidation were allotted to the defender; (2) that he applied for these shares on the faith of a prospectus which contained misrepresentations which would have entitled him to reduce the contract before the company went into liquidation; (3) that the calls, payment of which is now sued for, were made by the directors of the company; (4) that the defender did not pay said calls, and that in respect thereof his shares were forfeited on 24th March 1887; (5) that notwithstanding he remained liable for the calls in respect of the provisions of the 23d section of the articles of association of the company; (6) that the company went into voluntary liquidation by resolution dated 9th and confirmed 25th August 1887; (7) that the defender is not entitled after the liquidation of the company to plead that he is not liable to pay the said calls in respect of the misrepresentations aforesaid in the said prospectus; (8) that he is liable for all the said calls, with interest as sued for: Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons," &c.†

---

* "NOTE.—No ground is alleged for fixing liability upon the defender as a contributory. He cannot be made liable as a contributory in respect of being a present member of the company, inasmuch as he ceased to be a member before the company went into liquidation; and he cannot be made liable as a contributory in respect of being a past member, there being no allegation that the present members are unable to meet the company's obligations. The only ground upon which the defender can be sued is that at the date of the forfeiture he was debtor to the company in certain sums, and if he is to be sued as a debtor, it seems clear enough that he has the rights of a debtor, and therefore, among other rights, that of shewing that the alleged debt was induced by fraud, and was invalid. I think there is no other question involved in this case. If the defender succeeds in shewing that he was defrauded into taking the shares, he will get quit of the present claim. If he fails to shew reason for not paying his calls, it will be his duty to pay them up before he can be heard upon any inquiry as to whether the company has been conducted rightly or wrongly since the time when he repudiated."

† "OPINION.— . . . The defender contended, and I did not understand the pursuers to dispute, that the cancellation or attempted cancellation of the

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The present case was not within the rule of Oakes v. Turquand[1] and Burgess,[2] for the defender had ceased to forfeiture is not a fact of importance in the case. It may be that under section 24 of the articles of association the directors had an absolute power and discretion in the matter; but whether they had or not, they did not exercise their power absolutely, but only subject to conditions which were admittedly not fulfilled, so that I think the forfeiture of the shares remains unaffected. Further, it was maintained that the defender ought not to have been put on the list of contributories, and could not be treated as a contributory, and I did not understand that this contention was disputed, and think it could not be disputed successfully—Needham's case, 4 Eq. 135; Buckley, pp. 135, 452. The result is that the cancellation of the forfeiture may be eliminated from the case, that the entry of the defender's name as a contributory must be treated as a mistake, and that, at the date of the liquidation, the defender was not a shareholder, and could not be put on the list of contributories. . . .

"In respect of that clause [23d article of association] the defender was undoubtedly at the date of the forfeiture liable for calls on his shares, and if there were no question arising on the misrepresentations in the prospectus, the calls would of course have been recovered. The defender adopted no means, by action of reduction or other application to the Court, to get himself relieved of the liability before liquidation; and the question in this action is whether the liability can now be enforced.

"I have felt very great difficulty in deciding this case, and it is only with much hesitation that I have ultimately formed an opinion in favour of the pursuers.

"A shareholder of a joint stock company who has taken his shares on the faith of a fraudulent prospectus may obtain rescission of the contract with the company if he raises an action for that purpose before liquidation, at least if there has been no material alteration in the condition of the company; but it is well settled that he cannot obtain rescission, or have his name removed from the register, or resist calls after liquidation, if he have taken no judicial steps for the purpose before liquidation,—Oakes v. Turquand, L. R., 2 H. L. 325; Stone v. City and County Bank, 1877, 3 C. P. Div. 282. The same principle is involved in Graham v. The Western Bank, Feb. 2, 1864, 2 Macph. 559, 36 Scot. Jur. 272; March 8, 1865, 3 Macph. 617, 37 Scot. Jur. 304; Addie v. Western Bank, June 9, 1865, 3 Macph. 899, 37 Scot. Jur. 473, and May 20, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 80, 39 Scot. Jur. 437; Tennant v. City of Glasgow Bank, Jan. 22, 1879, 6 R. 534, affirmed May 20, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 69; and Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, July 4, 1879, 6 R. 1164, affirmed March 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 53. From these authorities it may be deduced as a well-settled general rule that a resolution to wind up a company bars a reduction of an otherwise voidable contract to take shares. For a contract though induced by fraud is valid until rescinded, and it is too late to rescind it after the rights of third parties who have relied on the fraudulent contract have emerged, and after the character of the company and of its shares has been altered by the liquidation. The doctrine is (it has been said on high authority) 'that after the company is wound up, it ceases to exist, and rescission is impossible,' per Jessel, M. R., in Burgess' case, 1880, 15 Ch. Div. 509; so that in this case if there had been an ordinary liquidation, if the whole of the creditors had not been paid, and if the defender's shares had not been forfeited, there would have been no question at all about his liability for calls.

"But it is said that in all the cases in which liquidation has been held to be a bar to a reduction, the liquidation has been of the ordinary kind which brings the company to an end, and it is contended that in this case there has been no true liquidation, but only a reconstruction of the original company under a new name and slightly modified conditions. The agreement it is said, so far as it

[1] Oakes v. Turquand, 1867, L. R., 2 H. L. 325.

[2] Burgess, 1880, 15 Ch. Div. 509; see also Marshall v. Glamorgan Coal and Iron Co., 1868, L. R., 7 Eq. 129.

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.

Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

be a member of the company at the date of the liquidation. While therefore he remained liable for arrears of calls, that was only as debtor, not as was between the old company and the new, was not a real agreement at all, but only a resolution of the old company under guise of an agreement. I was a good deal impressed with the argument in support of this view, but after consideration have come to think that it should not prevail. The liquidation was not a mere fanciful or artificial proceeding, not falling under the provisions of the Companies Acts, but was precisely such a liquidation as is contemplated by the 161st section of the Companies Act, 1862; and in the cases which establish the position that liquidation is a bar to reduction, there seems to be no suggestion of any distinction between one kind of liquidation recognised by the statute and another, and I see no sufficient ground for making an exception in the case of a liquidation under section 161 with a view to reconstruction, in regard to the application of the rule in question. One of the objects of the voluntary liquidation was the continuance of the undertaking under more favourable conditions, and the liquidators were authorised, by the same resolution by which they were appointed, to enter into an agreement with the new company. Still the resolution to wind up was confirmed on 25th August, and the agreement was not completed until 5th September; and it does not appear that the continuance of the undertaking was the sole or the principal reason for the liquidation, because various petitions for liquidation of the company had already been presented in Court, and they were dropped on the resolution to wind up voluntarily being adopted; and it rather appears that the liquidation of the company could not have been avoided. Further, it might have happened that the endeavour to reconstruct the company failed, and provision is made for that possibility in the agreement; and if that had happened there would have been nothing but the simple winding-up of the old company. Looking to the litigations which had arisen about the old company, it appears to me that its extinction by liquidation was a prerequisite of the construction of the new company; and on the whole, although I think the argument on the point well worthy of consideration, I do not think it can be denied that there was here a liquidation to which the principle referred to is applicable.

"But again, all the foregoing cases involved questions with creditors of the company, whereas in this case there is no such question. All the creditors have been paid, and all the benefit or loss resulting from the decision of this case will affect the contributories only. The principle in question was however extended to a case where all the creditors had been paid in Burgess' case, 15 Ch. Div. 609, decided by the Master of the Rolls Jessel. He quotes in support of his judgment the dicta of Lord Cairns in Tennant v. City of Glasgow Bank and in Huddsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, and shews in a manner which commands my assent, that the rule has relation to the adjustment of the rights of contributories inter se, as well as to the claims of creditors. It appears to me that this must be so, and I take leave to adopt the reasoning in that judgment.

"But still further, it was contended that the fact that prior to the date of the liquidation the defender's shares had been forfeited, and that he was not at that time a shareholder, makes a very material distinction, and renders the previous decisions wholly inapplicable. The contention was that the defender was thereafter nothing but an ordinary debtor to the company under a contract induced by fraud, and that that contract could not be enforced.

"The contract in question was that whereby the defender on the one hand received the shares and became entitled to all the benefits of a shareholder, and whereby on the other hand he undertook to fulfil all the obligations which the articles of association and the law imposed on a shareholder. Among these obligations were liability for calls up to the limited amount so long as he remained a shareholder, liability to be put on the B list of contributories even after he had transferred his shares, and liability to pay the calls even after his shares had been forfeited in respect of the provisions of article 23. That contract has not been reduced, and although the shares have been forfeited all the other incidents of the contract remain, and that being so, it is not very easy

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

a shareholder. Hence he was entitled to plead the fraud of the company as an answer to the demand for these arrears. It was impossible to construe the articles of association relating to the forfeiture of shares as meaning that notwithstanding forfeiture the person forfeited remained a member; and it was equally difficult to maintain that if the member had ceased to be a member through forfeiture, the directors could by cancellation of the forfeiture restore him to his position as a member without his consent, and without compliance by him with the conditions of the cancellation. But assuming that the defender was a member at the date of the liquidation, the liquidation was not a liquidation in the sense of Turquand's case, and the cases following thereon. It was not a credi-to see how the right to enforce these obligations can be resisted. But no plea has been taken in this case founded on the mere want of a reduction, and that being so, I am disposed to hold that the case may be considered as if the question were whether the contract could now be rescinded, for, if it is not treated as rescinded, it must of course be enforced.

---

"I think that the decisions which have been referred to cover the case in point of principle. There is no doubt that after the forfeiture of the shares the defender's relation to the company was not destroyed. He still remained under certain obligations. He was liable to pay the money payable to the company in respect of the forfeited shares under section 23, and he was further liable to be placed as a contributory on the B list as a past shareholder—Creyk's case, 5 Ch. 63, Buckley, 135, Lindley's Company Law, 845. Now the only contract into which he entered with the company was the contract to take shares; therefore that contract to take shares was a subsisting contract at the date of forfeiture and at the date of liquidation. Now it is true that some of the reasons which have been stated against an action of reduction after liquidation hardly seem to apply in the present circumstances. One of these reasons has been that the shareholder is not in a position after liquidation to make restitutio in integrum, because he cannot restore the shares in the same condition or with the same qualities as when he got them. It may be doubtful how far that reason could operate in this case, for the defender has no shares to return; and I doubt whether it could be maintained that just on that account he cannot rescind because he is not in a position to make any restitution at all, not to speak of restitutio in integrum. Further, I doubt whether section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, on which Jessel, M. R., rested a good deal in Burgess' case, applies to the case of a member whose shares have been forfeited. But if these are not the only reasons for the rule in question, and if the true principle involved is as stated by Jessel, M. R., that after the company is wound up it ceases to exist and rescission is impossible, or as stated by Blackburn, J., in Stone v. City and County Bank, 3 C. P. Div. 309, 'that wherever the rights of other persons intervene a contract to take shares though induced by fraud cannot be rescinded,' then the application of these principles is nowise affected by the forfeiture; they apply just as much to this incident in the contract, viz., the liability to pay calls after the shares have been forfeited, as they would have applied to the liability for calls had there been no forfeiture. Various points in regard to this question are dealt with by Mr Buckley at pp. 109, 110, 5th ed., and I adopt and refer to his statement of the law.

"Further, it does appear to me that the same conclusion may be reached by an easier and simpler route, because I think that section 23 of the articles may and ought to be read as meaning that the obligation of a shareholder to pay the capital unpaid on his shares shall not be affected by their forfeiture; from which it follows that if he must have been held liable in this case had there been no forfeiture, that liability must remain the same, the forfeiture notwithstanding. For these reasons, although conscious of the cogency of the arguments supporting the opposite view, I am, on the whole, of opinion that the defender is, because of the liquidation, too late in challenging his liability to pay the calls made on his shares."

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

or's liquidation, but was a mere step in the reconstruction of what practically remained throughout the same company.

Argued for the pursuers;—The defender by becoming a member of the ompany became bound by its articles, and remained so liable until rescision of the contract,[1] and there had been no rescission here. The 23d rticle declared that the "forfeiting member" should remain liable for alls, which implied that, notwithstanding forfeiture, he remained a member." The meaning of that and the 24th article was that forfeiture etermined membership only as regarded the future. As regarded past alls a "forfeiting member" remained a member to all intents and purposes; he was indebted to the company in respect of such calls just s a member still on the register would have been. He was thus in an ssentially different position from that of an ordinary outside debtor. he principle therefore of Oakes v. Turquand and Burgess' case applied ere, for the liquidation here was a liquidation in the sense of these decisions. The Lord Ordinary's reasoning was well founded on that point lso.

At advising,—

Lord Kinnear.—This action for payment of calls was originally instituted in e Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire. As originally brought, it appears to have en based on two separate grounds—(1) That the defender was a shareholder, nd was thus liable for the payment of the calls; and (2) that if he were no longer a shareholder, he was liable as a debtor under an obligation to pay calls which had been made while he still held that character. The first of these two rounds is no longer insisted in. It is conceded that the defender was not a ember of the company at the time of the liquidation, but it is said that he is he company's debtor.

The facts are few, and so far as material, are mainly proved by the statements n a minute of admissions for the parties. The defender applied for shares in his company, which was incorporated on 25th October 1886, and 100 shares of 1 each were allotted to him upon his application. But then he avers that he as induced to make this application for shares by the false statements which ere contained in the prospectus, and he alleges not only that the representations, n the faith of which he was induced to apply for the shares, were in fact false, ut that they were made by the directors of the company in the knowledge that hey were false, and for the fraudulent purpose of inducing the public, to whom hey were addressed, to invest in the shares, and it is now admitted that both of hese statements are true. The pursuers admit that the whole statements contained in certain articles of the statement of facts for the defender, which embodied at somewhat greater length the averments to which I have now referred, are correct, and that the prospectus therein mentioned contained misrepresentations which would have entitled the defender to rescind his contract after taking the shares in question if he had taken action for that purpose before the liquidation and reconstruction after mentioned. Now, the defender having been thus fraudulently induced to take these shares, paid 5s. per share on application and allotment, but then after he became a shareholder three calls were made. On the 25th November 1886 it was resolved that the remaining 15s. per share should be called up by three calls, payable on 22d December, 4th February, and 12th March 1887. The defender paid none of these calls, but, on the contrary, inti-

[1] In re Scottish Petroleum Company, 1883, L. R., 23 Chanc. Div. 413.

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

mated to the directors that he declined to pay. The pursuers judicially admit that the defender on the faith of the prospectus of the company applied for and had allotted to him 100 shares, and paid the amount payable on application and allotment, but that he declined to make any further payment when the calls were made by the directors. The ground upon which he so declined is not stated, but it is not suggested by the pursuers that there was any other ground for his declinature than that which is very plainly suggested in the former part of the admission, that the defender having found that he had been defrauded declined to make any further payment in respect of the liability which he had thereby formally incurred. Upon that declinature, it is further admitted that the directors forfeited the shares, and that on or about the 24th March 1887 the defender received intimation that the 100 shares held by him were by resolution duly passed on said date forfeited.

Now, of course upon the forfeiture the shares ceased to be the property of the defender, and his name was accordingly removed from the register of members. It does not clearly appear when this alteration of the register was made, but it is conceded by the pursuers that the defender's name was in fact so removed, and in their pleas in law which they were allowed to add they found upon the fact, or, at all events, they refer to it as one which they admit, because they plead that "Notwithstanding the forfeiture of the defender's shares, and his removal from the register of members, he is, in respect of the 23d article of association, liable for the said calls." I take it therefore as admitted, for the purposes of this case, that following upon the forfeiture of the shares the defender's name was removed from the register. The effect in law of that operation does not appear to me to be doubtful. The shares having been forfeited in respect of the defender's repudiation of liability, and his consequent refusal to pay calls, and his name having thereupon been removed from the register, the defender ceased from that time to be a member of the company. But while the defender's rights and liabilities as a member of the company were thus determined by the forfeiture of his shares, which passed to the company itself, he still remained liable according to the form of the contract into which he had entered for payment of the calls which had been already made, in accordance with certain articles of the association upon which the present action is founded. The 20th and following articles of the association provide for the forfeiture of shares, and the 23d article provides that any money which shall be payable to the company in respect of any forfeited shares shall, notwithstanding the forfeiture, continue to be payable to the company, and shall be recoverable by them, with interest, from the forfeiting member or his representatives, and therefore the effect of a valid forfeiture would be this, that the contract of copartnership or membership of the company would be determined as from the date of removal of the shareholder's name from the register, but there would still remain the liability of the shareholder as a debtor to the company in respect of the obligation embodied in these articles.

That, then, was the position of the defender, according to the form of the documents, after the forfeiture of his shares. He had ceased to be a member of the company, but he had not ceased to be liable for the calls which he had already declined to pay. That was the formal effect of the contract. But there can be no doubt, upon the admissions before us, that there was no real liability on the part of the defender to pay these calls, because it is admitted that he has a perfectly good defence to any action in respect that his liability had arisen

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

from a fraud. The fraud having been discovered, he did not repudiate his shares to the extent of insisting for the rescission of the contract, but he repudiated all liability under the shares. The directors, acting as agents of the company, gave effect to that repudiation, not merely by forfeiting the shares, but by abstaining from making any demand against him for payment of the calls. That is clearly the result of the arrangement, and that it was a perfectly just result appears from what is proved in evidence. It appears that other persons, who were in the same position as the defender, applied to the Court to have their names removed from the register, and to have the amounts paid by them paid back, and that their applications were successful. It is evident that the company could not have enforced payment from the defender if they had taken steps to do so before the liquidation. The company therefore did for the present defender what the Court did for the applicants in other cases, by removing their names from the register of shareholders. His position after the forfeiture differed from that of those persons in two points only. He did not recover the money he had paid on allotment, and the original contract which he had been induced to make was not formally rescinded. But it was determined to the same effect as if he had transferred his shares. The company gave him no formal discharge for the past calls, but it is plain that if they had brought any action for payment of the calls he would have had a valid defence, and the action must have failed.

That being the position of matters, the company resolved to wind up for the purpose of reconstruction, and in order to carry into effect an agreement with certain persons who had been vendors of the property, the value of which had been misrepresented in the prospectus. At the same time the directors agreed that the holders of forfeited shares should be entitled to the benefits accruing from the new arrangement, and accordingly, before the resolution to wind up, the directors passed a resolution by which they resolved that all forfeitures of shares should be cancelled, subject to compliance on the part of the holders of such shares with the terms of the reconstruction agreement. By the articles of association the directors had discretionary power to cancel, and I assume from the terms of their resolution that they had been advised, no doubt correctly, that after liquidation the liquidators would have no power to cancel forfeitures which had been validly made, and therefore it was thought desirable that they should pass this general resolution with the view to give those of their shareholders whose shares had been forfeited the benefit of the reconstruction. But that is a mere resolution to cancel. It was conditional, and did not operate as an actual cancellation of the forfeiture of the defender's shares, because it was conditional on the defender's acceptance of the new agreement. The defender never became a party to the new agreement and therefore this resolution in no way affected him. After liquidation the liquidators, assuming that the defender would be disposed to take advantage of this resolution, but without any notice to him, put his name upon the list of contributories, but it is conceded that no effect is to be ascribed to that action of the liquidators any more than to the resolution of the directors, and therefore, although it is necessary in the history of the case to mention these proceedings, they appear in no way to affect the position of parties. The question is, what was the position of the defender after the company had gone into liquidation with relation to the company and its liquidators? I do not think it is now maintained that he was at that time a member of the company, and, at all events, I am of opinion that his membership had

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

ceased. It had been validly determined by the directors acting as the agents and representatives of the company, and his name had thereupon been removed from the register. He might still have been liable to the creditors of the company, not as a present member, but because he had been at one time a member, and therefore if the conditions upon which such liability exists had arisen, it may very well be that the defender as a past shareholder would have been in the same position as if he had transferred his shares to a purchaser, and might have been put upon the B list. But that does not appear in any way to affect the question which is now to be considered between the parties, because it is not maintained that the circumstances arose in which it would have been necessary to make up such a list. The liability of such a contributory is limited by the statute, and arises only in the case of the actual shareholders not being able to pay the contributions required from them, and of there still remaining unpaid debts contracted during the period he was a member. There is no doubt that these conditions did not arise in this case and that being so, it appears to me that there is no ground, as between the liquidators and the defender, for holding that he can be treated as a member of the company liable to be placed on a list of contributories either in respect of a past or of a continuing membership.

But then the pursuers maintain that the defender is still liable as a debtor to the company for past calls under the articles of association which I have read, and this came to be the ground of action which required consideration, and which induced the learned Sheriff to allow a proof. The Sheriff-substitute in his note to the interlocutor allowing a proof says this,—"The only ground upon which the defender can be sued is that at the date of the forfeiture he was a debtor to the company in certain sums, and if he is to be sued as a debtor, it seems clear enough that he has the rights of a debtor, and therefore, among other rights, that of shewing that the alleged debt was induced by fraud." I agree with this, and I think the ground so stated for allowing a proof may now be adopted as the ground for giving judgment in favour of the defender. If the defender was not a member but a mere debtor of the company, then I am unable to see how the fact of the liquidation can in any way affect the respective rights and liabilities of the parties. If he had ceased to be a member of the company before the resolution to wind up, his liability as a debtor of the company would be in no way affected by that resolution. It is the duty of a liquidator to recover moneys which may be due to the company, and to take legal proceedings for that purpose if necessary, but he has no higher right against the company's debtors than the company itself possessed, and if the persons whom he may sue as debtors have a good answer to the claim by the company, it appears to me to be of no consequence to them whether the proceedings are instituted against them by the directors, while the company subsists for its original purpose, or by the liquidator, when it subsists only for the purpose of winding up. They cannot be deprived of their right to state a valid defence against an alleged claim of debt by the voluntary resolution of the company to wind up its affairs.

But it is said that after liquidation it is too late to plead the company's fraud and that this has been decided by a series of decisions, of which Oakes v. Turquand is a well-known example. It is perfectly well settled by those decisions, which are in that respect merely examples of a more general doctrine well established in law, that a shareholder cannot be allowed to repudiate his shares after a winding-up order, or after a resolution to wind up has been passed

No. 147.

Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

The grounds upon which this has been decided are stated by the Lord President in the case of Tennant v. The City of Glasgow Bank, 6 R. 554. He says—"It appears to me that the law on this subject may be stated in three propositions. In the first place, a contract induced by a fraud is not void, but only voidable at the option of the party defrauded; secondly, this does not mean that the contract is void till ratified, but means that the contract is valid till rescinded; and third, the option to void the contract is barred where innocent third parties have, in reliance on the fraudulent contract, acquired rights which would be defeated by its rescission"; and this statement was approved by the House of Lords (May 20, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 69). The material proposition is the third one, that when a purchaser of shares has allowed his name to be put upon a register of shareholders, and when creditors have acquired rights by contracting with the company upon the strength of the register which contained his name, it is too late after liquidation, when the creditors' rights against the company have been converted into rights against the shareholders, to rescind the contract to take shares, and withdraw from the register on the allegation that the contract was procured by fraud.

The case of Tennant went a little further, because there the application for the reduction of the fraudulent contract was brought before the resolution to wind up had been passed by the company, but then it was not brought until after the directors of the company had taken steps which declared the insolvency of the company to be irretrievable, and therefore had affected the position of their creditors in the same way as if the resolution to wind up had been actually passed, and therefore in this case too it was decided that the shareholder could not be relieved, his challenge having come too late.

The doctrine was again applied in somewhat different circumstances in the case of Burgess, which was pressed so much on us. It was decided by Sir George Jessel that even when the assets in the hands of the liquidator were sufficient to pay all the debts of the company, a shareholder, whose name was on the register at the date of the winding up, could not be allowed a year afterwards to rescind his contract and get rid of his liabilities as a member, while the rights and liabilities of the shareholders, inter se, still remained to be adjusted. But the ground of judgment was that the liquidation had altered the position of the shareholders towards each other just as it had altered the position of the company's creditors towards the shareholders. This alteration is effected by the 38th section of the statute, which imposes new liabilities upon the members of the company, both towards the creditors and towards one another, and the learned Judge points out that the other shareholders were therefore to be considered as innocent parties who had acquired rights under the 38th section, which would be taken away from them if the applicant were allowed to withdraw. They were exactly in the same position in so far as regards the claim of one of their fellow-shareholders to withdraw from the company after liquidation as the company's creditors were in the case of Oakes v. Turquand.

Now, if that be the ground of judgment in the case of Burgess, it appears to me very clear that it has no application to the present case, because what was decided there was that a shareholder who had been induced to take shares by fraud, but who had retained his shares until innocent third parties had acquired rights against him in his character of shareholder, was not thereafter entitled to rescind his contract and relieve himself of his shares to the prejudice of such

No. 147.
Mar. 19, 1891.
Liquidators of Mount Morgan (West) Gold Mine, Limited, v. M'Mahon.

innocent parties. He might have had a good claim against the company while it existed, but he had no claim against the contributories after the company had ceased to exist. But the defender does not seek to rescind the contract to take shares. He has no need to do so. It has been determined by the valid act of the directors. He has been relieved of his shares, and is converted, as the Sheriff-substitute I think rightly says, into a mere debtor of the company; and his liability, if it exists, is still a liability to the company and to no one else. The liquidation makes no such change in the position of the company towards its debtors as to give to individual shareholders any personal demand against such debtors, or any new right in the debts due to the company which they did not possess before. They cannot therefore be represented as innocent third parties who have acquired a right, by virtue of winding-up, to enforce a claim against the defender which could not be enforced against him by the company itself. It is still the company which is the creditor if the claim be a good one; and it appears to me to follow that a defence which would have been good against an action by the directors on behalf of the company must be equally valid against an action by the liquidators, who have come into their place as the company's agents. The rights of the company against its debtors must be the same whether it is going on or whether it is winding up. If the action is maintained on the ground that the other shareholders have an interest in enforcing the obligation of the defender, that is not putting those other shareholders into the position of third parties who ought not on account of the fraud of the company to be deprived of a right which they have innocently acquired, but of persons who are seeking to procure a gain in knowledge of the fraud.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be recalled and the defender assoilzied.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD ADAM.—I also concur, and I am authorised by the Lord President to say that his Lordship is of the same opinion.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the libel.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—HENRY & SCOTT, W.S.—Agents.

No. 148.
Mar. 20, 1891.
Allan v. Gronmeyer.

THOMAS CRANSTOUN ALLAN AND ANOTHER, Petitioners (Respondents).—Dickson—Sym.

RICHARD GRONMEYER, Respondent (Reclaimer).—W. C. Smith.

Judicial Factor—Appointment—Partnership.—By the contract of copartnery of a wholesale wine and spirit business it was provided that on a dissolution of the firm the business should be realised by one of the partners named with all convenient speed. This partner contributed no capital to the business. The firm was dissolved in 1888. In 1890 the remaining partners presented a petition for the appointment of a judicial factor on the partnership estates, averring that the partner whose duty it was to realise had been carrying on the business instead of realising. This averment he denied. The accounts were by consent remitted to an accountant, who reported that since the dissolution of the firm the business had been carried on as a going concern. The Court appointed an accountant to be judicial factor to wind up the business.

Observations, per Lord M'Laren, on the competency of looking at reports and other informal evidence without allowing parties an opportunity of adducing proof in considering whether a judicial factor should be appointed.

No. 148.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Allan v. Gronmeyer.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Low.
C.

IN May 1881 a contract of copartnery was entered into between Thomas Cranstoun Allan, Albert James Allan, and Richard Gronmeyer, to carry on the business of wine and spirit-merchants in Leith, under the firm of Scott & Allan.

The capital of the business, amounting to about £22,000, was contributed entirely by the Messrs Allan.

The 14th article of the contract of copartnership provided,—"That on the termination of this contract, whether at its natural expiry or sooner, the books of the company shall be brought to a balance, and the value of the stock in trade, property, and outstanding debts, and the obligations of the company shall be ascertained," and the stock, property, and outstanding debts of the company should be realised by Gronmeyer, "and the debts due by the company shall be cleared off with all convenient speed, and the capital and profits of the company shall be divided between or among the partners, or their representatives, according to their respective interests therein."

Early in 1888 the partners agreed that that partnership should be dissolved, and that Gronmeyer should wind up the business in terms of the above article.

In October 1890 the Messrs Allan presented a petition for the appointment of a judicial factor on the partnership estate.

The petitioners averred that they were not satisfied with the way in which Gronmeyer was dealing with the business; that instead of winding it up he was carrying it on as a going concern; that he had since 1887 increased the liabilities of the company, and almost entirely renewed the stock in trade; and that, looking to the large amount of their capital still in his hands, it was of great importance that the partnership property should be realised with all convenient speed.

Gronmeyer lodged answers in which he averred that he was managing the business with a view to the judicious realisation of the large stock of wines and spirits held by the firm; and that the appointment of a judicial factor would lead to a sacrifice of the stock, and cause loss to the petitioners.

The respondent, by minute, agreed that the books of the firm should be submitted to Messrs R. & E. Scott, C.A., for audit, who had audited the books annually, and further undertook that the realisation should be completed not later than Whitsunday 1892.

Messrs Scott lodged a report for the period from 11th February 1887 to 31st October 1890. It shewed that the amount due at the latter date to Mr T. C. Allan was £11,282, 8s. 3d., to Mr A. J. Allan, £11,723, 19s. 8d., and by the respondent, £2118, 0s. 2d. The value of the stock was stated at £17,986, 0s. 7d. It stated that a loss had been incurred in the conduct of the business of £2330, 6s. 8d. during that period, and that the liabilities of the firm had materially increased from £2078, 17s. 8d. to £8132, 16s. 11d. The amount due by customers was £9323, 13s. 10d. in February 1887, and £11,816, 9s. 7d. in October 1890.

The report further stated "that the books appear to have been carefully and accurately kept, and that the statement of balances appears to exhibit the position of the business at the date of the balance. The accountants were under the impression, from what they were told by the agents for Messrs Allan, when the examination of the books was made in 1888 for the year ending 11th February 1887, that the business was only to be continued for the purpose of gradually winding it up, but they find that, instead of this having been done, the business has been carried on as a going concern, and that the whole of the stock of spirits and wines in bond, valued at £11,624, 2s. 2d., with the exception of about £1000, has been purchased subsequent to that date."

No. 148.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Allan v. Gronmeyer.

On 5th March the Lord Ordinary (Low) appointed Mr E. E. Scott, C.A., to be judicial factor on the partnership estate for the purpose of winding up the business, with the usual powers.*

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—Mere dissolution of the firm would not warrant the appointment of a judicial factor on partnership estates; there must be some breach of duty on the part of the partners appointed to realise. Here there was averment on the one side and denial on the other; in that case there must be a proof, for otherwise the Court had no evidence on which to proceed.[1] It was most inexpedient for the petitioners themselves that the whole of this considerable stock should be thrown on the market at once. In any case, an accountant was not qualified to wind up a wine-merchant's business.

Argued for the petitioners;—Under the contract of copartnership it was the respondent's duty to realise the business when the partnership had been dissolved. But he had been carrying on the business instead of winding it up. Messrs Scott's report abundantly shewed that. That report was made of consent, and was competent evidence. It was nothing to the point that immediate realisation might result in a loss; the petitioners alone were interested in the result of the realisation, and they desired that course.

LORD ADAM.—In this case it is obvious that the petitioners, the Messrs Allan, have a very overwhelming interest in the matter, because they have a capital in the firm of between £20,000 and £30,000, and the respondent has no capital at

* "OPINION.— . . . It thus appears that the respondent has not been winding up the business and realising the stock, as in 1888 he undertook to do. On the contrary, he has been carrying on the business as a going business, and carrying it on at a loss, and the stock, instead of being reduced, has actually been increased.

"The respondent had, so far as I can see, no legitimate interest in failing to realise stock as speedily as possible when the partnership was dissolved. He had no capital in the business, only a trifling sum being due to him, and there seems to be no doubt that the assets of the firm were greatly more than sufficient to meet the liabilities. Notwithstanding this, he has, while leading his partners to believe that he was winding up the business, been carrying it on as a going concern, with the result that the capital of his partners has been reduced, a year's loss has been incurred, the liabilities of the firm have been largely increased, and also the amount of outstanding debts due to the firm, he himself has become a debtor to the firm, and the stock on hand is larger than ever.

"In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the petitioners are entitled to have the winding up of the business taken out of the respondent's hands. What-ever his motives may have been, he has broken faith with the petitioners, and I think that they have reasonable grounds for fearing that their interests may be imperilled if he is allowed to continue in the management. I shall therefore appoint a judicial factor.

"It is probably right to add, that apart from the fact that the respondent has carried on the business instead of winding it up, notwithstanding the dissolution of the partnership and the express wish of his partners, I do not see any reason to suppose that he has acted dishonestly. The books are accurately and properly kept, and, so far as they are concerned, there appears to have been no disposition on the respondent's part to conceal or misrepresent the true state of matters. But he seems to have been determined to carry on the business instead of winding it up. To do so was contrary to his duty, . . . and has been to the prejudice of the petitioners; and as they have really the sole interest in the realisation of the stock, I think that they are entitled to demand that it should be entrusted to someone else."

[1] Collins v. Young, March 14, 1853, 1 Macq. 385.

No. 148.
Mar. 20, 1891.
Allan v. Gronmeyer.

all. The petitioners therefore have a very clear interest to see that that capital is safe. The facts, as I understood them, are these,—The late firm of Scott & Allan, which consisted of the petitioners the Messrs Allan, and the respondent Mr Gronmeyer, came to an end in the spring of 1888. It then became the duty of Mr Gronmeyer to wind up the concern and realise the business, and he has had from 1888 till 1891 to carry out that duty, with the result that the business is as far from being wound up as ever. After the case came into Court, the parties agreed that the accounts of the firm should be remitted to Messrs Scott, accountants, and we have a report from them, which is binding on both parties, and is not objected to by either party. In that report the reporters state "that the books appear to have been carefully and accurately kept, and that the statement of balances appears to exhibit the position of the business at the date of the balance. They were under the impression, from what they were told by the agents for Messrs Allan, when the examination of the books was made in 1888 for the year ending 11th February 1887, that the business was only to be continued for the purpose of gradually winding it up, but they find that, instead of this having been done, the business has been carried on as a going concern, and that the whole of the stock of spirits and wines in bond, valued at £11,624, 2s. 2d., with the exception of about £1000, has been purchased subsequent to that date." Now that report shews that this business which the partners resolved in 1888 should be wound up has, instead of being wound up, been carried on as a going business, with the result that the whole stock now belonging to the firm has been purchased since the dissolution, and purchased with the capital of the petitioners, the Messrs Allan. It has been urged that the business has been successfully carried on, but that is not the question. The question is whether the Messrs Allan wish it to be carried on or not, and they say they do not. It was suggested that the appointment of a judicial factor is not an advantageous way of winding up a business like this. It may be so, but that again is a matter for the Messrs Allan to consider. In these circumstances I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD M'LAREN.—There is no doubt that at the expiration of the term of the contract of copartnery it was the right of the Messrs Allan, who formed the capitalist part of the concern, to require that the business should be wound up. Under one of the clauses of the contract of copartnery the winding-up is to proceed under the supervision of Mr Gronmeyer. That stipulation was inserted mainly, I think, in the interest of the Allans. Having the whole capital of the concern, it was their interest that the winding-up should be economically managed. Gronmeyer's interest having practically come to an end with the dissolution, it is intelligible that the Allans should stipulate that they should be entitled to have the benefit of his services in carrying out the winding-up.

If we are entitled to look at the evidence upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded we have these facts: an increase in the liabilities of the firm, an increase in the debts due to the firm, and an increase in its stock in trade, almost the whole stock now belonging to the firm having been purchased since the dissolution. Upon these facts, if we are to take them as facts, there can be no doubt that Gronmeyer has failed to carry out his undertaking to wind up the business, but on the contrary has been carrying it on as a going business.

My only difficulty is as to whether we are entitled to take these facts into consideration at the present stage of the proceedings, keeping in view the obser-

No. 149.

Mar. 20, 1891. Mid and East Calder Gas-Light Co. v. Oakbank Oil Co., Limited.

year 1886 or beginning of the year 1887 the defenders, without leave asked or obtained from the pursuers, and at their own hand, and without any warrant or authority, lifted the said gas-pipes and removed them from the place where they had been originally laid. . . . The defenders have, in consequence of the pursuers' demands, made some slight repairs on several occasions, but they have not carried out these in such a manner as to prevent the loss of gas, or to reduce the loss to a minimum. . . . The principal pursuers reserve all their right for damages and for the loss of gas for the period since 6th June 1886, up to which time the claims of the pursuers were settled by the defenders. . . ."

The defenders in answer stated,—(Ans. 4) "Admitted that in course of laying a branch line of railway from the pit mouth at Calderhall to their works, which the defenders were authorised to do under an agreement with the proprietor of the land, the defenders had occasion to lift and relay some pipes which passed through the ground leased by them from the proprietor for the purpose of the said railway. Explained and averred that this was done with the pursuers' knowledge and concurrence, and they turned off the gas and made the necessary preparations to enable the defenders to carry on their operations. [The pursuers denied this.] Admitted also that certain claims of the pursuers have been settled up to 6th June 1886. Explained that no liability was thereby admitted, and that at the same time an intimation was made to the pursuers that the pipes between the gate and Calderhall House having recently been relaid, and, where necessary, renewed and generally put into good order, the defenders would be no longer responsible for any gas leakage."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The gas-pipes mentioned having been through the mining operations of the defenders, or their predecessors, for whose acts they are responsible, injured or destroyed, the pursuers are entitled to the warrants craved. (2) The defenders having, unwarrantably and illegally, lifted and destroyed or injured the gas-pipes belonging to the pursuers in the manner condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to the warrants craved, to the effect of ordaining the defenders to lift and renew and repair and relay said pipes in a satisfactory manner.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (3) The defenders are not bound to repair or renew the gas-pipes referred to.

At a proof it was established that the escape of gas arose partly in consequence of the subsidence of the ground which followed on the defenders' operations, and partly owing to the defective manner in which the defenders had relaid the pipes which they had removed without consulting the pursuers.

On 20th January 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd) (after certain findings in fact) found further that in consequence of the original Oakbank Oil Company's excavation of the shale underlying the lands of Calderhall, there was in several places a subsidence of the surface of these lands prior to the month of June 1878; that the pursuers having complained of the displacement of their pipes and the leakage of gas thereby caused, by arrangement between the oil and gas companies a meter was placed to ascertain the amount of leakage; that from 3d June 1878 till 2d June 1884 the original oil company paid the price of the gas lost, and also from time to time uplifted and repaired portions of the pipes with the view of preventing further loss; that about the end of 1886 or beginning of 1887 the defenders constructed a line of railway in connection with their oil works, which necessitated the uplifting and removal of a part of the branch line of gas-pipes within the policy of Calderhall; that the defenders accordingly (without consulting the Gas-Light Company) uplifted a portion of the said pipes, some of which they relaid in a different line; that the

No. 149.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Mid and East Calder Gas-Light Co. v. Oakbank Oil Co., Limited.

pursuers the Gas-Light Company complained to the defenders of their conduct in uplifting the said pipes without leave asked or obtained, and also of the manner in which the defenders had put down the pipes, some of which were laid upon the surface of the ground; that, after some correspondence between the parties, the defenders relaid the pipes, which they sunk to a depth of about eighteen inches below the surface of the ground; that the defenders have paid the pursuers the Gas-Light Company for leakage and loss of gas arising from defects in the said branch line of pipes from the 2d of June 1884 to the 3d of February 1887, and they also on several occasions caused repairs to be executed on the said pipes down to about the end of December 1888; "(12) that between the beginning of February 1887 and the present time there has been great leakage of gas from the said pipes, caused either by subsidence of the ground, owing to the mining operations of the defenders and the original Oil Company, or to the defective manner in which the defenders replaced that portion of the said pipes which they uplifted and relaid as aforesaid, but the defenders refuse to make any further alterations or repairs thereon, with the view of putting a stop to said leakage: Finds in point of law that the defenders are bound to take such steps as may be necessary for the purpose of preventing as far as possible further loss of gas by leakage as aforesaid: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns and ordains the defenders forthwith to execute such alterations and repairs upon the said line of gas-pipes between the meter near the lodge at Calderhall and the mansion-house as will prevent as far as possible further leakage of gas therefrom, and that at the sight and to the satisfaction of Mr George Stratton," &c.

On appeal the Sheriff (Crichton) adhered, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the cause.

On 24th March 1890, the Sheriff-substitute in respect of the defenders' failure to comply with the interlocutor of 20th January, authorised the principal pursuers to execute the alteration and repairs specified in the interlocutor, and that at the sight and to the satisfaction of Mr George Stratton, and remitted to him to see the work done and to report.

Mr Stratton having thereafter lodged his report, the Sheriff-substitute approved thereof and ordained the defenders to pay to the pursuers the sum of £21, 16s. 4d., being the expense of performing the operations specified in his interlocutor of 20th January, together with the sum of £8, 8s. as the reporter's fee.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The gas company had no title to sue the action. The gas-pipes were laid down on Colonel Hare's land, and there was no averment that he or anyone else was bound to maintain them. The pipes were in the ground merely on sufferance, and the company might be ordered at any moment to lift and remove them. The fact that Colonel Hare appeared as a concurring pursuer could not make the title to pursue good.[1] The defenders did not deny that they were bound to make good any damage, if such there was, to that small portion of the piping which they had lifted and re-laid in constructing their branch line, but the proof was not clear whether in point of fact there was such damage. As regarded the damage done by subsidence of the ground, it was not averred that the defenders were working illegally or without proper precautions. Further, under their contract the defenders were entitled to create surface damage subject to payment therefor to Colonel Hare. In the absence of any agreement by the mineral tenants that they should repair damage done to the pipes by their workings, the [1] MacRitchie's Trustees v. Hislop, Dec. 17, 1879, 7 R. 384, rev. June 23, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

No. 150.
Mar. 20, 1891.
Howit's Trustees v. Lawson.

pose of ascertaining his rights to the English estate and for obtaining administration of the testator's real and personal estates, but only in so far as it might be necessary or proper for the purpose of obtaining for himself the English real estate free of all liabilities. The Scots Court sisted procedure in the declarator, to await the decision of the English Court as to the right to administer the English heritage.

1st Division. Lord Kinnear. M.

DAVID GAVIN HEWIT, a domiciled Scotsman, who had, however, carried on business in London as well as in Edinburgh, died on 1st August 1887. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, executed in London, but in Scots form, by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estates.

To enable his trustees to carry out the purposes of his settlement he conferred on them "all requisite powers, and particularly (but without prejudice to said generality, and without prejudice to the powers hereinbefore contained with reference to my businesses in Edinburgh and London), I empower them to retain the property and securities in which my means and estate may be invested at the time of my death, and also, whenever they think fit, to sell, realise, and convert into money the whole estate or any part thereof (whether as left at my death or at any time invested), and that either by public roup or private bargain, and to execute and deliver all deeds and writings necessary for divesting themselves of the premises, binding the trust-estate in absolute warrandice."

By the ninth purpose of his trust-deed the truster directed his trustees to pay certain legacies, amongst others the following to charitable institutions:—(8) To the Corporation of the Scottish Hospital, whose office is in Crane Court, Fleet Street, London, payable on the receipt of the treasurer or secretary, or honorary treasurer or honorary secretary thereof, for the time being, £1000. (9) To the Caledonian Asylum, whose office is in Holloway, London, payable on the receipt of the treasurer or secretary, or honorary treasurer or honorary secretary thereof, for the time being, £500. (10) To the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, payable on the receipt of the treasurer or clerk thereof for the time being, £1000.

He also left legacies of £105 to each of his trustees who should accept, and a legacy of £3000 to his nephew William Lawson, who was also one of the trustees who accepted.

With regard to the residue of the trust-estate, the operative purpose of the deed was as follows:—"(Fourteenth) In the event of my having no child or children, or in the event of the failure of such child or children and their issue before the period of vesting, then I direct my trustees to dispose of the free residue as follows:—To pay to my said wife a legacy of £5000 sterling, and to each of my said three nephews, William Lawson, Robert Lawson, and George Lawson, an additional legacy of £3000, payable, said several legacies, at such time as my trustees may find convenient, and without any interest thereon; and whatever balance may then remain, I authorise my trustees to divide and apportion, in such shares as they may consider best, among the following charitable institutions, viz., the Corporation of the Scottish Hospital, London, the Caledonian Asylum, London, the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, the Longmore Hospital for Incurables, Edinburgh, the Royal Blind Asylum, Edinburgh, the Leather Trades' Benevolent Institution, London, and the Leather Trades' Benevolent Institution, Glasgow, declaring that my trustees shall be the sole judges as to the time or times when any sum or sums shall be so divided and apportioned, and they shall not be liable to be called in question by the said institutions, or any of them, or those acting for any of them: And also declaring that if there be any dubiety as to any of the institutions in respect the precise name thereof may not have been given, my trustees shall be entitled themselves to decide conclusively and finally as to the institution entitled to the benefit."

No. 150.

Mar. 20, 1891.

Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

In the trust-deed Mr Hewit desired that his affairs should be "administered and wound up, as far as practicable, in accordance with the law and practice of Scotland."

Mr Hewit was survived by a son, who died three weeks after his father, being only a few weeks old, and without having attained the age at which any benefit under the trust was to vest in him. He was also survived by a sister, Mrs Lawson, who died three months after him intestate, survived in her turn by her eldest son, William Lawson, the nephew and legatee of the truster already mentioned, who thus became the truster's heir.

The estate of the truster consisted of (1) heritage in Scotland to the value of £7300; (2) heritable estate in England to the value of £11,934; (3) personal estate in the United Kingdom to the amount of £99,519; (4) Scottish bonds, excluding executors, to the amount of £9017; and (5) personal estate abroad to the amount of £1372, together £129,142.

His debts amounted to £13,837, his legacies to £37,420, and the value of certain annuities to £18,700, together £69,957.

The residue amounted to about £60,000. To some extent these figures were estimates only, but in the action they were accepted as approximately correct.

The trustees entered on the administration of the trust, and among other payments paid Mr Lawson his legacies of £3000 and £105.

Questions arose between Mr Lawson and the trustees as to disposal of the English real property. To settle these the trustees raised an action of declarator against Mr Lawson to have it found, first, that they were bound to administer the estate in terms of the trust-disposition, that the balance of residue left to the charities was not liable to suffer abatement in respect that part of the trust-estate consisted of English real estate, and that Mr Lawson had no claim to any part of the trust-estate beyond his three legacies, and in particular had no claim to the English real estate. Alternatively, the summons ran, it should be found that Mr Lawson was not entitled to claim both the three legacies and the English real estate, and that he was now barred by his acceptance of two of the legacies from claiming any part of the English real estate. Thirdly, if Mr Lawson should be found entitled to the English real estate, the summons concluded that he should be ordained, first, to repay the two legacies received and to renounce the third, and, second, "to bear a rateable proportion of the whole debts, legacies, and bequests payable from the trust-estate corresponding to the value of the said real estate, together with all expenses incurred or to be incurred by the pursuers, and all duties payable to Government effeiring to the said real estate."

The pursuers in their condescendence thus stated the claims of both parties;—"The defender maintains that by the law of England the said bequests to said institutions are liable to abatement in so far as the same are exigible out of or from real estate in England, and that he is entitled to said real estate in so far as the same or the proceeds thereof, if duly administered under said trust-disposition and settlement, would fall to said institutions. The trustees deny this, and maintain that the said legacies are subject to no abatement; or otherwise that, if they were, the defender was bound to elect between the said three legacies and any right he might have had to said real estate, and that by accepting payment of said two legacies he has concluded his election; or otherwise that, if he is still entitled to elect, he is bound, in the event of his electing to claim said real estate or any part thereof, to repay said two legacies already paid to him, with interest, under deduction always of legacy-duty, and to renounce his right to the said second legacy of £3000. By the law of England the said legacies are not subject to any such abatement."

No. 150.

Mar. 20, 1891. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

The defender admitted that his contention was as stated by the pursuers, but denied that the pursuers' statement of their own rights and duties was as they stated. He further stated:—"The estate left by the testator being of the amount and character above set forth [i.e. as narrated above], the pursuers are not in the circumstances entitled, as against the defender, according to the law of England, to sell the said freehold estate. The trust-disposition and settlement does not, according to its true construction by the law of England, create a constructive conversion of the English real estate."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender not being entitled to claim the freehold estate in England, decree ought to pass in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (2) Separatim, In respect that the defender has accepted payment of the legacies of £3000 and £105 he is barred personali exceptione from claiming the freehold estate, and decree ought to pass in terms of the second conclusion of the summons. (4) If it shall be found that the defender can claim the said freehold estate, and upon his so claiming it, he is bound (first) to renounce all claim to the legacy of £3000, and to repay the legacies of £3000 and £105 already paid to him; and (second) to bear a rateable proportion of the whole debts, legacies, and bequests payable by the trust, and of the expenses of the administration, proportionally to the value of the freehold estate so claimed. (5) In any view the defender is bound on taking said freehold estate to bear a rateable proportion of the said legacies, debts, and expenses, as aforesaid. (6) In respect of the terms of said settlement, and especially of the terms of the conveyance therein, and of the directions as to sale therein contained, (1) the pursuers are entitled and bound to administer the estate irrespective of the law of England; and (2) the defender's pleas ought to be repelled.

The defender pleaded;—(3) By the operation of the Mortmain Act (9 George II. cap. 36) the bequest of the residue of the testator's estate to the charitable institutions mentioned is null and void, so far as such residue consists of the testator's freehold and leasehold estate in England, or the proceeds thereof; and to that extent the testator died intestate. (5) The defender is not put to his election between the legacies bequeathed to him under the testator's settlement and his right to the said heritage in respect the said heritage is withdrawn from the settlement not by any act of the defender, but by the statutory law of mortmain. (6) The testator having left sufficient personal estate, and the debts, legacies, annuities, and other provisions left by the deceased, together with the expenses of administration, being primarily chargeable thereon, the pursuers are not entitled to apply any part of the English heritage in payment of the said debts, legacies, annuities, and provisions and expenses. (7) Separatim, The liability of the English freehold estate to bear any part of said debts, legacies, annuities, provisions and expenses, must be determined according to the law of England, and the freehold estate is not liable for any part thereof, in respect they are all primarily chargeable by the law of England against the personal estate and English leasehold estate.

In answer to a case submitted to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England to ascertain the law of England on several points involved in the contentions of the parties, the Court (Mr Justice Kay) returned the following opinion, viz.:—"This Court is of opinion that the bequests to charitable institutions set forth in the 9th purpose of the trust-disposition dated the 21st of May 1887, so far as they are payable out of the proceeds of the English freehold and leasehold estates, are not valid or effectual according to English law, but are null and void

No. 150.
Mar. 20, 1891.
Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

by virtue of the provisions of the 9th George II. chapter 36, re-enacted by the 51 and 52 Vict. chapter 42; and is of opinion that the bequests of shares of the residue of the trust-estate bequeathed to charitable institutions in the 14th purpose of the said trust-disposition, so far as they are payable out of the English freehold and leasehold estates, are also invalid and ineffectual according to English law, and are null and void by virtue of the provisions of the said Act; and is of opinion that in the event of the trustees of the said trust-disposition exercising the powers of sale of the freehold and leasehold estates conferred on them by the truster, David Gavin Hewit, the bequests of shares of the residue of the trust-estate bequeathed to charitable institutions, so far as payable out of the proceeds of the English freehold and leasehold estates, would still be invalid and ineffectual, and would be null and void by virtue of the said Acts: And is further of opinion that the bequests aforesaid in so far as payable out of the English freehold and leasehold estates or out of the proceeds of the sale thereof, being null and void as aforesaid, the persons entitled to take the sums which would have gone to satisfy the said bequests are, as to the English freehold estate or the proceeds thereof, the heir-at-law of the testator, or of the last purchaser within the meaning of the 3d and 4th William IV. chapter 106, and as to the English leasehold estate or the proceeds of sale thereof, the persons entitled at the testator's death to take his personal estate according to the English Statute of Distributions; and is of opinion that if and so far as the testator was the last purchaser within the meaning of the 3 and 4 William IV. chap. 106, the said William Lawson will take the English freehold estate of the proceeds of sale thereof, as heir-at-law of the testator, and not as heir-at-law of his mother, or of the child Thomas David Hewit; and is of opinion that, according to English law, the Court would, on the facts being brought before it, hold the said bequests to be void whether the heir-at-law of the testator, or of the last purchaser as to the freehold estate, or the persons entitled to the testator's personal estate, according to the English Statute of Distributions, made claim thereto or not: And even in the event of the said heir-at-law, or the persons entitled as aforesaid to the testator's personal estate, consenting to waive his or their right thereto, the said freehold and leasehold estates would not, according to the law of England, fall to be distributed in the terms of the settlement, but would be treated as undisposed of; and that the heir-at-law or the next of kin, as the case may be, may dispose of such estates by a proper deed or deeds, but, if in favour of a charity, such deed or deeds should be enrolled in accordance with the provisions of the 51 and 52 Victoria, cap. 42."

Thereafter, on 12th July 1889, Lord Kinnear (Ordinary) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, with the exception of the second branch of the third conclusion."*

* "OPINION.—It is established by the opinion of the Court in England that the bequests to charitable institutions, in so far as they are payable out of the English freehold and leasehold estates, are null and void; that, in the event of the trustees exercising the powers of sale of these estates conferred upon them by the truster, the bequests would still be null and void in so far as payable out of the proceeds; that the Court would hold these bequests to be void whether the heir-at-law made claim to the freehold estate or not; and that, even in the event of his waiving his right, the estates would not fall to be distributed in terms of the settlement, but would be treated as undisposed of.

"It would seem to me to follow that the defender cannot be required to renounce his claim to the English freehold estates as a condition of his taking

No. 150.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

The pursuers reclaimed.

While the case was pending in the Inner-House a sist was granted, the legacies which the testator has bequeathed to him, or to repay the legacies he has already received in the event of his taking up the English estates. It is said that by claiming these estates as undisposed of he will reprobate the settlement by which he has already taken benefit. But the bequests to charities, in so far as they might have affected the estates to which he is entitled as heir-at-law, are not merely ineffectual but null and void. It is obvious and elementary that a nullity can neither be reprobated nor homologated. The plea of approbate and reprobate assumes, as the Lord President explains in Douglas v. Douglas, 24 D. 1207, 'the power of making an election, and a consequent obligation to make an election,' and his Lordship adds, that 'to make a proper case of election the facts of the case must be such as to satisfy three conditions. In the first place, the person making the election must have a free choice. In the second place, the necessity of making the election must arise from the will, express or implied, of someone who has power to bind the person put to his election; and, in the third place, the result of the election of one or other of the alternatives must be to give legal effect and operation to the will so expressed or implied.' Neither of the two last-mentioned conditions are satisfied by the facts of the present case. The testator must be held to have expressed no intention to give his English freehold estates to charities, because, according to the opinion of the English Court, the bequests which might otherwise have had that effect are null and void. This does not mean that they are inoperative by reason of any technical rule of law, which the heir may enforce or may waive as he thinks fit; but that they are not to be read as expressing the testator's intention. They are struck out of the will, as effectually as if they had been cancelled or revoked by the testator himself. But even if they could be read as part of the will, the defender has no power to give legal effect and operation to the testator's intention. If he were to accept his legacies as in full of all claims arising to him through the testator's death, and were to waive his right to the English freehold estates, the will would still be inoperative as regards these estates. The bequests are null and void in so far as payable out of these estates or their proceeds, whether the defender makes claim to them or not.

"It is true that if the defender takes the estates in question, as heir-at-law, they will become his absolute property. He may dispose of them as he pleases, and he may give them to a charity if he thinks fit, provided he complies with the conditions of the Statute 51 and 52 Vict. c. 42. It is said that he is thus in the same position as a legatee whose private property a testator has assumed to dispose of by the will under which he takes benefit. But the two cases are essentially different. When a testator disposes of property which he knows to belong to another, the proprietor can take no benefit under the will if he refuses to give effect to the clear intention of the testator. But it is indispensable in order to bring this rule into operation, that the testator should know that the property is not his own, or at least that he has no direct power to dispose of it; and, if that condition is satisfied, it is also necessary that the legatee should be in a position, by reason of his right of property, to approbate the will with effect. But it cannot be assumed that the testator in the present case was aware that the Mortmain Acts would prevent his will from being carried into effect. On the contrary, it is manifest, from the frame of his settlement, that he had no doubt of his power to dispose of his whole estate as he desires it to be disposed of. There is no reason to suppose that if he had known his bequests to charities to be inoperative, so far as they bear to affect his estates in England, he would have imposed an obligation upon his heir-at-law to make a gift in favour of these charities in accordance with the provisions of the statute. I assume that would have been a legal condition. But it certainly is not expressed, and it does not appear to me to be necessarily implied in anything that the testator has done. But if it were implied, it cannot be certain, when the legacies become payable to the heir, that he will be able to comply with it; for

No. 150.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

after parties had been partly heard, to await the realisation of the English real estate, which the trustees proposed to carry out.

That sist having been granted, the defender issued and served on the pursuers a writ of the English Court, wherein he claimed (1) a declaration that the gifts to charities were null under the Statute of Mortmain,—"(2) A declaration that upon the true construction of the said trust-disposition and settlement the personal estate of the said testator was the primary fund for payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies; and that, having regard to the condition and amount of the said personal estate and to the foregoing declaration, the plaintiff as heir-at-law is now absolutely entitled to the whole of the English real estate of the said testator, freed and discharged from all liability to contribute to the payment of the testator's debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses or legacies; (3) an injunction to restrain the defendants, their solicitors, auctioneers, and agents from selling, offering, or advertising for sale the he cannot dispose of the estates in favour of a charity except in accordance with certain statutory provisions, and one of these is that he shall live for twelve months after the gift is made. Assuming, therefore, contrary to the opinion I have expressed, that the will can be read as importing such an intention as the pursuers suppose, it is still uncertain whether the defender will be in a position to approbate with effect. But there is no authority for holding that a legatee can be put to an election, whereby he shall be required, in order to obtain a legacy which has been bequeathed to him, to dispose of his own property in favour of others, without its being certain that he will, after all, be able to secure to those others the benefit which the testator is presumed to have intended.

---

"The decision which appears to be most favourable to the pursuers is that of the House of Lords in Dundas v. Dundas, 4 W. and S. 460, because, in that case, the point taken in the House of Lords, in contradistinction to the case of Ker v. Wauchope, was, that the deed disposing of real estate in England was not merely challengeable but null, and therefore that it could not be read in so far as it bore to affect English land. But I cannot read that decision as fixing a principle which will govern the present case. The distinction on which it proceeded was regarded by Lord Eldon in Ker's case, and by Lord Brougham in that of Dundas, as 'thin and unsubstantial' in itself, although it had been established by a series of decisions following upon that of Cuningham v. Gainer, in which it was first promulgated by Lord Hardwick. This might be a reason for hesitating to adopt it in a case not directly ruled by the same precedents. But there appears to me to be no room for the distinction in question in the circumstances of the present case. It was held that although a will was not duly executed according to the statutes to affect land, yet, if in the same will personalty is given upon condition that the legatee shall convey land, the words which cannot be read as affecting the land may be read for the purpose of putting the heir to an election, because the gift to him and the condition on which it is made are inseparable, and therefore the bequest of personalty cannot be read without reading at the same time the condition on which it is given. The present case appears to me to be distinguishable on the two grounds already indicated; first, because it is not an inseparable condition of the bequests to the defender that he shall make a gift in favour of charities; and, secondly, because the invalidity of the bequests to charities is owing to the nullity of the bequests themselves, and not to any mere defect in the particular form by which they are made. In the case of Dundas the bequest of land was invalid because the will was not duly executed. But the intention to bequeath land was perfectly legal, and words expressing that intention, although they could not affect the land directly, might therefore be read as importing a condition attached to a bequest of personalty. But a bequest of lands in England to charity is null and void in whatever form it be expressed, and words expressing an intention so to bequeath must therefore go for nothing."

No. 150. Mar. 20, 1891. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

said English real estate, or any part thereof; (4) an order that the defendants convey the said English real estate, for all their estate and interest therein, to the plaintiff and his heirs, or as he shall direct; or in the alternative (5) a declaration that the said trust-disposition and settlement does not on its true construction operate any conversion of the testator's English real estate into money, and that so much of the proceeds of sale of the said real estate when sold as is not in due course of administration required for payment of the testator's debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and legacies capable of taking effect, remains unconverted, and as unconverted belongs to the plaintiff; (6) in either case, but only so far as may be necessary and proper for the purposes aforesaid, administration of the real and personal estate of the said testator."

The Court granted an interim injunction against sale, and thereupon the pursuers in the Scots Court moved to have the sist recalled, and the case proceeded with.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) On the question of administration.—They were entitled to a declarator, which would result in this, that the charitable institutions might be paid entirely out of the personalty. The effect of any such declarator would be, that the questions pending in England would become theoretical, and of no practical value. There was in the deed a direction to sell, for there was to be a "division and apportionment" among a number of beneficiaries, and the reasonable way of carrying out that direction was by selling the heritage to begin with. But if there was not a direction, at least there was a power of sale, and there was no bequest of specific heritage to the charities. Therefore, the trustees might sell the English heritage, bring the money to Scotland, and then divide it as their author had directed. This in fact they would have done by this time, had they not been stopped by the heir's application for an injunction, an act on his part plainly hostile to the will. On principle and on authority it was clear that the trustees could and should "marshall" the legacies, i.e., apportion them pro rata both upon heritage and moveables. The English law of mortmain was a purely local law, with a local operation. To ensure that operation it had been found in England to be necessary to exclude the doctrine of "marshalling," for, if it were applied, its effect would be to throw a proportion of the whole liabilities of the trust-estate on the heritage, and so, pro tanto, set free the moveables to satisfy the charities. But that would cheat the Mortmain Act, and therefore in England this rule of "marshalling" would not, in such circumstances, be applied. But what application had that law to a succession, which was a foreign succession and not English? The Scots law saw nothing wrong in the bequests to charities; why should an administration conducted by it take any pains to exclude these bequests? There was no specific bequest of English heritage to charities, but only general bequests in their favour, and the law of Scotland, so far from interposing to prevent the payment of these bequests, should see to it ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Besides, even in England, "marshalling" might take place so as to favour charities if the testator so directed. The declaration here that the administration should be according to Scots law was tantamount to such a direction. On authority, again, it had been decided in England[1] that the English rule of "non-marshalling" would not apply in the case of the succession of a domiciled Scotsman, but that his estate would be so administered as to give effect to his charitable intentions, although the lex rei sitæ (India forbade bequests to charities in the circumstances which there existed.

[1] Macdonald v. Macdonald, 1872, L. R., 14 Eq. 60.

No. 150.
Mar. 20, 1891.
Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

Nor was the case of Harrison[1] of any avail to the defenders, for the doctrine of Lord Selborne was carefully hedged by the qualification that it was true only "in the absence of any trust."

(2) On the question of election.—Was there an obligation put upon the defender to elect, so that, if he succeeded in his claims in England, he must give up what he had taken or could take in Scotland? Now, there was no impossibility of the heir making good the wishes of the testator by allowing the charities to get their full share in the shape of money. The testator had no desire to give them English heritage. Again, it was quite lawful to look at the disposition in favour of the charities to ascertain what the testator's intention truly was. It might well be that what a testator could not do directly he could do indirectly, by forcing a beneficiary to make choice between implementing the whole deed, or renouncing the whole deed.[2] The Lord Ordinary had misread the cases of Ker[3] and Dundas.[4] The distinction described as "thin and unsubstantial" was a distinction of English law, which was by these decisions held not to be applicable to a Scots instrument. This was the interpretation put on those decisions by Mr Jarman.[5] The result was that although the will as a devise of foreign heritage was bad, it would yet be looked at to ascertain the testator's intention, and effect would be given to it so far as might be, through the application of the doctrine of election. The bequest to charities was not therefore an absolute nullity, but was so only in England. In Douglas's case,[6] certain general requisites for raising the application of an election were defined, and these were present here. But as regarded the decision in that case, which held that an obligation to elect did not arise, that proceeded upon the consideration that the testator, who was said to have imposed the condition, which involved an election, did not impose that condition in the full knowledge of the true state of the ownership of the estates the succession to which was said to be affected by the doctrine of election. Such an erroneous belief excluded the application of that doctrine,[7] but here of course there was no such ignorance, for the whole bequest was in one settlement. As regarded the citation from Bell's Commentaries[8] by the defender, Mr Bell wrote in ignorance of the decision in Dundas's case.

Argued for the defender;—(1) On the question of administration.—The question now came to be, admitting that the bequest of English heritage was illegal, could that be evaded by realisation in England and subsequent division, not in England, but in Scotland? But Mr Justice Kay's opinion settled that the law of England applied to charities whether English or foreign, and to the proceeds of heritage as well as to heritage, and would prevent any such evasion of the prohibitions of the Mortmain Act. But the law of the situs must settle all questions regarding the burdens to be imposed on heritage, and the capacity of the testator to dispose of it.[9] So long as the estate remained real estate the law of England must

---

[1] Harrison v. Harrison, 1873, L. R., 8 Ch. App. 342.
[2] Bonhotes v. Mitchell's Trustees, May 27, 1885, 12 R. 984; Dundas v. Dundas, Dec. 22, 1830, 4 W. and S. 460; see also Bennet v. Bennet's Trustees, July 1, 1829, 7 S. 817, 1 Scot. Jur. 342.
[3] Ker v. Wauchope, 1819, 1 Bligh, 1.
[4] See note 2.
[5] Jarman on Wills, p. 448, note k, and case of Dewar v. Maitland, ibid. cit.
[6] Douglas's Trustees v. Douglas, June 27, 1862, 24 D. 1191, 34 Scot. Jur. 642.
[7] Bell's Pr., sec. 1884.
[8] I. p. 148 (5th edn.), and p. 143 (Lord M'Laren's edn.)
[9] M'Laren i. pp. 26, 32-3; Storey, Conflict of Laws, secs. 474, 478-9.

No. 150. Mar. 20, 1891. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

continue to govern it,[1] and could forbid its realisation, if an illegal application was to be made of the proceeds of that realisation. It was vain to argue from the testator's intention as against the Mortmain Act, which set the testator's intention at naught. The question was, what had the testator done with his English heritage? Now he had undoubtedly given it to charities. [LORD PRESIDENT.—But the doubt is whether your argument applies to residue. Must not residue, the product of a mixed estate, be distributed by the law of the domicile?] The law of England would look at the nature of the instrument and at the purpose of the trust before it would allow the trustees adire hereditatem. It would not stop short at the clause of conveyance to the trustees, but would inquire what would become of the heritage or its proceeds if they were allowed to go into the trust. Otherwise the sphere of operation of the Mortmain Act would be much restricted. Harrison's case[2] supplied the rule as to the incidence of debts, and therefore of legacies, and the rule was that of the lex situs. Lord Selborne's limitation, "in the absence of any trust," meant "in the absence of any express direction," and there was none such here. Macdonald's case[3] was to be met in this way. It was not doubtful that the law of the situs, i.e., India, was to be applied to Indian heritage. But, then, on further examination, it was seen that there was no rule of "marshalling" in India. Had there been, the result would have been different, and here therefore, as the situs had a law of "marshalling," Macdonald's case had no application.

(2) On the question of election.—It was necessary to see under what conditions that plea arose. The heir here could not surrender the heritage to the uses of the will. If he left the heritage alone the Crown would take it, the trustees could not. He could not convey it directly to the trustees, for Mr Justice Kay's opinion implied that in that event the English Courts would track it, and stop any such proceedings by injunction. He might perhaps sell it and give the trustees the money, but that was a very complicated transaction to be implied. Dundas's case[4] was distinguishable on that point, for there the heir could make up a title and convey to the trustees. Here he could not do so cum effectu, for the vice of the original bequest would still adhere to any such conveyance. The foundation of the doctrine of election was the equitable plea that an heir should not oppose trustees in doing what, but for him, they would be able to do. But the difficulty here was not the interference of the heir. The thing the trustees wished to do could not legally be done. Why should a Court of equity interfere to enable a testator to do what the law forbade him to do? The distinction in the matter of election between English estate on the one hand; and Scots or foreign estate on the other, had been recognised in Dewar v. Maitland.[5]

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The questions which we have to determine in this case arise under an action of declarator instituted by the testamentary trustees of Mr David Hewit against his heir for the purpose of determining the relative rights of the heir and the testamentary disponees to the testator's real estate in England, which is admittedly affected by the English law of mortmain. The

[1] Thomas v. Tennent's Trustees, Nov. 17, 1868, 7 Macph. 114, 41 Scot. Jur. 59; Tennent v. Tennent's Executor, June 28, 1889, 16 R. 876.

[2] See note 1, supra, p. 801.

[3] See note, supra, p. 800.

[4] See note 2, supra, p. 801.

[5] 1866, L. R., 2 Eq. 834.

No. 150.

Mar. 20, 1891. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

testator was survived by a widow and one child. By his will Mr Hewit directed his trustees to pay certain legacies, including a legacy of £3000 to the defender personally, and a legacy of 100 guineas given to him as a trustee, and in the event, which has happened, of his child dying without issue, the trustees were directed to pay certain other legacies, including an additional legacy to the defender of £3000, and to divide the balance of the residue amongst charitable institutions named by him in proportions to be determined by the trustees.

It is objected by the heir that according to the provisions of the statutory law of mortmain real estate cannot be bequeathed by will to charitable uses, and it is now admitted that the testator's intentions in favour of the charities cannot be carried into effect in the manner directed by him. But this action contains alternative conclusions to the effect that the heir by acceptance of the legacies bequeathed to him has come under an obligation "to renounce and discharge all claims competent to him against the estate and effects of David Hewit or against his trustees," or otherwise "to bear a rateable proportion of the whole debts, legacies, and bequests payable from the trust-estate corresponding to the value of the real estate." These are the material conclusions. Lord Kinnear, sitting as Lord Ordinary, has decided the case adversely to the trustees on the first of the two conclusions which I have quoted, and has reserved the question argued under the second conclusion, and his Lordship's judgment has been brought under review by the reclaiming note which we are now to dispose of.

The hypothesis of the first of these conclusions (the second conclusion of the summons) is that the heir is put to his election between the benefits which he may claim in the character of heir and legatee, and the question whether the heir is put to his election is a question to be determined by the law of the testator's domicile, in this case the law of Scotland. It is true that under a testamentary disposition of mixed estate the validity of a disposition or bequest of immovable property must be determined by the law of the situs, and accordingly in the present case a judicial opinion was obtained from the High Court of Justice in England, which, as we know, was adverse to the validity of the charitable bequests so far as consisting of or payable from the real estate in England. But the question whether the heir is put to his election is a question involving the construction and effect of the will as an expression of the mind of the testator, and is therefore a question for the Court of construction, the Court which has jurisdiction over the will in its entirety. This is a point which has perhaps only a theoretical interest, because, undoubtedly, the Courts of England and Scotland have professed to treat such questions on common principles, and in the Court of last resort the decisions of the English and Scottish Courts on questions of election have been cited indifferently in illustration of the principles which regulate this chapter of the law.

It is not necessary for the purposes of the case to define strictly the conditions of a case of election under a will, but I may say that a case of election will generally arise where a testator is professing to dispose of property over which he has only an imperfect power of disposition which can be made perfect by the assent of the legatee to the testamentary instrument. The case of a father disposing of the legitim fund, and the case of a proprietor disposing of his heritable estate on deathbed are illustrations. The assent of the child having a right to legitim in the first case, and of the heir in the second case, suffices to perfect the title of the disponee. In such cases the child or the heir if he claims a legacy, must in the language of our old decisions surrender his legal claims to the uses of the will. In the cases raising an election it is in general not necessary that the heir, or person having the adverse interest, should take any active step to set up the will; it is enough that he makes no adverse claim, in which case the trustees or executors may proceed to administer the estate, on the assumption that the testator's power of disposal is unchallenged. This much, at least, seems to be reasonably clear. In order to put a legatee to his election it must be in his power by waiving his objection to the will, or adverse claim, to perfect the right of the testamentary disponees. There is certainly no case in which a legatee who had not the power of perfecting the right of the disponees has been called on to give an equivalent benefit. Nor has any opinion to this effect been cited. Such an obligation could only arise under a provision of the will itself, as in the case of res aliena scienter legata, where the testator is held to have impliedly directed the purchase of the thing by his heir for the benefit of the special legatee.

No. 150. Mar. 20, 1891. Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

Applying the principles to the present case we find in the opinion of the High Court of Justice, returned by Mr Justice Kay, that not only are the bequests to charities null and void so far as these are payable out of English freehold and leasehold estates, but in the words of the opinion of the learned Judge, even in the event of the heir-at-law, or the persons entitled to the testator's personal estate, consenting to waive his or their right thereto, the said freehold and leasehold estates would not, according to the law of England, fall to be distributed in the terms of the settlement, but would be treated as undisposed of.

It is pointed out in his Lordship's opinion that the heir may dispose of the estate in question by a proper deed, but that, if in favour of a charity, such deed or deeds should be enrolled in accordance with the provisions of the Statute 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 42. It therefore appears that the defender cannot, by any waiver of his claim or assent to the will, bring the will into operation as an appropriation of the English estates to charitable uses. He may give an equivalent sum out of his own means, or he may in his own right dispose of the estates to charitable uses; but in the latter case the validity of the new conveyance would depend on the conditions of the statute, and would be contingent on the heir's survivance for the period prescribed by the statute.

It is not within the defender's power to surrender the real estate in England to the uses of the will, and it follows, in my opinion, that the defender's rights to the legacies bequeathed to him is not conditional on his making such surrender. In other words, he is not bound to elect between his rights as heir and his rights under the will. I do not add more on this point, because I agree with all that is said by the Lord Ordinary regarding it, and adopt entirely his Lordship's interpretation of the decisions in which this subject is discussed.

The Lord Ordinary has left open the question of the liability of the real estate to contribute to the payment of debts and legacies. If the claim of the trustees under this head were confined to the subject of the right to charge a proportion of the debts and personal legacies on the real estate, we should be in a position to dispose of the question at present. But the trustees claim the right to charge a proportional part of the charitable bequests on the English estate, and it is evidently impossible to separate the two questions so as to give an effective decision applicable to the one class of testamentary charges while the other point is left open. Since this case came into the Inner-House a sum

No. 150.

Mar. 20, 1891.

Hewit's Trustees v. Lawson.

has been instituted in the Chancery Division of the Supreme Court in England for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of the heir-at-law and the trustees in relation to the English estate. If the administrative title of the trustees is sustained in relation to the real estate, it will then be for this Court to determine to what extent the English estate can be affected with payment of debts and legacies consistently with our recognition of the invalidity of the disposition of that estate in part to charitable uses. If the trustees do not succeed in establishing their administrative title a different question will arise, viz., the question whether the claim of the trustees to burden the English estate with debts and personal legacies can be made good by withholding payment of the pecuniary legacy payable to the defender. Nothing that we decide this day is intended to prejudice these claims. In the meantime I agree with Lord Kinnear that the case is not in shape for the decision of any question except the question of election which we are now considering, and I suggest that your Lordships should affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and sist procedure in the meantime, leaving it to the parties to move, when by the decision of the English suit, or from other causes, the difficulty I have referred to may be removed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and I only wish to add one observation in reference to a point which was made in the argument for the reclaimers. Mr Murray made a criticism on what was said by me in my note to my judgment in the Outer-House as to Lord Brougham's opinion in the case of Dundas. I desire to say that that criticism was just, and that what I said in the note as to Lord Brougham's opinion was inaccurate. But I am still of opinion that the distinction between this case and the case of Dundas remains, and that the heir here is not put to his election.

LORD ADAM concurred, and intimated that the LORD PRESIDENT also concurred.

THE COURT adhered, and quoad ultra sisted proceedings.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—MORTON, SMART, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 151.

Mar. 20, 1891.

Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll.

NIDDRIE AND BENHAR COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER, First Parties.—Dickson—Salvesen.
JOHN HURLL, Second Party.—Clyde.

Company—Division of profits—Rights of preference and ordinary shareholders.—The shares of a limited company were divided into A or preference, and B or ordinary shares, the former to rank prior to the latter on the profits of each year for a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent on the amount paid up, and the latter to rank on the balance of the profits of each year remaining after payment of the preferential dividend, also for a 10 per cent dividend. Any surplus was to belong to both classes of shares without any priority between them. It was also provided that "no deficiency in dividend in any year shall be made good out of the profits of future years."

For several years there was a loss on the revenue account resulting in a debit balance at 30th April 1889 of £7867. During the year ending 30th April 1890 net profits were earned to the amount of £6909, which sum was applied in reducing the debt previously incurred, and no dividends were declared. During next year, ending 30th April 1891, net profits were earned sufficient to wipe out the remainder of the debt, and leave a surplus for division, after paying a 10 per cent dividend to the A shareholders as for that year.

No. 151.

Mar. 20, 1891. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll.

In a special case between the A and B shareholders the former contended that they were entitled to have this surplus applied in payment to them of a 10 per cent dividend, as for the year ending 30th April 1890, in respect of the net profits of £6909 earned during that year.

Held that the A shareholders were not entitled to a dividend for the year ending 30th April 1890, Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren holding that the profits of that year had been properly applied in reducing the debt, Lord Kinnear holding that the A shareholders were barred from raising the question by the statement in the case that the sum of £6909 was not available for dividend in that year.

1st Division. M.

THE NIDDRIE AND BENHAR COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, with a memorandum and articles of association. By the memorandum the capital of the company was declared to be £152,500, divided into 15,000 shares therein termed A or preference shares of £5 each, and 62,000 shares, therein termed B or ordinary shares, of £1, 5s. each, having the following rights and privileges, as set out in the memorandum of association, namely,—"The A shares shall rank prior to the B shares on the profits of each year for a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent per annum on the amount paid up thereon. The A shares shall also rank prior to the B shares on the capital of the company and its undertaking for the sums paid up on the said A shares. The B shares shall, for the purpose of calculating dividends from profits be credited with £3, 15s. per share as paid thereon, in addition to such part of the said £1, 5s. as may be paid up thereon at the time. The B shares shall rank on the balance of the profits of each year remaining after payment of the said preferential dividend on the A shares for a dividend of 10 per cent per annum, calculated after crediting each B share with £3, 15s. as aforesaid. Any surplus divisible profits which may remain after payment of the said dividends shall belong to both classes of shares without any priority between them—the B shares always receiving credit as above mentioned. No deficiency in dividend in any year shall be made good out of the profits of future years. . . ."

This special case was brought by the company and a B shareholder as the first party, and by an A shareholder as the second party, under the following circumstances:—"For some years prior to 30th April 1886, there was a loss on the ordinary revenue account of the company, resulting in a debit balance on that account as at that date of £12,065, 13s. 8d. This debit balance was, by the transactions of the subsequent year, reduced to £7867, 0s. 2d., at which figure it stood as at 30th April 1889, the 30th April being the date on which the annual accounts of the company are made up. During the year from 30th April 1889 to 30th April 1890 net profits were earned to the amount of £6909, 8s. 7d. This sum was not available for division and was not divided among the shareholders by way of dividend owing to the debit balance on the profit and loss account from previous years. Deducting this sum of £6909, 8s. 7d. from the debit balance with which the year ending 30th April 1890 commenced there was left a debit balance of £957, 11s. 7d. as at the close of the year on 30th April 1890.

"During the current year, commencing 1st May 1890, profits have been earned sufficient both to wipe out the said debit balance of £957, 11s. 7d. and leave a surplus available for division."

The question put was,—"Is the second party, as the holder of A shares, entitled to have the balance of the profits of the current year (after satisfying the 10 per cent dividend for the current year) applied, to the extent necessary for that purpose, in payment of a preference dividend on the A shares as for the year ending 30th April 1890? or Are the B share-

No. 151.

Mar. 20, 1891.

Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll.

holders entitled to have the said balance applied in payment of a dividend to them for the current year without deduction of such dividend to the A shareholders for the year ending 30th April 1890?"

The claims of parties were thus stated,—"Both parties admit that out of said surplus the A shareholders are entitled to a preferential dividend of 10 per cent as for the current year. They are, however, not agreed as to the disposal of the balance of the said surplus, after paying the said preference dividend. The second party, as a holder of A or preference shares, claims that he is entitled to have the said balance, to the extent necessary for that purpose, applied in payment of a 10 per cent dividend to said A shareholders as dividend for the year ending 30th April 1890, in respect that the profits for that year were not available for division, or were not actually divided and paid as dividend, owing to a debit balance on revenue account from previous years. He claims that, under the provisions of the memorandum of association, as between the two classes of shareholders, there is to be an annual accounting, and that the loss in a previous year is not to be wiped out by the profits of a succeeding year in such a way as ultimately to deprive the A shareholders of dividend for the year in which such profit was earned. The first parties, as for the B shareholders, claim on the other hand that they are entitled to have the said balance applied in paying dividend to them as for the current year. They contend that under the memorandum of association no deficiency in dividend in any year is to be made good out of the profits of future years; and that, as the profits earned during the year ending 30th April 1890 were de facto not available for division, there was a deficiency in the sense of the clause in the memorandum of association, and that such deficiency cannot be made good out of the profits of a future year."*

Argued for the first parties;—The provision in the memorandum that "no deficiency in dividend in any year shall be made good out of the profits of future years" was conclusive against the second party's claim. This was an attempt to go in the teeth of that clause. The fallacy lay in this, that according to the view of the second party there was no period at which profits would be available for the debts of the company. The case of Dent,[1] which was cited upon the other side, was unfavourably commented upon by Mr Buckley,[2] and could not be taken as an authority.

Argued for the second party;—The general rule was that preference shares carried cumulative dividends, and any restriction upon that rule fell to be strictly construed.[3] The "profits of each year" meant the gross earnings of the year, subject only to deduction for working expenses and depreciation for the same period.[1] Any expenditure relating to former years, or necessary to make good losses previously incurred, was not a

* The articles of association of the company provided, inter alia,—"121. No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits arising from the business of the company. 122. The board may, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they think proper, as a reserve fund to meet contingencies, or for equalising dividends, or for extraordinary repairs or objects; and also a sum to provide for the redemption of the capital of the company. . . . . 128. A balance-sheet shall be made out in every year and laid before the company in general meeting, and such balance-sheet shall contain a summary of the assets and liabilities of the company arranged under convenient heads."

[1] Dent v. London Tramways Company, 1880, 16 Chanc. Div. 344.

[2] Buckley on the Companies Acts (6th ed.) 516.

[3] Henry v. Great Northern Railway Company, Nov. 1857, 1 De Gex and Jones, 606, præsertim pp. 637-9; Webb v. Earle, 1875, L. R., 20 Eq. 556.

No. 151.

Mar. 20, 1891. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll.

proper deduction in estimating the "profits of each year." The A shareholders being entitled to "rank" on the "profits of each year," it followed that a "deficiency in dividend" occurred only when the net profits of the year were insufficient to pay the 10 per cent preferential dividend. It was not inconsistent with this view that the profits of any particular year might be devoted to provide against depreciation, or to extinguish an old debit balance, the right of the preference shareholder having attached simultaneously with the appearance of a net profit balance in the accounts of the year, and entitling him to recover his dividend out of the profits of subsequent years. To hold otherwise would be to enable a majority of ordinary shareholders to defeat the A shareholders' preference.[1] It was said that Mr Buckley had commented unfavourably upon the case of Dent,[2] but his comments were confined to a criticism on the question of the payment of dividend out of capital, which did not arise here.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The question raised in this special case is one between A and B shareholders of the Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, as to the disposal of the profits earned, or which will be earned, during the year now current ending on 30th April 1891.

The facts which raise the question are set forth in the special case, and the question put just comes to this—Whether the A shareholders are entitled to have the profits of this year applied in payment of a dividend for the previous year. That is the contention shortly stated on the part of the A shareholders.

The first article of the memorandum of association which bears upon the matter is the one first in order—The A shares shall rank prior to the B shares on the profits of each year (ending on 30th April) for a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent per annum on the amount of the paid-up capital. That is the right of the A shares. The answer to the first part of the question depends upon this, whether there were any profits available for dividend for the year ending 30th April 189. That leads one to consider, What are profits properly so called? and on that matter I quite agree with Mr Buckley's definition, which is, that profits are the excess of the ordinary receipts over the expenses properly chargeable to revenue account. I also agree with him when he says that when a loss on the revenue account has been sustained, there is, of course, no profit until that loss has been made good either by set-off of previous undivided profits still in hand, or by profits subsequently earned. Now, that is the case we are dealing with here. We are dealing with a case of proper revenue account—with a proper revenue account shewing a debit balance of £957, 11s. 7d. at the end of last year—and accordingly on a proper statement of accounts it is clear that there was no profit earned by the company last year at all—I mean profit available for dividend; and if that was so, then it is clear that the A shareholders were not entitled to dividend last year at all. Now, if that be so, they cannot be entitled to have a share of the current year's earnings applied to a dividend which never was earned. The statement in the case makes that very clear, because during the year from 30th April 1889 to 30th April 1890 net profits were earned amounting to £6909, 8s

[1] Henry v. The Great Northern Railway Co., Nov. 1857, 1 De Gex and Jones, 606, Lord Chancellor Cranworth, pp. 637, 639; Crawford v. The North-Eastern Railway, 1856, 3 Kay and Johnston, 723.

[2] Dent v. London Tramways Co., 1880, L. R., 16 Chanc. Div. 344.

7d.; but although that is called net profit, according to the definition which I have read net profit only arises on the debit balance on the revenue account being made good, so that the sum in question cannot properly be called profit, for the whole of these so called profits were applied towards the extinction of a debit balance amounting to £7867, 0s. 2d. Therefore upon that ground I think that the only answer that can be given to the question is that the A shareholders are not entitled to have any part of the profits of the current year applied to payment of a dividend which was not earned last year. The clause in the memorandum says that the A shares shall rank prior to the B shares on the profits of each year. That is their whole right. And the fourth article distinctly says that no deficiency of dividend in any year shall be made good out of the profits of future years. I cannot see how, in the face of articles in these terms, it can be said that the dividend which amounted to nil in 1890 is to be made good out of the profits of the current year.

We were referred, as dealing with this question, to the case of Henry v. The Great Northern Railway Company. What was decided in that case was this—where a company having power so to do, issued preference capital carrying a dividend of 10 per cent per annum payable half-yearly, and with no words to restrict the preference shareholders to the profits of the current year, it was held that if the profits in any one year were insufficient to pay 10 per cent in full, the deficiency was, as between the preference and ordinary shareholders, to be made good out of the subsequent profits. Now, that shews that we have in the present case exactly what was desiderated in the case of Henry, because we have in the memorandum and articles of association words restricting the preference shareholders to the profits of the current year. Therefore I think the case of Henry has really no bearing upon this question.

I am quite aware that the conduct of the affairs of a company having articles such as are contained in this memorandum of association may be liable to abuse, because it is obvious enough—as was pressed upon us—that the directors by manipulating the accounts might by carrying large sums from profits to a reserve fund, or in other ways, at the expense of the A shareholders benefit the B shareholders. That is quite true, but if any attempt of that sort was made I have no doubt the Court would find a remedy.

I am therefore of opinion that the proper disposal of the surplus which the company has earned is, first, to extinguish the debt of £957, 11s. 7d.—although that question is not before us—and in the next place, that the A shareholders are entitled to 10 per cent, and after that that the B shareholders are entitled to have the balance applied in payment of dividend to them, the remainder, if there is any, to belong to both. I therefore think that we ought to answer the first part of the question in the negative, or, in other words, the second part in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. It was contended by one of the parties that profit means merely the result of the operations of the financial year,—the difference between the income and the expenditure of that year. I think that that is an incomplete definition, and is neither consistent with the law nor with sound commercial accounting. Profit and loss in my view represent the aggregate of all the commercial transactions of the company from the time when it commenced business, and the way in which it is reached is by bringing into the account of any year the balance of profit or loss resulting from the close of the previous year's transactions; and when that principle is applied it is plain enough in this case that the supposed profit has no real existence, because it is only obtained by leaving out of account the loss which falls to be extinguished, and which was at the debit at the commencement of the year's account.

No. 151.

Mar. 20, 1891.

Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion. The A shareholders are to have a preference over the profits of each year. Now, the word "profits" no doubt may have various meanings, but I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the word must be taken to mean here the excess of the receipts in any year over the expenditure which has been incurred in order to earn those receipts. Now, the preference shareholders having that right over the profits, there is a further stipulation in the contract that no deficiency in dividend in any year shall be made good out of the profits of future years; and that of course must mean that if the profit in the sense in which your Lordship has defined it in any one year is insufficient to pay any dividend, or to pay the full dividend to which the preference shareholders are entitled, they must submit to the failure, and cannot make good the deficiency of that year out of the larger profit of any subsequent year. So far there does not seem to be very much difficulty in considering the matter.

But then these definitions do not solve the practical question which is raised in this case, and which may be one of difficulty, because it must always be a question in the conduct of the business of the company what is the expenditure which is to be deducted in order to ascertain the excess of earnings over the expense of realising them. If the company has sustained losses, there may be a question for the members or administrators of the company to consider whether such losses are payable out of current receipts, or whether they are not so payable; and I presume that in the ordinary case that is a question which would be determined by a majority of the members of the company—by a majority of the partners if it was an ordinary firm, and by a majority of members if it was a company of this kind, unless there was any provision in the contract which would over-ride the judgment of the majority. It appears to me that it might be a question in the absence of such provision in the contract whether the excess of earnings in any year might not be divided as profits although some portion of the capital might have been lost. That might possibly be; there is no rule of law, so far as I know, which would prevent a copartnery so treating their account. But then the difficulty arises where according to the constitution of the company the shareholders are divided into two classes having adverse interests; and in such a case it would be impossible to hold that the shareholders having a preference, or being subject to postponement as the case might be, were necessarily to be bound by the judgment of the whole shareholders having a different interest from theirs merely because the one body was larger than the other. It therefore appears to me that the question which is raised in the statement of fact which is put before us might be one of some delicacy.

It is said that there had been a loss upon the ordinary revenue account of the company, resulting in a debit balance at 30th April 1886 and that it so remained until 30th April 1889, and that during that year profits had been made to the amount of £6909, 8s. 7d., and that these net profits were applied by the company in wiping out the debit balance on the profit and loss account of previous years. Now, I must say that if I were required to determine whether

No. 151.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, v. Hurll.

that was a proper mode of treating the account or not, I would require some further information. But then I do not think that is a question which is raised for our determination at all, not only because there is nothing set forth in the special case to challenge the method in which the accounts were stated, but because upon the face of the special case the parties are agreed that that was a proper mode of treating the account. When parties are agreed to present a special case to the Court, and ask for their opinion and judgment upon any questions arising out of it, then they are bound by the judicial contract between them; all the statements of facts, or statements of mixed law and fact, which the special case contains are conclusive and binding, and not only so, but are exhaustive of all the facts which are necessary to enable the Court to give judgment upon the questions arising. Now, that being so, I take it that the parties are agreed that in consequence of the existence of this debit balance there was no sum available for division among the shareholders by way of dividend. If that mode of dealing with the account were right, then of course there was no profit which could be allocated to the preference shareholders; if it were wrong, then it follows equally of course that the dividend which ought to have been paid to the preference shareholders was wrongly applied in wiping out the debit upon the account. Therefore it appears to me that when the second party in this case claims to have a dividend which might have been payable to him in that year made good out of the larger profits of the subsequent year, he is merely in a position to maintain that he is entitled to recover from the company —that is, from the other shareholders—moneys which have been improperly applied. That is the meaning—and the only meaning—which can be put upon the argument which was addressed to us in support of the special case. If the thing was rightly done, there was no dividend; if it was wrongly done, then money was improperly applied which ought to have gone to preference shareholders; and when the question is put in that way, it becomes quite obvious that the second party cannot maintain that position, because it is a statement of fact upon which he has agreed, and which is binding upon him and upon the other party, that there was no money available for division in the year in which this sum of £6909, 8s. 7d. was applied to wipe out the debit balance. Therefore it appears to me to be quite clear upon the statements in the case that there was a deficiency of dividend in the sense of the memorandum of association in that year which he is not entitled to have made good out of the profits of the present year.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT answered the first branch of the question in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—STUART & STUART, W.S—Agents.

No. 152.

Mar. 20, 1891.*
Macleod v. Marshall.

ANGUS MACLEOD, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Asher—Johnston.
THOMAS A. MARSHALL, Defender (Respondent).—Murray—M'Clure.
JOHN S. WYLIE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—Dickson.

Reparation—Slander—Issue—Justification.—In an action of damages for slander in respect that the defender had, as was alleged, called the pursuer "a

* Decided Feb. 27, 1891.

No. 152.

Mar. 20, 1891. Macleod v. Marshall.

swindler and a thief," "a questionable character," and a person whose "presence was an offence to all honourable men," the defender admitted having said that the pursuer's conduct "was little removed from thieving," but stated in justification that the pursuer and other persons had purchased certain concessions entitling them to work copper mines at Val d'Elsa, Italy, and that the pursuer though knowing that the prospects of return therefrom were extremely discouraging, had "made false and fraudulent representations to the defender regarding a proposed joint stock company to be formed to take over certain mineral concessions in the Val d'Elsa, Italy, by representing the mines to be of great value, which, in point of fact, he knew they were not, and thus induced the defender to contribute to the capital of the Val d'Elsa Copper Company, in the promotion of which the pursuer was pecuniarily interested as vendor"; that the pursuer further stated that the run by the public upon the shares had been so great that it would be necessary for the defender to take more shares in order to make sure of an allotment, and in reliance upon the truthfulness and accuracy of this, along with the other representations of the pursuer, the defender was induced to take additional shares, while the fact was that only about 25,000 of the 60,000 shares offered to the public were applied for; that the pursuer as vendor was dependent for the carrying out of the sale on a sufficient number of shares being applied for.

The Court (diss. Lord Young) allowed the defender issues in justification.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. M.

ANGUS MACLEOD, merchant, Glasgow, and residing at Dullatur, near Glasgow, raised an action of damages for alleged slander against Thomas A. Marshall, John S. Wylie, John Wylie, and James A. Wylie, all residing at Dullatur.

The pursuer averred that when he was in the grounds of the Dullatur Tennis Club on 17th May 1890 the defender Marshall who, as well as the other defenders, had for many months cherished feelings of the deepest enmity towards him, and had conspired with them to blacken his character, asked him if he was a member of the club, adding "This is no place for questionable characters as you"; further, that on the same day and at the same place the defender Marshall called him a "swindler," "liar," a "thief," and other calumnious names; further, that the whole of the defenders, as part of a concerted effort to hold the pursuer up to obloquy and to ruin his character, had concocted a joint letter, dated 20th May 1890, to the secretary of the Dullatur Tennis Club, to this effect,—"Dear Sir,—You are aware that for good reasons Mr Angus Macleod's presence at any general gathering of the inhabitants of Dullatur must be irksome to many of those present. We would therefore request that you, as secretary of the Dullatur Tennis Club, will take such measures as will prevent his being a second time introduced to the courts. . . . Your personal opinion, frequently strongly expressed, of Mr Macleod's doings and character, will, we feel sure, make you desirous to do what is necessary to secure all the members of the club in the enjoyment of their rights, without their being subjected to Mr Macleod's presence in the courts."

The defender Marshall admitted that he had endeavoured to induce the pursuer to leave the tennis ground on 17th May, "because the pursuer was, and knew himself to be, personally objectionable to the defender and other members of the club. The pursuer, however, did not withdraw, and defender then stated as the ground of his request that the pursuer had taken advantage of his former intimacy with the defender to feather his own nest at defender's expense; that he had made false statements to the defender with regard to the Val D'Elsa Copper Company (in which pursuer was interested as a promoter and vendor), to induce the defender to subscribe to the capital of said company; that his conduct was little removed from thieving; and that in the circumstances his intrusion into said tennis club grounds was cowardly. Explained and averred that the remarks of the defender were made to, and in the hearing of, the pursuer alone." No. 152.

Mar. 20, 1891. Macleod v. Marshall.

The defender Marshall further stated;—(Stat. 1) "About the beginning of the year 1886, the pursuer, along with" certain other persons, "purchased certain concessions entitling them to work some copper deposits in the Elsa Valley in Italy. The vendor was an Italian named Salvatori Tedeschi, who had worked the said deposits prior to the year 1884 without success, and the price he received for his rights was £500, paid immediately, with a further contingent payment of £1500. The contingency upon which the latter sum was payable was that the pursuer and the" said other persons "should be successful in promoting a company to take over the concessions from them." (Stat. 2) "After the date of said purchase, the pursuer and the" said other persons "took steps with the object of floating a company to take over said concessions, and as preliminary thereto, they initiated certain works of exploration upon a limited scale, at the mines, and sought the opinion of mining experts as to the value of the property. The returns of copper, however, obtained from the mines were extremely discouraging, and with the exception of the report of Mr Robert Strathern, there was none of the reports that suggested confidence in the concern as a possible commercial success. But, further, the said report of Strathern, which was subsequently quoted in the prospectus of the Val D'Elsa Copper Company, was an exaggerated, incorrect, and entirely misleading report, and was known to the pursuer at the time to be so; the report of Captain . . . also quoted in the prospectus, was exaggerated and untrue, and was concocted by the said Captain . . . with the active assistance of the pursuer; while prior to the visit of Messrs Taylor's representative to the mines, instructions were given, with the pursuer's authority, that copper should be left in the mine in places easily accessible, with the object that a fictitious appearance of value might be given to a worthless property, and a more favourable report obtained. Prior to the issue of the said prospectus, and to the pursuer's false statements to the defender after mentioned, the pursuer had no reason to believe, and did not in fact believe, that the subjects of the said concessions formed a valuable mineral property." (Stat. 3) "During the summer of 1887 the pursuer, who had been acquainted with the defender for about two years, and travelled almost daily with him from Dullatur to Glasgow, had frequent conversations with the defender as to the exceptionally favourable opportunities for investment afforded by copper mine securities, and he informed the defender that he possessed very special advantages in respect of information with reference to such securities, owing to his having friends in the London market. About the month of October following, the pursuer approached the defender with the information, which he professed to give to the defender confidentially, and from motives of friendship, that a company was going to be formed to work certain Italian copper lodes of a most valuable character in the Val d'Elsa, that only the earliest applicants would have a chance of allotment, and that the shares on allotment would be at 20s. premium. The pursuer did not then tell the defender, nor was the defender aware, that the pursuer was interested in the Val d'Elsa mines, and in reliance upon the business knowledge, friendly professions, and the truthfulness of the pursuer's statements of the value of said copper, the defender was induced to give him the sum of £50 to secure on his behalf an interest in the concern, although the prospectus was not yet issued." (Stat. 4) "After some delay, in the month of January 1888 the pursuer shewed the defender a prospectus of the Val d'Elsa Copper Company, which he said was the company he had referred to in the previous October. In said prospectus (which is referred to, and which is founded upon the reports of Strathern, Vivian, and Taylor & Sons foresaid), the Val d'Elsa mines were represented as a most valuable property, and the pursuer at that meeting assured the defender that not only had the promoters taken care not to exaggerate the value of the claim in said prospectus, but that he could vouch from personal inspection to its great value. These statements with reference to the value of said mines, as well as those to the same effect made in October preceding, were to the knowledge of the pursuer false. The pursuer and the" said other persons " were, as vendors of the concessions to the Val d'Elsa Company, to receive from the company the sum of £35,000, and the object of the pursuer, it is believed and averred, in making the false statements set forth, was that said company should be successfully floated, and he subsequently should become entitled to his share of said £35,000." (Stat. 5) "On 31st January 1888, the pursuer further stated that the run by the public upon the shares had been so great that it would be necessary for the defender to take more shares in order to make sure of an allotment, and in reliance upon the truthfulness and accuracy of this, along with the other representations of the pursuer, the defender was induced to give a further sum of £6, 5s. to the pursuer in consideration of the deposit upon 25 additional shares of said company. So far from the allegation of the pursuer as to the number of applications being true, it is the fact that only about 25,000 of the 60,000 shares offered to the public were applied for, and the pursuer and other promoters, that is to say, the vendors, consequently applied for 15,000 additional shares in order that the company might proceed to an allotment, when they would become entitled to said sum of £35,000." (Stat. 6) " In consideration of said £35,000 in money and shares, the shareholders obtained a right to the concessions mentioned in said prospectus. The said concessions were known to the pursuer to be at the time of no commercial value, and that there was nothing in the actual condition of the mine which could warrant the description given of it in said prospectus. The representations of the pursuer to the defender inducing his contribution to said company were false; and further, they were made with the fraudulent purpose of securing personal pecuniary gain to the pursuer at the expense of the defender, who, but for said false statements, would not have subscribed to said company. The pursuer made a large sum out of the promotion of said company, while the defender lost the amount of his subscription as above set forth; the mine having turned out to be of no value, and in the circumstances, the defender was justified in making to the pursuer the statements he made."

No. 152.

Mar. 20, 1891. Macleod v. Marshall.

The pursuer explained that the directors had proceeded on the reports of competent engineers employed by themselves, and quoad ultra denied the defenders' averments.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having engaged in a concerted assault upon the pursuer's character, and having falsely, calumniously, and maliciously slandered the pursuer, as libelled, are jointly and severally liable to the pursuer in damages as concluded for.

The defender Marshall pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender not having slandered the pursuer should be assoilzied. (2) The statements made by the defender to the pursuer as set forth in the defender's answers are in substance true, and in the circumstances were justified.

The defenders John S. Wylie and others pleaded;—(3) These defenders not having slandered the pursuer as alleged, they should be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 6th January 1891, approved of issues for the pursuer, and of a counter issue for the defender Marshall.

The pursuer reclaimed. After argument the defender Marshall proposed the following amended counter issues:—(1) Whether the pursuer, in or about October 1887 and January 1888, made false and fraudulent repre-

No. 152.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Macleod v. Marshall.

sentations to the defender regarding a proposed joint stock company to be formed to take over certain mineral concessions in the Val d'Elsa, Italy, by representing the mines to be of great value, which, in point of fact, he knew they were not, and thus induced the defender to contribute to the capital of the Val d'Elsa Copper Company, in the promotion of which the pursuer was pecuniarily interested as vendor? (2) Whether the pursuer, in or about January 1888, falsely and fraudulently represented to the defender that the applications for shares in the said proposed company were so numerous that, in order to be sure of an allotment, it would be necessary for the defender to apply for a greater number of shares, the fact being, as the pursuer well knew, that the shares had not been applied for to nearly the full extent; and whether the pursuer thereby induced the defender to make an additional application for shares in the said company, the pursuer, as vendor, being dependent for the carrying out of the sale on sufficient shares being applied for to allow the company to proceed to allotment?"

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question before us in this case is, whether two counter issues, which have been lodged by the defender Marshall, are to be allowed or not. The case relates to alleged slanders uttered by the defender against the pursuer, in which he was called a number of very strong names, and point was given to these epithets which were used against him by allegations in reference to his conduct regarding a company which he was promoting, and which, it is alleged, that he, knowing it to be not in a good condition, represented to the defender Marshall to be a company in which it was advisable he should take shares, and represented to him that unless he made application for a very large quantity of shares he would not get an allotment, because the run upon them was so great. Now, it is quite plain that such allegations as form the basis of these counter issues may, in certain circumstances, amount to nothing more than a statement, that the pursuer having something in which he was interested, and which it was his desire to puff and make the most of, spoke in very high terms of it, just as in trade a tea-merchant maintains that his is the best tea, or in amusements a theatre manager announces the enormous success of his pantomime, and so on. But, looking to the averments upon this record, I have come to the conclusion that we must allow the counter issues. However, I think in this case it is a question for the jury whether the representations made, upon which the defender Marshall founds as justifying the alleged slanders, were made, as he alleges, falsely and fraudulently for a personal purpose, to gain advantage to the pursuer, he well knowing the real facts to be to the contrary of what he was stating to this defender, and therefore falsely and fraudulently making a representation, and inducing this defender to act on that representation. I understand that those words, "as the pursuer well knew," have been put into the second issue. That was agreed to at the bar, and it must be done. I think it is a question for the jury in this case, whether that representation so made was a false and fraudulent representation made for the purpose alleged, viz., of benefiting the pursuer, his interest being to secure that a certain number of shares should be applied for, otherwise certain advantages which would accrue to him in the formation of this company would not accrue. Upon the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that the case must be sent to a jury.

No. 152.

Mar. 20, 1891.
Macleod v. Marshall.

LORD YOUNG.—I understand that all of your Lordships are of the opinion which has now been expressed. I am of a different opinion, but as the case must go to trial in consequence of the finding of the majority of the Court, I think, perhaps, the less I say the better. My own opinion is, that there are no averments upon this record to justify the slander which is the ground of the action, and that therefore they will not support an issue of veritas—I mean, support an issue of justification. I am very far from saying that the averments respecting the pursuer's conduct are irrelevant. I think they may go to mitigate any offence which he may have committed, and the facts established within these averments at the trial may be such as to induce and warrant the jury to return a verdict for a merely nominal sum of damages. We are certainly all familiar with the fact that where a slander is mitigated down to that point a jury not unfrequently find a verdict for the defender, and that there is no slander at all. Unfortunately, the matter of pleading—I mean of records in actions of damages for libel and slander—has always in my time been in a very unsatisfactory, because unsettled, condition; and the law at this moment is not very distinct as to what may or may not be averred in defence, with or without counter issues, in such a case. But I think the law is, and it has ever been my opinion, upon the best consideration of the matter in principle and upon the authorities, that to justify a libel or slander there must be a distinct substantive averment of a fact or facts which, if proved, will justify it, not in the opinion of the jury, but in the opinion of a Court of law. Now, I find no such distinct substantive averment of a matter of fact to be proved upon this record which will justify the slander which is alleged. Upon that ground, my opinion is against allowing a counter issue. I think the slander alleged is not upon the record justified by the averment of any fact which we can put in issue. I am therefore individually against the view in which your Lordship, and I understand the others of my brethren, are for allowing an issue in justification here.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the defender Marshall has made averments relevant, and if proved, sufficient, to justify the slander of which the pursuer complains. He has given the pursuer not only fair, but, as it seems to me, sufficiently specific notice of what he intends to prove. I therefore agree in the view that the counter issues proposed by the defender should be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I should like to add that I entirely concur in Lord Young's view, that it is for the Court to judge whether the words will justify the slander alleged. What I meant by referring to the jury was, that the words while justifying the slander, if said in a certain sense, may be held by the jury not to have been said in that sense at all. The Judge sitting at the trial would not allow the case to go to the jury unless the words would justify the slander, if the jury took the view that they were expressed in that certain sense. I quite agree in the view that it is for the Court to judge whether they will justify or not.

THE COURT approved of the pursuer's issues and of the amended counter issues.

SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

MARY ROONEY OR M'GENNIS, Pursuer.—A. S. D. Thomson.
JAMES ROONEY AND ANOTHER, Defenders.—Sym.

No. 153.
Mar. 20, 1891.
M'Gennis v. Rooney.

Jurisdiction—Trust—Forum non conveniens.—In an action by a legatee against two trustees who had taken out confirmation in Scotland under a Scotch trust-deed, the trustees pleaded no jurisdiction in respect that they were not resident in Scotland, and that the whole estate had been distributed twelve years before.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the plea, holding that the jurisdiction once constituted against them by their obtaining confirmation, and acting as trustees under a Scottish trust, remained unaffected.

OUTER-HOUSE Ld. Kyllachy.

MARY ROONEY OR M'GENNIS, residing in Ireland, raised an action against Patrick Rooney designed as "now believed to be resident in Nebraska, or elsewhere furth of Scotland," and James Rooney, farmer in County Down, as sole accepting trustees and executors of William Rooney, merchant, Stranraer, for count and reckoning of their intromissions with his estate, and for payment of £600, as the balance said to be due to her as one of the residuary legatees under his settlement.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction; (2) forum non conveniens.

It was admitted that William Rooney died on 21st August 1878, and that he left a settlement, dated 8th August 1878, by which he appointed the defenders and the Rev. John Canning, Stranraer, to be his trustees and executors.

The pursuer averred that the defenders alone accepted and acted. The defenders stated that Mr Canning, who left Stranraer and went to America in 1878, had also accepted office.

By his settlement the testator disposed specially of certain real property in Ireland, and conveyed his whole means and estate to his trustees for payment of certain legacies, and for division of the residue equally among his brothers and sisters, including the pursuer.

The pursuer averred that in addition to the moveable estate of which the trustees gave up an inventory, the deceased had deposit-receipts to a large amount, which immediately prior to his death he had endorsed and delivered to one of the defenders, James Rooney, explaining to him that this was done only for the purpose of evading Government duty, and that the money was to be divided among the testator's brothers and sisters as directed in the settlement; that the money had been uplifted and not accounted for; and that the share of residue still due to her amounted to £600. "The pursuer has been advised by Irish counsel, and she avers, that by the law of Ireland this action would not lie against the defender James Rooney, as trustee and executor foresaid, in the Irish Courts, it being a Scotch trust and executry. From the fact of the other trustee being domiciled in America, the pursuer has had no alternative but to sue the trustees in the Scotch Court."

The defenders stated that the purposes of the settlement with regard to the estate other than the real property in Ireland were "to pay certain legacies to the testator's brothers and nephews, all of whom resided in Ireland, or in America, and to divide the residue among his said brothers and his sister, Mrs M'Ranor, who resided in Massachussets, and the pursuer, who resides in County Down, Ireland. For these purposes the trustees and executors were to sell and realise his estates as soon as convenient, within twelve months after the testator's death, and to pay the legacies at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter. The trustees, in obedience to these directions, shortly after the testator's death in 1878, realised the estate and removed the funds out of this country and divided them among the beneficiaries. There are no funds of the estate in Scotland, and neither of the defenders called is subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. They had no connection with Scotland, except that twelve years ago they wound up and distributed the estate of their said brother, who died in Scotland."

No. 153.

Mar. 20, 1891. M'Gennis v. Rooney.

The argument appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The defenders cited the authorities noted below.[1]

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 20th March 1891, repelled the defenders' pleas against the jurisdiction of the Court, and allowed a proof.*

WM. OFFICER, S.S.C.—P. ADAIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] Ferguson v. Douglas, Heron, & Co., Nov. 11, 1796, 3 Pat. Ap. 503; Gillon & Co. v. Dunlop & Collett, Feb. 27, 1864, 2 Macph. 776, 36 Scot. Jur. 388. Kennedy v. Kennedy's Trustees, Dec. 9, 1884, 12 R. 275; Halliday's Executor v. Halliday's Executors, Dec. 17, 1886, 14 R. 251; Orr Ewing's Trustees v. Orr Ewing, July 24, 1885, 13 R. (H. L.) 1; Robertson's Trustees v. Nicholson, July 13, 1888, 15 R. 914; Neilson v. Wilson, March 12, 1890, 17 R. 608.

* "OPINION.—In this case the pursuer is a beneficiary under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late William Rooney, merchant in Stranraer, who died in the year 1878, possessed of considerable heritable property in Stranraer, and also of a considerable moveable estate. The defenders are the trustees of the deceased, one of them residing in Ireland and the other in Nebraska, in the United States of America; and the action is one of count and reckoning, brought on the allegation that the trustees failed to recover and distribute among the beneficiaries certain sums of money belonging to the deceased, and deposited in bank at Stranraer, but transferred to the name of one of the trustees a few days before the truster's death.

"The defenders in the first place plead no jurisdiction, and they point out that they are both resident furth of Scotland, that they have now no connection with Scotland, and that it is not alleged that the trust-estate or any part of it is now situated within Scotland.

"It may be explained that both the defenders are designed in the trust-deed as residing in places furth of Scotland. A third trustee, the Rev. John Canning, is designed as residing in Stranraer, but the pursuer alleges that he did not accept the trust, and at all events it appears that he went to America shortly after the trust was constituted. The trustees appear to have made up a title to the heritable property, and to have sold it and divided the proceeds. With regard to the moveable estate they gave up an inventory in 1882, and an additional inventory in 1885, containing the deposit-receipts now in question. The trust-settlement and the two inventories have been produced. The beneficiaries under the trust appear to be all resident either in Ireland or America.

"The question of jurisdiction thus arises in a form in which, so far I can discover, it has not hitherto arisen. In all the previous cases where the Court has sustained its jurisdiction in similar circumstances some one at least of the trustees has been resident in Scotland, and there has also, I think, always been trust-estate extant in Scotland. Here there was a trust-estate in Scotland, and according to the defenders (who are borne out by the terms of the first inventory) there was at one time a trustee resident in Scotland, but now, as I have already said, the pursuer does not allege that there is any trust-estate remaining in Scotland, nor that any of the trustees are domiciled or reside there.

"I have, in these circumstances, felt some difficulty, the more especially as it is somewhat difficult to discover from the authorities how far the rules on the subject depend on consideration of principle, and how far on considerations of convenience. On the whole, however, I have come to the conclusion that there is enough to support the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts.

"It is certain that the truster was domiciled in Scotland, that the trust was constituted in Scotland, and that the trustees obtained a title to Scotch moveables and Scotch heritage for the purpose of executing the trust. Moreover, the trust fell to be executed in Scotland, at least in this sense, that the duty of

SUMMER SESSION.

No. 154.

May 13, 1891.

Bracken v. Blasquez.

ELIZABETH BRACKEN, Pursuer (Respondent).—Gunn.
RAYMOND BLASQUEZ, Defender (Appellant).—John Wilson.

Process—Sisting of Mandatary—Foreign—Defender.—The defender in an action for payment of the aliment of an illegitimate child of which he was alleged to be the father went to Spain, and the Sheriff thereupon ordered him to sist a mandatary. The case having been appealed to the Court of Session, the defender returned to this country and undertook to remain in Scotland until the issue of the action. The Court thereupon recalled the order to sist a mandatary.

Prescription—Triennial Limitation—Claim for aliment of illegitimate child.—A person who was entrusted with the charge of an illegitimate child by the alleged father, sued him for payment of an account for aliment extending over six years—averring a verbal undertaking by him to repay whatever sums might be expended on the aliment and maintenance of the child. It was not alleged that the terms of payment or the amount of the aliment had been fixed, but the account produced charged £4 for each quarter's aliment. Held that as there was no averment of an agreement to make termly payments of aliment the account was to be regarded as a continuous account, and that as three years had not elapsed since the date of the last item, the triennial prescription did not apply.

1st Division. Sheriff of Midlothian. C.

MARGARET ANN BRACKEN gave birth to an illegitimate child in June 1883, of which Raymond Blasquez, designed as living at 3 Frederick Street, Edinburgh, was alleged to be the father.

Elizabeth Bracken, Margaret Ann Bracken's aunt, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Midlothian against Blasquez for payment of an account for the aliment and maintenance of the child.

She averred:—(Cond. 10) "In or about the month of October 1884 the defender, through the said Margaret Ann Bracken, agreed with the pursuer that she should take charge of the said child, and undertook to repay her whatever sums she might expend on his aliment and maintenance. With the exception of about a month in the spring of 1885, when the child was taken away by the said Margaret Ann Bracken, and lived with her and the defender, the said child has been maintained by the pursuer ever since. The pursuer produces herewith, and specially refers to an account shewing the details of the expenditure made by her for said child, and realisation fell to be performed in Scotland, as did also the duty of distribution, unless the trustees took the unusual course of carrying away the funds, and personally distributing them among the beneficiaries. In these circumstances, the trustees were certainly at one time subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts. That is to say, if the present action had been brought while the estate or part of it was still unrealised, I do not suppose there could have been any doubt as to the jurisdiction. But if the defenders, though foreigners, were originally responsible to the Scotch Courts for the performance of the trust, it is somewhat difficult to see why they should be able to shake off that responsibility by carrying away the trust-funds and appropriating a part thereof to themselves, which is in substance the charge here made by the pursuer. I am of opinion on the whole that the jurisdiction being once constituted remains, and I think this case illustrates well the hardship and inconvenience of any other rule. If the defenders cannot be sued here, they cannot be sued together, so far as I see, anywhere. One is in Ireland, another in Nebraska, and yet their liability to account is a joint and indivisible liability, and to sue them separately would be therefore impossible.

---

"I propose therefore to sustain the jurisdiction, and to allow a proof."

No. 154.

May 13, 1891. Bracken v. Blasquez.

amounting with interest, as at 1st April 1890, to the sum of £104, 13s." (Cond. 11) "The pursuer has repeatedly requested payment from the defender of the sums expended by her in alimenting and maintaining said child, but he refuses or delays to make payment, and also to make any arrangement for repaying the sums to be expended by the pursuer for the future maintenance of said child."

The account as rendered amounted to £104, 13s., being £92 of principal and £12, 13s. of interest, and was apportioned into sums of £4 for each quarter's aliment, from October 1884 to April 1890.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Prescription. Pursuer's claim is prescribed, so far as regards the items on and prior to 1st April 1887.

On 19th December 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) in view of the fact that the defender had left this country and was resident in Spain, ordained him to sist a mandatary.

On 30th January following the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the defender's failure to obtemper the order contained in the previous interlocutor, gave decree against him.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and his counsel stated that he had now returned to Edinburgh, and would remain in this country until the issue of the action.

Argued for the defender;—(1) Looking to the undertaking he was now willing to give, the Sheriff-substitute's order upon him to sist a mandatary ought to be recalled. (2) The triennial prescription applied to such quarterly payments of aliment as were alleged to be due prior to April 1, 1887, three years before the account was rendered.[1]

The respondent argued that the circumstances were not such as to warrant the Court in recalling the Sheriff-substitute's order upon the defender to sist a mandatary, and the decree ought therefore to stand.

The Court did not call upon the respondent to argue the question relating to prescription.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think we are in a position to dispose of this appeal. As regards the order of the Sheriff-substitute ordaining the defender to sist a mandatary, that is obviated by the return of the defender to this country, and by his expressed intention to remain here until this action is disposed of.

The only other question which has been argued to this Court has reference to the plea of prescription which has been stated on record. It is a question of some importance, whether that plea is applicable to such a contract as is averred in the 10th article of the condescendence. It is there stated that (cond. 10) "In or about the month of October 1884 the defender, through the said Margaret Ann Bracken, agreed with the pursuer that she should take charge of the said child, and undertook to repay her whatever sums she might expend on his aliment and maintenance." No rate of aliment is mentioned, and no statements are made or figures given from which the rate can be implied. The article then proceeds,—"With the exception of about a month in the spring of 1885, when the child was taken away by the said Margaret Ann Bracken, and lived with her and the defender, the said child has been maintained by the pursuer ever since. The pursuer produces herewith, and specially refers to, an account shewing the details of the expenditure made by her for said child, and amounting, with interest, as at 1st April 1890, to the sum of £104, 13s." Now, it does not appear to me that the circumstance of the pursuer's putting her claim [1] Ligertwood v. Brown, June 21, 1872, 10 Macph. 832, 44 Scot. Jur. 472. Taylor v. Allardice, Jan. 16, 1858, 20 D. 401, 30 Scot. Jur. 224.

No. 154.
May 13, 1891.
Bracken v. Blasquez.

for aliment into the form of a detailed account makes any alteration upon the nature of the question which we have to decide. The account merely sets forth the sums that the pursuer alleges she has spent on the child's behalf, and accordingly it carries us no further than article 10 itself does. In article 11 the pursuer states that she has "repeatedly requested payment from the defender of the sums expended by her in alimenting and maintaining said child, but he refuses or delays to make payment." There is no mention of any fixed sum as yearly or quarterly aliment.

I do not think that the defender has been able to quote any authority for the application of the triennial prescription to an account of this description. It is not said that there was any communication between the pursuer and defender as to the amount of expenditure to be allowed on the child's behalf. The statements are of the vaguest kind,—and the only thing said is that there was an agreement that the pursuer should take charge of the child, and that she should be repaid whatever sums she might actually expend. The exact figures can be reached only by evidence,—and that fact is of itself sufficient to exclude the operation of the triennial prescription.

Accordingly, I am for recalling the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute as to the sisting of a mandatary, and for sending the case back to be tried by him in the Sheriff Court in common form.

Lord Adam.—There are two questions in the present case. The first relates to the interlocutors of 19th December and 30th January last, ordaining the defender to sist a mandatary, and giving decree against him in respect of his failure to obtemper that order. At that time the defender had left the country, and accordingly these orders were very proper. Since that time he has returned, and I understand he is prepared to put in a minute undertaking to remain here until the present action is over. There is therefore now no case for sisting a mandatary.

The second question has reference to the application of the triennial prescription to such a transaction as that libelled. The account is set forth in an appendix, and is continuous, extending from 1884 to 1890,—coming down in the last item contained in it to within three years of the present time. Prima facie accordingly prescription is not applicable. But Mr Wilson says that de facto it is a termly account, and that prescription must run from the date at which each payment fell due. If that had been the nature of the account there might have been force in the plea which has been stated. But the averment made upon record as to the contract under which the account was incurred does not set forth that the defender undertook to make termly payments. It merely comes to this, that the defender undertook to repay to the pursuer whatever sums she might expend on the child's aliment and maintenance. The expenditure thus incurred is stated in the account to which I have referred, and the pursuer must prove in the ordinary way that the expenditure in question was made. I am clearly of opinion that the account is a continuous one, and accordingly that the Triennial Prescription Act has no application.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur with your Lordships in the view that there has been such an alteration of circumstances since the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor that the defender ought not to be bound to sist a mandatary.

On the question of prescription, it is to be kept in view that the Statute of

No. 154.

May 13, 1891.
Bracken v. Blasquez.

1579 enumerates various descriptions of debts, "house-maills, men's ordinaries, servants' fees, merchants' accounts, and others the like debts." It is enacted that these shall prescribe in three years, and that the creditor shall have no action unless he prove his case by the writ or oath of his debtor. I think it is evident that the statute has established a qualified presumption of payment—not an absolute presumption, but one having regard to the fact that people do not always preserve receipts or evidence of payment, and that it would not be fair to a debtor, after the lapse of three years, that he should be exposed to the risk of a dishonest claim being made against him for a debt which he had already discharged. In the interpretation of the statute, one of the important questions has always been to determine whether a series of items shall be massed together and treated as one debt, or shall be treated as separate debts. In the case of a current account, the items are treated as part of one debt, viz., the balance, and prescription runs only from the last date. One reason of this is that in the case of a current account there is no presumption—certainly no strong presumption—of interim payment. The presumption is that payment has been made within three years from the date when the account was rendered. In the alternative case of house rents, or aliment fixed at so much per year or per term, the practice is to make payment at each term, and accordingly each termly payment prescribes after three years from the date when it falls due. A debtor knows what his liability is, and the presumption is that he has settled for each term as it fell due, or at all events within three years after that date.

In considering under which of these two categories this case falls, I observe that some light is thrown upon the question by the citation from Mr Bell's Principles, where it is pointed out (sec. 629) that claims of relief by a party who has paid aliment fall to be treated as current accounts, and that prescription only runs in such cases from the last date of the account. I am not sure that in this passage the author means to enunciate a principle. He is merely stating the result of certain decisions. The presumption seems to rest on this, that there is not the same probability of payment in such cases as in those cases where there are agreements for termly payments, and if that is so, the principle appears to me to apply very strongly in the present case. Here, there is no agreement alleged either as to the amount or the period of payment,—there is only an undertaking to pay whatever might be advanced by the pursuer for the maintenance and aliment of the child. Accordingly, the undertaking appears to me to be of the same nature as these claims of relief, which have always been treated as current accounts. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plea of prescription as stated is not well founded, but applies only to the claim as a whole, the result being that prescription runs from the date of the last item in the account.

Lord Kinnear was absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 19th December 1890 and 30th January 1891: Quoad ultra repel the third plea in law for the defender, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed with the proof."

John Scott, Solicitor—A. W. Gordon, Solicitor—Agents.

JOHNSTON'S TRUSTEES, First Parties.—D.-F. Balfour—Craigie. No. 155.
JAMES JOHNSTON, Second Party.—D.-F. Balfour—Craigie.
WILLIAM LOW JOHNSTON AND HIS TUTOR, Third Parties.—Jameson—Ure. May 13, 1891.
Johnston's Trustees v. Johnston.

Succession—Vesting—Revocation of destination over.—A testator directed her trustees to "hold, apply, and dispose of" one-half of the residue of her estate to her nephew, payable on his attaining the age of twenty-five, directing her trustees to hold the capital in trust for him till he reached that age, but empowering them to expend the interest for his behoof, and to advance to him sums out of capital; there was then a destination over to a brother of the testator and his children, in the event of the nephew failing to attain twenty-five. By a codicil the testator recalled all the provisions in her settlement in favour of her brother and his children. Held that, the destination over being thus recalled, the nephew's interest vested a morte testatoris.

Succession—Revocation.—Held that where a testator recalled by a codicil all provisions made in favour of a particular person, and directed her trustees to dispose of the estate so set free among her relatives "according to their legal rights," the person originally favoured was not thereby prevented from taking a share of the latter bequest as one of the heirs in mobilibus.

MISS MARGARET JOHNSTON, of Welton, Blairgowrie, died on 14th July 1890, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th January 1887, and a codicil dated 2d July 1889. 2D DIVISION. M.

By the settlement she conveyed her whole estate to trustees and directed them to convert it into money, and to hold, apply, and dispose of the same as follows,—"One half of the free rest and residue of my estate to my nephew, William Low Johnston, payable on his attaining the full and complete age of twenty-five years, but until he attains that age my trustees shall hold the capital in trust, and apply in such sums and in such way as they deem most expedient the annual interest, or a part thereof, for his maintenance and upbringing, but with power to said trustees, if they think proper, to advance to the said William Low Johnston, prior to his attaining said age, a part of the capital, not exceeding one-half, in starting him in business, or otherwise starting him in life, but which discretion will lie wholly with my said trustees, whom I hereby appoint to be tutors and curators to him until he attain said age of twenty-five years complete; but declaring, in the event of the said William Low Johnston dying without leaving lawful issue of his body before attaining the said age, his said share of my estate shall fall to the parties after named, being the children of my brother, James Johnston, and the said James Johnston, and shall be divided among them in the same proportions as their own share is to be divided as hereinafter set forth; and the remaining half of said residue shall be held, applied, and disposed of by my said trustees to and for behoof of the children of my said brother, James Johnston, and to himself, in the proportions following, viz.:—(First) To Agnes Johnston, one-sixth thereof," &c.

She then specified the proportions in which these children and their father, James, were to take.

The codicil ran thus,—"I, the said Miss Margaret Johnston, before designed, being about to depart to Denmark for a time, and not having time to make a new settlement of my affairs before leaving, but being desirous to alter some of the provisions in the foregoing trust-disposition and settlement, hereby cancel and annul the whole provisions therein contained in favour of my brother, James Johnston, and also of his children nominatim in the said deed above written, and in lieu thereof I leave to the said James Johnston a sum of £100 sterling, in full of all he can claim, and in the event of his challenging this codicil, this bequest of

No. 155.

May 13, 1891.
Johnston's Trustees v. Johnston.

£100 will be held as null and void; and with regard to the residue of my estate, so far as the said James Johnston and his children were interested under the said trust-disposition and settlement, in the event of my death before executing a new settlement, such residue will be disposed of amongst those of my relatives according to their legal rights."

Miss Johnston was survived by her brother James, and his children and by her nephew, William Low Johnston, who was at this time a pupil. James and William, as representing his father, were her heirs in mobilibus.

A special case was presented to the Court by (1) the trustees; (2) James; and (3) William, and his mother as his tutor, for the determination of the following questions, viz.:—"(1) Did the half of the residue bequeathed to William Low Johnston by the said trust-disposition and settlement vest in him a morte testatoris? (2) Does the other half of the residue fall to be equally divided between James Johnston and William Low Johnston, or does it belong exclusively to James Johnston? or does it belong exclusively to William Low Johnston?"

On the question of vesting no argument was submitted. On the second question the arguments hinc inde turned upon the consideration, whether by cancelling the bequest in favour of James and his children, and leaving James £100 "in full of all he can claim," the testator did or did not impliedly exclude him from taking as one of her relatives substituted in room of him and his children by the later clause of the codicil.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first question which arises on the terms of these deeds is whether the half of the residue, which undoubtedly goes to William Low Johnston, vests a morte testatoris, or does not vest till a later date. It was conceded on his behalf that, if the original will had stood unaltered, the destination over in favour of James and his children would have prevented vesting until he attained the age of twenty-five years. But then the will is altered by the codicil, and the effect of the alteration is to read that clause in favour of James and his children out of the will altogether. The original will therefore now reads simply as a bequest to William, with certain directions to the trustees as to the administration of the bequest during his youth. The other clause being read out of the will, and the destination over having thus disappeared, I have no hesitation in answering the first question in the affirmative.

Then comes the question as to what is to become of the half which was originally left to James Johnston and his children. The bequest in their favour is cancelled. Miss Johnston, meaning to make another will, but not having time to do so, added this clause,—"And with regard to the residue of my estate, so far as the said James Johnston and his children were interested under the said trust-disposition and settlement, in the event of my death before executing a new settlement, such residue will be disposed of amongst those of my relatives according to their legal rights."

That is hardly an intelligible clause in itself, and it seems likely that some word has slipped in different from what was intended. It seems, however, to mean that such residue should be divided among her legal representatives. Whether that was or was not truly her intention, it is what the words express, and it is what she might very well have intended. I cannot see how it can be read as meaning anything else. The result of that will be that the first alternative of the second question must be answered in the affirmative, James Johnston and William Low Johnston taking equally.

It is unnecessary to answer any of the other questions. No. 155.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred. May 13, 1891. Johnston's Trustees v. Johnston.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question and the first alternative of the second question in the affirmative.

WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—JAMES RUSSELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

JESSIE YOUNG, Pursuer (Appellant).—M'Kechnie—Guy. No. 156.
MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF GLASGOW, Defenders (Respondents). —Asher—Ure.
JAMES M'CORRISTON AND MALCOLM M'PHEE, Defenders (Respondents).—Asher—Ure. May 16, 1891. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

Reparation—Wrongous apprehension—Burgh—Police Commissioners—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 84-86.—In an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against two police-constables and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow as Police Commissioners, the Magistrates and Town-Council were assoilzied on the ground that the constables were not their servants, the control and management of the police being vested in another statutory body—a committee of the Police Commissioners—and the Sheriff.

Reparation—Wrongous apprehension—Public officer—Malice.—An action of damages for wrongous apprehension on a charge of importuning under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, was brought against two constables,—the pursuer alleging that the defenders had at first declined to state any ground for her arrest or to allow her to acquaint her mother, who lived close by; that the apprehension had been made with unnecessary violence; that she had been roughly treated and hustled in presence of a large crowd on the way to the police station; that the charge preferred against her was utterly groundless; and that the defenders had acted maliciously and without probable cause. Held that malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue, and that the averments were sufficient to infer malice.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. C.

ON the night of 5th November 1890, Jessie Young, a dressmaker, residing with her mother in Glasgow, was arrested at the entrance to her mother's house by two constables in plain clothes, M'Corriston and M'Phee, and taken to the police station, where she was charged with importuning, under section 149, subsection 30, of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

She subsequently brought an action of damages against M'Corriston and M'Phee, and also against the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow, as the Commissioners of Police under the Glasgow Police Acts, 1866 to 1890, and relative Acts therein referred to, particularly the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, and the Order Confirmation (Glasgow) Act, 1877,—alleging that they were responsible, both at common law and under the Order Confirmation Act, for the conduct and efficiency of the other defenders, and had adopted their actings.

The pursuer averred that she was virtuous and industrious, and that ever since her father's death she had been the chief support of her mother's household. (Cond. 4) "On Wednesday night, the 5th day of November last, the pursuer, after her work was done for the day, called at the house of a friend, Mrs Reid, and Miss Reid, daughter of Mrs Reid, offered to accompany pursuer home. On reaching the entrance to pursuer's house the defenders M'Corriston and M'Phee . . . sprang forward and arrested pursuer and Miss Reid. . . . Miss Reid and pursuer inquired what was wrong, but the defenders M'Corriston and M'Phee replied that they would know that when they got to the Cranstonhill Police Office, and declined to state any grounds for the arrest. The pursuer desired that she should acquaint her mother before accompanying the policemen, but this they refused. Although they knew that pursuer lived at the place where arrested, and would have been available at any time to answer to any alleged complaint that might be preferred against her, and although pursuer and Miss Reid offered to go quietly, they were roughly treated by the policemen M'Corriston and M'Phee, being dragged along by the arms, and jostled and hustled in presence of a large crowd of persons who had collected, and were taken to the Western Police Station at Cranstonhill." (Cond. 9) "In apprehending the pursuer as aforesaid, the defenders, the said M'Corriston and M'Phee, acted maliciously, oppressively, and illegally, and without any just or probable cause. In executing the arrest they used great harshness, and acted with quite unnecessary force and violence. The pursuer suffered in her person through the roughness of their treatment. The charge preferred against her was utterly groundless, and was also made maliciously and oppressively by the said defenders. The pursuer has since learned that one of them has been for only a short time in the force, and she believes and avers that both were very imperfectly acquainted with their duties as constables, and were not fit and proper persons to be appointed to that office. The pursuer has suffered, and still continues to suffer, severely in her health, feelings, business, and reputation by the said wrongous and unjustifiable arrest, and the disgraceful charge made against her character by the police authorities, and persisted in by them, as well as their persecution and threats after referred to." (Cond. 10) "Ever since said arrest the defenders the said M'Corriston and M'Phee have used every means in their power to molest, persecute, and annoy the pursuer. They have threatened to arrest the pursuer on the first occasion she is seen outside of her own house, and have avowed the intention of ruining her character by any means in their power. They are continually watching her, hanging about the neighbourhood of her home, and make a practice of peeping through the windows back and front of the house, which is situated on the ground floor. In consequence of the threats of these defenders, and the system of espionage to which they have subjected the pursuer, she is living in constant fear of them. She dares hardly venture out of doors, and has been prevented attending to her regular work. Her health has suffered in consequence."

No. 156.

May 16, 1891. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The defenders stated a joint defence, explaining, inter alia, that "the defenders M'Corriston and M'Phee are not employed or paid by or under the control of the other defenders the Magistrates and Council, nor are the Magistrates and Council responsible for their acts."

In regard to the action of the constables, it was stated that they had reasonable grounds for making the apprehension, and were only acting in the execution of their duty, and under the powers conferred on them by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having been apprehended and charged with an offence by the said police-constables, acting with and under the authority and consent of the other defenders, the said Magistrates and Council, as libelled, wilfully, maliciously, groundlessly, and oppressively, and without just or probable cause, is entitled to reparation therefor, and to decree as craved. (3) The defenders the Magistrates, &c., qua Police Commissioners, as aforesaid, or those for whom they are responsible, having adopted the actings of the said M'Corriston and M'Phee, and other officials in their employment, and proceedings against them, and being the domini litis, are liable to the pursuer

No. 156.

May 16, 1891.
Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

in terms of the prayer of the petition, jointly and severally with the other defenders."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Privilege. (3) The defenders M'Corriston and M'Phee not being employed or paid by, or under the control of the other defenders, the Magistrates, &c., they are not liable for their acts, and they (the Magistrates, &c.) should therefore be assoilzied with expenses.

On 4th February 1891, the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and lodged the following issues:—"It being admitted that the defenders the Magistrates and Council of the City and Royal Burgh of Glasgow are Commissioners of Police of the said royal burgh, constituted by and acting under the Glasgow Police Acts, 1866 to 1890, and that the other defenders, the said James M'Corriston and Malcolm M'Phee, are constables in the western division of the City of Glasgow, employed and acting under and in virtue of the said Acts, Whether, on or about 5th November 1890, the said James M'Corriston and Malcolm M'Phee wrongfully apprehended the pursuer, or caused her to be apprehended, at or near the house of her mother at 31 Willowbank Crescent in Glasgow, and conveyed her, or caused her to be conveyed, to the Cranstonhill Police Office in Glasgow, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Whether, place and date foresaid, the said defenders, in apprehending the pursuer as aforesaid, acted oppressively and with unnecessary force and violence, and dragged her by the arms and jostled and hustled her, whereby she was injured in her person, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Whether on or about the date foresaid, at the said Cranstonhill Police Office, the said James M'Corriston and Malcolm M'Phee wrongfully and oppressively charged the pursuer, or caused her to be charged, with the offence of importuning, under section 149, subsection 30, of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—(1) No issue should be granted against the Magistrates. The only ground on which it could be granted would be that of liability for the wrongful acts of their servants. The constables were not under the control of the Magistrates. The Magistrates provided their pay, but they did not give them their orders. Under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 273), secs. 84-86, the chief constable regulated the conduct and duties of the constables, and he in turn was responsible to the Magistrates' Committee, who were a statutory body different from the Magistrates. The latter, and not the Magistrates, ought to have been called. (2) In the case of the constables, the words "maliciously and without probable cause" must be inserted, as it was not said that the alleged wrongful acts committed by them had been done outside the scope of their employment. There must also be a full disclosure upon record of facts and circumstances from which it might legitimately be inferred that they had not been acting in the discharge of their duty, but from a malicious motive.[1] Protection was given to public officers and persons in the position of these defenders in order that they might be free to perform their public duties fearlessly. There was no suggestion that in what the constables did they transgressed any statutory provision

[1] Beaton v. Ivory, July 19, 1887, 14 R. 1057; M'Murchy v. Campbell, May 21, 1887, 14 R. 725; Innes v. Adamson, Oct. 25, 1889, 17 R. 11; Macaulay v. North Uist School Board, Nov. 26, 1887, 15 R. 99; Urquhart v. Grigor, Dec. 21, 1864, 3 Macph. 283, 37 Scot. Jur. 134; Limpus v. General Omnibus Co., 1862, 1 H. & C. 526.

No. 156. May 16, 1891. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

or recklessly disregarded any regulation, in which case a mere general averment of malice might have sufficed.[1] The question was whether they had acted within the scope of their duty in doing what they did, and whether, assuming they had exceeded the scope of their duty, they had acted maliciously or not.

Accordingly, as there were no averments on record to justify an inference of malice, the first and third issues ought to be disallowed, or in any case the words "maliciously and without probable cause" ought to be inserted. Further, there were no averments on record to support the second issue.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The Magistrates had adopted responsibility for the doings of the constables by making common cause with them in this action, and by defending it along with them. Further, although the chief control was delegated to a committee by the Magistrates, under the local Act of 1866, the latter were not absolved from responsibility.[2] The present case might be assimilated to those where it had been held that a master was responsible for the fraud of his agent, committed by the latter while acting within the scope of his employment.[3] (2) It was admitted that the words "maliciously and without probable cause" must be inserted in the issues directed against the action of the constables. But the general averment of malice was sufficient in this case. It was only in the case of persons holding positions of importance in the public service, or of medical men, as in the authorities cited by the other side, that facts and circumstances from which malice might be inferred required to be set forth. In any view the averments set forth upon record were sufficient to infer malice.

The second issue proposed was withdrawn.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—As regards the first question which has been raised upon the proposed issues, I entertain no doubt that the action would not lie against the Magistrates either as such or as Police Commissioners. It appears to me that the pursuer has altogether mistaken the position in which the Magistrates stand. They are bound to maintain a police establishment, and to provide money for the purpose. But the management of the police of the city is in other hands—it is in the hands of the Committee of the Commissioners of Police, who have not been called in the action, and of the Sheriff. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that the constables who are charged with effecting a wrongous apprehension are not in any sense servants of the Magistrates as Commissioners of Police, and the latter cannot be made answerable.

The same observations apply with equal force to the second issue.

There is the further question whether the issues against the two constables must be qualified by the insertion of the words "maliciously and without probable cause." These words have not been inserted in the issues, but I am of opinion that they ought to be. But a further question is how far a bare allegation of malice on record without the averment of any facts and circumstances from which malice may be inferred is sufficient to found an action of this description. I think that where an arrest has been made as it was here, and

[1] Lightbody v. Gordon, June 15, 1882, 9 R. 934.

[2] Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 88 and 134. cf. also Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Co., 1861, 30 L. J., Q. B. 148.

[3] Mackay v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick, 1874, L. R., 5 P. C. Apps. 394; Houldsworth v. The City of Glasgow Bank, July 4, 1879, 6 R. 1164.

No. 156.

May 16, 1891.

Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

where it is alleged that it was made with unnecessary violence, or was accompanied by abusive language, or by personal restraint such as would be uncalled for in the circumstances—these are facts and circumstances from which malice may be inferred. Accordingly, I am rather disposed to hold that there are sufficient averments in this record to warrant the insertion of the words maliciously and without probable cause.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I think there is no case whatever against the Magistrates and Town-Council. I think the police-constables are the servants, and act under the authority of the Committee of the Police Commissioners, who are a statutory body different from the Magistrates and Town-Council. Along with the Sheriff, they are the authority who have the charge and control of the police. It is now proposed to make the Magistrates and Town-Council responsible for the conduct of persons with whose appointment they have nothing to do. This would be a complete novelty, and I think we must dismiss the action as against these defenders.

Upon the other questions in the case, I also agree with your Lordship. The circumstances attending the arrest, as set forth upon record, are such as in my view are sufficient to suggest malice without any more specific averment.

LORD M'LAREN.—Concurring as I do with your Lordships, I have only to add that I think the argument which has been addressed to us for the pursuer is founded on a mistaken analogy between cases like the present and cases in which an employer of labour is held responsible for the negligent acts of persons in his employment on the principle respondeat superior. The relation between the Magistrates and the police is not a relation of employment, but is an official relation constituted by statute. The police of Glasgow are subject to the joint orders of the Magistrates' Committee and of the Sheriff, just as in the counties of Scotland the county constables are subject to the joint control of the Sheriff and the Police Committee (now the Standing Joint Committee of the County Council, and of the Commissioners of Supply). The Town-Council who are the Police Commissioners of Glasgow have no right to interfere with the police in the execution of their duties in relation to the apprehension and detention of prisoners, and therefore the Town-Council cannot be responsible for the negligent performance of these duties.

I do not say that where the police are acting under the direct orders of the Sheriff or a Magistrate, the official who gives the order may not be made responsible in an action containing proper substantive averments of malice towards the person aggrieved. According to the case of Beaton v. Ivory, a merely formal averment of malice would not be sufficient to take the case out of the region of the privilege which belongs to the higher executive officers in relation to their public duties.

With regard to the action as directed against the constables, without going so far as to say that a naked averment of malice would be sufficient to displace the officer's privilege, yet as it is here alleged that the arrest was carried out in an offensive and arbitrary manner, this, together with the constables' refusal to accept the pursuer's tender of her address and offer to attend the Police Court, constitute a circumstantial case entitling the pursuer to an issue in the form proposed, with the addition of the words "maliciously and without probable cause."

No. 156. LORD KINNEAR was absent.

May 16, 1891. Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, assoilzied the Magistrates, with £7, 7s. of expenses, and approved of the following issues for the trial of the cause:—"Whether on or about 5th November 1890 the said James M'Corriston and Malcolm M'Phee, maliciously and without probable cause, apprehended the pursuer at or near the house of her mother at 31 Willowbank Crescent in Glasgow, and conveyed her to the Cranstonhill Police Office in Glasgow, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Whether on or about the date foresaid, at the said Cranstonhill Police Office, the said James M'Corriston and Malcolm M'Phee, maliciously and without probable cause, charged the pursuer with the offence of importuning, under section 149, subsection 30, of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

JAMES DRUMMOND, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 157. RODERICK WILLOUGHBY MACLEOD AND OTHERS (Macleod's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—Dundas.
WILLIAM HUGH ERIC MURRAY, Defender (Reclaimer).—C. J. Guthrie.

May 21, 1891. Macleod's Trustees v. Murray.

Title to sue and defend—Jus tertii—Adjudication—Discharge—Statute 1621, cap. 6.—The debtor in an obligation for payment of an annuity has no title to plead, in answer to a demand for payment by a person who has adjudged the creditor's right, that the adjudger's right has been extinguished by payment of the debt on which the adjudication proceeded.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. I.

JAMES FRASER, of Pitcalzean, in 1666, as part of an arrangement for the commutation of the multures of his lands, "sold, annailzied, and disponed" to Sir George Mackenzie, of Tarbat, owner of the mill of Morvish, a yearly annuity of forty bolls victual payable furth of his lands of Pitcalzean. Infeftment followed on this disposition.

Sir George Mackenzie sold his right to the annuity to Sir John Urquhart, of Cromarty, and in 1698 Roderick Mackenzie, of Prestonhall, advocate, adjudged the right to the annuity from James Urquhart, of Cromarty connecting himself with Sir John by services and retours as heir. The adjudication proceeded on the narrative of a debt due by Urquhart to Mackenzie under a bond for £590 sterling. No charter followed on the decree of adjudication, and no infeftment was taken till 1869 by the adjudger, or those in his right.

On 9th October 1889 the trustees of Macleod, of Cadboll, who had acquired the rights of Mackenzie, of Prestonhall, raised an action against Mr Murray, of Geanies, who now held the lands of Pitcalzean, for payment of a sum of money equivalent to the value of the forty bolls of victual, or, alternatively, for delivery of the victual.

The pursuers pleaded their title.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The debt for which the pretended adjudication of 1698 was led, having been long ago paid up and extinguished by intromissions and otherwise, the pursuers, at common law, and in terms of the Act, 1621, cap. 6, have no interest to sue.

The pursuers pleaded that the defences were irrelevant.

The following minute was lodged by the parties:—"Dundas, for the pursuers, Guthrie, for the defender, for the purposes of this case, and without prejudice to their respective rights and pleas in any other

No. 157.

May 21, 1891.
Macleod's Trustees v. Murray.

action or proceeding, or otherwise, and under reservation of all the pleas in law competent to them respectively, concurred in stating that the parties craved the Lord Ordinary to decide the case on the footing (1) that the annuity in dispute was in point of fact regularly drawn by the predecessors in title of the pursuers, and paid to them by the proprietors of the estate of Pitcalzean, at all events from the year 1698 down to the year 1888, and (2) that the pursuers' predecessors in title in point of fact uplifted and received subsequent to the date of the adjudication in 1698, out of the " annual payments of the annuity, " sums of money more than sufficient to extinguish and pay off the principal sum contained in the said decree of adjudication, dated 17th February 1698, with interest thereon, and expenses."

On 3d December 1890 Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary) decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

The defender Murray reclaimed.

Argued for Murray;—The pursuers' title was at an end, and they could not give the defender a good discharge. Their title was merely a security title, and to convert it into a title of property there must either be a declarator of expiry of the legal, which had not taken place here, or a charter of adjudication with prescriptive possession.[1] Here there was no infeftment on the decree of adjudication till 1869, whereas forty years' possession was still required under an adjudication as being a redeemable right.[2] The statutes anent comprysings,† had been held applicable to adjudications.[3] Rankeillor's case[3] determined that on payment of the debt the right of the adjudger ipso

---

* "OPINION.— . . . A more serious question is, however, raised with respect to the subsistence of the adjudication title in the person of the Mackenzies, of Prestonhall, and their assignees. It is admitted that Sir John Urquhart's debt to the Mackenzies, on which the adjudication proceeded, has long been extinguished by the annuities drawn from year to year, and the defender argued that that being so, the annuity is now disburdened of the debt, and that the title to draw it has long ago reverted to the Urquharts of Cromarty. It is not said, it will be observed, that there has been any declarator of expiry of the legal, and there being no infeftment, there has of course, been no room for the positive prescription. On the other hand, it is the fact that the Urquharts, of Cromarty, have brought no declarator of redemption, nor have they taken any step to challenge the pursuer's title, or to interpel the tenants of the lands adjudged, or the defender, as debtor in the annuity adjudged, from continuing to pay to the adjudgers.

"I am of opinion that in the circumstances the defender has no title to plead the alleged discharge of the debt and redemption of the annuity. Such redemption is only competent to the reverser and his heirs, and while they choose to stand aside the adjudger's title in my opinion subsists, and he is entitled to continue in possession. It may be that if heirs of the Urquharts, of Cromarty, still exist, the pursuer is bound to count and reckon with them, but I do not see that he can be asked to count and reckon with the defender, who is undoubtedly due the annual payments, and in a question with whom the redeemable character of the adjudger's title seems unimportant. I do not overlook that the adjudger's title is still personal—no infeftment having followed upon the adjudication prior to the notarial instrument of 1869 which is now challenged. But this circumstance does not appear to me to affect the question of the defender's title to plead the discharge of the debt and the redemption of the annuity. . . ."

[1] Ormiston v. Hill, Feb. 7, 1809, F. C.

[2] Hinton v. Connell's Trustees, July 6, 1883, 10 R. 1110.

† 1621, c. 6, 1672, c. 19.

[3] Stair, iii. 2, 50 and 52; Rankeillor, July 1, 1624, M. 295.

No. 157. May 21, 1897. Macleod's Trustees v. Murray.

facto came to an end. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But that was a case between the adjudger and reverser.] But the language of the Statute of 1621 was perfectly general, and it was the ground of that judgment. Here there was a judicial admission of the payment of the debt. Would the Court aid the pursuer to get what he himself said he had no right to get? There could never be a declarator of expiry of the legal, for the necessary averment in such an action, viz., that the debt was still unpaid, could not be made. The moment that a representative of the Urquharts, or, failing them, the Crown, came forward to claim the annuity, there could be no defence against their claim by Macleod.

Argued for the pursuers;—The defender was bound to pay to someone, and the pursuers were the only persons holding the title of creditor. He could not call on the pursuers for a count and reckoning any more than a tenant of subjects burdened with a bond and disposition in security could, when called on to pay under an action of maills and duties, raised by the creditor in the bond, who has entered into possession, call on that creditor to count and reckon, with the view of shewing that the bond had been paid. The title was, except in a question with the reverser, an irredeemable title. No one else had a title to redeem. As regarded the minute, that was before answer, and under reservation of all pleas. The fact might be as stated there, but the question for the Court was whether the defenders could refer to that fact.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—In this action the pursuers conclude against the defender for payment of a certain sum of money as the equivalent for forty bolls of victual, or otherwise for delivery of the victual itself. Several defences are stated by the defender on record,—all of which have been repelled by the Lord Ordinary,—but the only defences maintained before us were those set forth in the defender's first and second pleas in law. The first plea depends upon the second. It is unnecessary to go into any detail regarding the pursuers' title, because that has been very fully done by the Lord Ordinary; but the state of the pursuers' title to the victual in question, or its equivalent in money, may be stated shortly as follows. In 1666 the lands of Pitcalzean (of which the defender is now proprietor), were validly burdened and charged with payment of a yearly annuity of forty bolls of victual, and the right to exact this annuity stood vested in 1673 in Sir John Urquhart, of Cromarty. This right was adjudged in 1698 by Mackenzie, of Prestonhall, in respect of a debt of £590 then due to him by Sir John Urquhart, and the pursuers are now in right of the decree of adjudication. It is maintained by the defender that the pursuers have no title to sue this action, because the debt for which the adjudication was led has been paid. This fact is not established, but a minute of admissions has been lodged, by which the pursuers admit that, for the purposes of this case, it may be so held, and the case decided upon that footing. I am of opinion that even upon such an admission the defence now urged cannot be sustained. Whether that debt has been paid or not is a matter with which the defender has no concern. His obligation to pay the forty bolls of victual is an existing obligation which he must discharge, and there must be some creditor in that obligation. Ex facie of their titles the pursuers are the creditors entitled to enforce and to discharge that obligation. So far as the defender is concerned, the pursuers' right to enforce payment of the victual payable out of the defender's lands, stands upon an absolute title, although in a question with the representatives of Urquhart of Cromarty that title is redeemable. The defender has no right to state or maintain pleas which are personal to Urquhart's representative, and the pursuers are entitled to decline discussing any such pleas with him. For this reason, in my opinion, the pursuers while admitting for the purposes of this case (in order to save time and expense in investigating that matter) that the debt for which the adjudication was led has been paid, have admitted nothing from which the defender can take any benefit. The pursuers on their present title are the creditors, and only creditors, in the defender's obligation, and to their demand for payment it seems to me the defender has no answer. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed. In form, however, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor will require to be recalled, as he has deemed "conform to the conclusions of the summons," omitting to notice that these conclusions are alternative, and decree should now be pronounced in terms of the first conclusion of the summons.

No. 157.

May 21, 1891.
Macleod's Trustees v. Murray.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and pronounced decree in terms of the first alternative conclusion of the summons.

MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—MACANDREW, WRIGHT, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 158.

May 22, 1891.
Guthrie's Trustees v. Ireland.

NORMAN M'GREGOR AND ANOTHER (Guthrie's Trustees) Complainers (Reclaimers).—Asher—Watt.
ALEXANDER IRELAND, Respondent.—D.-F. Balfour—Maclennan.

Public-house—Hotel—Tippling Act (24 Geo. II. c. 40), sec. 12.—Opinions that the 12th section of the Tippling Act does not apply to the case of a guest resident in a hotel who during his stay is supplied from time to time with small quantities of spirituous liquors for his own use and that of friends.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Wellwood. M.

CHARLES SETON GUTHRIE, of Scotscalder, in the county of Caithness, brought a note of suspension against Alexander Ireland, an innkeeper at Georgemas, to suspend a charge upon a bill for £50 granted by him to Ireland.

Guthrie had lived in the respondent's inn from 5th October to 27th December 1887. He granted the bill in dispute in discharge of the account incurred by him for board and lodging, occasional carriage hires, the keep of a horse and dog, and other small expenses during that period.

The ground of suspension was the provisions of the Tippling Act.* The complainer averred that the bill had been granted, in part at least, for glasses of spirits and beer supplied to him, his servant, and persons in his company during his stay in the house.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. A detailed account made up shortly before the proof by the respondent, shewing the details of the complainer's liability, was produced. The two concluding items of that account were, three gallons of brandy, £6, 15s., and two barrels of beer, £3, 10s. The total amount of the account was £73, 8s. 9d.

It was proved that the complainer during his stay in the house had frequently given drink to friends in the bar, but there was also evidence

* 24 Geo. II. c. 40, sec. 12,—"No person shall recover any sum of money, debt, or demand on account of any spirituous liquors, unless it shall, bona fide, have been contracted at one time to the amount of 20s. or upwards."

No. 158.

May 22, 1891. Guthrie's Trustees v. Ireland.

to shew that a case of brandy had been put aside for him in a corner of the bar-parlour.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 4th February 1891, repelled the reasons of suspension, and refused the note.*

Certain trustees, appointed by Guthrie for behoof of his creditors, sisted themselves as parties to the action, and reclaimed, founding on the case of Maitland v. Rattray,[1] and arguing that, even if Lord Abinger's opinion were sound and Lord Denman's doubts unfounded, the fact that the drink here was taken in the bar and not in the guest's private room distinguished the present case from the case with which Lord Abinger was dealing.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary has disposed of this case on the ground that the account incurred by Mr Guthrie, of Scotscalder, when examined, shews that there is a sufficient amount due by him to this innkeeper, apart from charges for liquor altogether, to cover the amount of the bill which Guthrie has granted.

That is sufficient for the decision of the case,—for I agree with the Lord Ordinary in that view,—but it seems desirable, since we have had a full argument from the reclaimer on the question raised under the Tippling Act, that I should express my opinion on that matter also.

The object of the Tippling Act is plain enough. It is to prevent persons who have no ready cash from going to bars and drinking small quantities of liquor from time to time by getting credit. Such a practice tends to throw these persons into the power of the publican, and gives him an inducement to

---

* The Lord Ordinary having explained in his note that he proceeded on the ground "that when the bill was granted there were legal charges to the amount of £50 due by the complainer, irrespective of the charges for spirits objected to," proceeded thus:—"This being so, I see no reason why the respondent, simply because he was willing to accept less than his full account for the sake of a settlement, should not now, when payment is refused, attribute the whole sum in the bill to his charges other than those for spirituous liquors.

"In this view, it is not necessary for me to decide a somewhat difficult question under the Tippling Act, viz., Whether the Act applies to the case of a person lodging in the house who has a running account for his board and lodgings? If the Act applies, then a lodger might refuse payment for every glass of spirits which he or his guests drank during his stay in the hotel or lodgings, unless he bought a pound's worth at a time. In the case of Proctor v. Nicolson, 7 C. and P. 67, 24th June 1835, Lord Abinger held that the Act did not apply to such a case. He said,—'I think that that enactment does not apply to cases where spirits are supplied to guests who are lodging in the house, as it could never be intended by the Legislature that an innkeeper should not be entitled to be paid for spirits supplied to such guests who had taken up their abode in his inn.' On the other hand, in Hughes v. Done, 1841, 1 Q. B. (Adol. and Ellis), 294, Lord Denman expressed doubts of the decision in the case of Proctor v. Nicolson, and refers to cases, one of which is Burnyeat v. Hutchinson, 5 B. and A. 241, to the opposite effect. In Wharton on the Law applicable to Innkeepers (1876), p. 144, the author, on the authority of the case of Proctor v. Nicolson, states that the Act does not apply to such a case.

"If the Act does not apply to spirits furnished to a lodger in his own room, it is hard to distinguish between such charges and those for spirits supplied to him at the bar or in the public rooms. But, as I have said, I do not feel called upon to pronounce a positive opinion upon the question, and I prefer to decide in favour of the respondent on the ground first considered."

[1] Maitland v. Rattray, Nov. 14, 1848, 11 D. 71.

No. 158.
May 22, 1891.
Guthrie's Trustees v. Ireland.

encourage drinking, and thus to bring poor people under oppressive debt, while injuring them morally. The Act is directed to the prevention of this public mischief.

But here the customer is a guest in the house, and he orders the liquor for himself and his friends; but it is all supplied to him, on his order and credit, as a resident in the house. Does the Tippling Act apply to that case? I think it does not. I think that Lord Abinger's opinion in the case of Proctor, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, is quite sound. Lord Denman, in the case in which he expressed some doubt as to that opinion, seems to have mixed up two things, viz., the case where liquor is supplied in a place for passing entertainment,—a public-house or tavern,—and the case of a hotel with guests living in it, it may be for considerable periods. It would be a very strange thing if the Tippling Act must be read so as to require a hotelkeeper to demand payment from a person living in his house for every glass of liquor as he orders it. It would lead to a total subversion of hotel practice, and if it were the law, it would be very surprising that in the case of an Act passed so long ago it should only come to be held now that it applied to guests living in a hotel. I am of opinion that it does not apply.

I entirely concur with the decision of Lord Abinger in the case of Proctor, and I am confirmed in my view by finding that Lord Abinger's opinion is accepted as authoritative and as the recognised law, Mr Wharton in his treatise in 1876 stating the law in accordance with that case.

Mr Watt has, however, insisted upon the particular circumstances of this case. He maintains that this case is taken out of the rule approved by Lord Abinger, because Mr Guthrie got his liquor or gave his friends their liquor in the bar. But I am not dealing with any particular case. The enactment being statutory and prohibitory it must be strictly interpreted, and my reading of the Act is that it is intended to cover the case of liquor served out to persons coming to a licensed house for temporary refreshment, but not to cover the case of the guests living in a hotel.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary must be affirmed, both upon the ground on which he has put his judgment and on the ground taken by Lord Abinger.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and I concur with him on the ground on which he has placed his judgment. I do not feel called on to pronounce any opinion on the question raised under the Tippling Act, but I may say that my opinion leans strongly in the direction of Lord Abinger's opinion in the case cited by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and, like his Lordship, without pronouncing any positive opinion on the scope of the Tippling Act, I am very strongly inclined to agree with Lord Abinger's opinion.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

THOMAS DALGLEISH, S.S.C.—PHILIP, LAING, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 159.

May 22, 1891.
Aitken v. North British Railway Co.

MRS MARY AITKEN AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—M'Kechnie—Graham Stewart.
NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Asher—Ure.

Reparation—Contributory negligence—Railway—Invitation to passenger to alight.—In an action of damages against a railway company raised by a passenger for injuries received in alighting at night from a train at a railway station—not a terminus—it was proved that the train was of an unusual length, that the last carriage, in which the pursuer was travelling, was stopped opposite the end of the platform which sloped down to the level of the rails; that the pursuer had failed to observe this when she stepped out of the carriage. The guard deponed that he had shouted to the passengers to keep their seats before the pursuer left the carriage, but in this he was contradicted. The jury found for the pursuer.

In a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, held (1) that in the circumstances it was the duty of the defenders to have given warning to the passengers to keep their seats; and (2) that the question whether they gave such warning or not was one for the jury.

1ST DIVISION Ld. Kyllachy. C.

THIS action of damages was brought against the North British Railway Company by Mrs Mary Aitken, with consent of her husband, James Aitken, for injuries received by her on 15th September 1890, in alighting from an Edinburgh to North Leith train at Great Junction Street Station, Leith.

The day on which the accident happened was the Edinburgh autumn holiday, on which a large number of people were travelling, and the trains were consequently longer than usual. The Great Junction Street Station was below the level of the street, being bounded on the north by a high bank, and having only one platform, on the south side. The two pursuers occupied the rear carriage of the train, there being only the guard's van behind, and when the train stopped at the station, the two last carriages being at that time short of the level part of the platform, and opposite the slope in which the platform terminated, the female pursuer opened the door of her carriage, and stepping out, fell on the railway and was severely injured. This happened about nine o'clock in the evening.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 5) "Said accident was entirely owing to the defenders having failed to draw the rear carriage of said train up to and alongside the platform, or to warn the passengers not to alight, and also through their failure to light the said platform in proper and sufficient places during the hours of darkness."

The defenders denied that averment, and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer in stepping out of the train regardless of a warning which it was alleged the guard gave the passengers not to alight until the train was drawn forward.

At the trial Aitken deponed that the train had stopped before his wife left the carriage, thinking it was at the platform, that it was too dark to see the platform, and that he heard no warning "keep your seats," or anything of that sort, until after his wife fell out. This evidence was corroborated by other passengers. Both pursuers knew the station well.

For the defenders the guard of the train deponed that it had barely stopped when he jumped out, and that he shouted "keep your seats" before the accident happened.

The evidence as to the lighting of the station, including the part where the accident occurred, was contradictory. The floor of the carriage was about 4 feet 9 inches from the level of the sleepers.

The jury found for the pursuers, damages £120.

No. 159.

May 22, 1891.
Aitken v. North British Railway Co.[1]

The defenders obtained a rule upon the pursuers to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside as contrary to evidence.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was proved that the platform was too short, and that it was not sufficiently lighted. The evidence shewed that the guard's warning not to leave the train, which it was his duty to give if the passengers were not to alight, had not been given in time. If that was so, the female pursuer had only taken the right course in alighting when she did, because the stopping of the train was equivalent to an invitation to her to do so. In any case the question whether the female pursuer had left the carriage too precipitately was for the jury, and the Court would not lightly interfere with their verdict.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no evidence of fault on their part. Accepting the law as laid down in the cases cited on the other side, the present case fell very far short of what had happened there. It could not be said to amount to a fault that the train was too long for the platform, and on the other hand it was not proved that it had been stopped for a sufficiently long time to amount to an invitation to the passengers to alight. If there was not sufficient light there that ought to have shewn the passengers that it was not intended that they should leave the carriages. The evidence was that the guard gave a warning not to alight, but if he did not do so until the pursuer had left the carriage, in so leaving she had been too precipitate and reckless, and there was thus contributory negligence on her part. The verdict was against the weight of evidence.

At advising,—

LORD KYLLACHY.—The pursuer in this case claims damages from the North British Railway Company in respect of personal injuries received by her on a night in September last in alighting from a train on the defenders' railway, at one of their stations between Edinburgh and Leith. The accident happened in this way—The carriage in which the pursuer travelled was the last in the train, and was drawn up opposite the sloping end of the station platform; and the pursuer stepped down upon this slope, which, being dimly lighted, she failed to distinguish from the level part of the platform. In making the descent she fell and sprained her ankle, and the jury have found by their verdict that in the circumstances the railway company were responsible for the accident.

I am not able to say that I think this verdict is contrary to the evidence.

The important facts seem to be these: The station was, as I have said, not a terminal but a wayside station; and the train, when the pursuer alighted, had drawn up within the station in the usual manner, and, so far as appeared, at the usual place. In point of fact the van and the last carriage projected beyond the platform and were opposite to the slope before referred to, but this part of the station was dimly lighted, and the pursuer, as I have said, failed to observe the difference of level. So far as appeared, moreover, the train had come to a final stop; for although, after an interval, it again moved forward and again stopped, there was nothing to indicate to passengers that such second stop was intended. It was not here the practice to call out the name of the station or to give passengers otherwise any express invitation to alight. In fact, at this station

[1] Potter v. North British Railway Co., June 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 664, 45 Scot. Jur. 413; Cockle v. London and South-Eastern Railway Co., 1872, L. R., 7 C. P. 321; Bridges v. North London Railway Co., 1874, L. R., 7 Eng. and Ir. Apps. 213; Rose v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 1876, L. R., 2 Exch. Div. 248.

No. 159.

May 22, 1891.
Aitken v. North British Railway Co.

the stoppage of the train was the only invitation to alight which passengers received. Further, the projection of the train beyond the platform was not an ordinary occurrence. The pursuer was in the way of travelling on the railway, and it had not previously happened in her experience.

In these circumstances I cannot say that I think it was too much to expect that the defenders, if they found it necessary on the night in question to run a train which was too long for their platform, and thus to expose their passengers to a new and somewhat exceptional risk—it was not, I think, too much to expect that they should give some warning or make some provision against such accidents as that which happened. And indeed the defenders seem to have so far accepted this view of their duty; for they averred on record, and sought to prove at the trial, that before the accident—that is to say, before the train quite stopped—the guard jumped down from his van and called on the passengers to keep their seats. That being so, it became in my opinion a question for the jury whether the warning thus alleged was proved to have been given,—in other words, whether the jury were to believe the guard (whose evidence I think implied that the pursuer left the train before it stopped) or were to believe the pursuer and her husband, whose evidence was distinct to the contrary.

Now, the jury, rightly or wrongly, preferred the evidence of the pursuer and her husband, and in doing so they were within their province, and I do not, for my part, see how upon such a question we can disturb their verdict.

It would no doubt be a different matter if we were prepared to affirm that, notwithstanding the exceptional situation, the railway company were under no obligation to give any special warning or take any special precaution, but were entitled to rely on the passengers appreciating the situation and looking out for themselves. Similarly, it might be different if we were prepared to affirm that the company were entitled to rely on the passengers keeping their seats for some period of time after the train drew up within the station and came to a standstill. But it does not seem to me to be possible to affirm either of these propositions generally or apart from circumstances. Neither am I able upon the evidence to say that the jury here were bound to find contributory negligence. What degree of vigilance shall be required of a railway passenger, how far such passenger is bound to be on the outlook against exceptional risks, or how far, on the other hand, it is reasonable for him to assume, in the absence of notice, that things continue to be as usual,—these are questions which, it rather appears to me, are and must be jury questions, and with respect to which no general rule can be safely or properly laid down. I adopt on this subject, and refer to, the opinion of your Lordship in the chair in the case of Potter, 11 Macph. 664, a case which in its main features seems somewhat similar to the present.

I have only to add that I say nothing to countenance the suggestion that this station as a whole was not sufficiently lighted; or that the defenders were in fault in running on the night in question a train too long for their platform. In my view, the fault which the jury were justified upon the evidence in affirming lay in the defenders' omission to give what they tried to prove they did give, viz., timeous notice to the passengers to keep their seats.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer in this case met with an accident at the Junction Road station of the Leith branch of the North British Railway on 15th September 1890. The day was a trades' holiday, and consequently the railway company had expected that more passengers than usual would be travelling. Accordingly the train was a long one, the two last carriages, when it came to a stand at the station, projecting beyond the level part of the platform to that part of it which sloped down towards the rails, and which perhaps was imperfectly lighted. So far, however, I cannot see that there was any fault on the part of the railway company. A railway company is not bound, in my opinion, to have their platforms of any special length to meet the wants of their trains on all occasions. So far, accordingly, I do not think that any blame attaches to the railway company.

On the other hand, I think that a passenger is not expected to alight from a train until it comes to the platform, although it may have been brought to a standstill sooner. At the same time, as was laid down by your Lordship in the chair in the case of Potter, I do not think that a passenger is bound to remain in the carriage for an indefinite length of time, with the risk of being carried on to the next station. It seems to me that if a railway company draws up a train at or near a station, thereby inducing the passengers to think that the time has come for them to get out, the company is bound, if it is intended that they shall not get out there, to give what Lord Kyllachy has called "timeous notice" to them to keep their seats until the train is moved forward.

The question in this case is whether the railway company did or did not give "timeous notice" to the occupants of the hindmost carriages of the train. That is a question of fact in the first instance, and unless there is no evidence to support the view adopted by the jury or the weight of evidence is against it, the question is one, I think, for the jury alone to decide. If I had been a juryman in the case I should probably not have concurred in the verdict, and should have come to the conclusion that the pursuer had left the train so precipitately that the railway company had no time to give her any notice. But the question of neglect to give notice is, as I have said, a question of fact for the jury, and the Court cannot disturb the verdict they have reached unless it can be affirmed that there was no evidence to go to the jury on the point. The Lord Ordinary who tried the case, and, I understand, your Lordship, are both of opinion that there was such evidence, and on that ground I agree with Lord Kyllachy that we ought to refuse the rule.

LORD M'LAREN.—There seems to be no doubt as to what are the obligations of a railway company in regard to the safety of passengers alighting from a train. There is certainly no obligation upon them to provide a platform of equal length to any train which may stop at the station. I would go further and say that a railway company is not bound to provide platforms at all,—there is no statutory obligation upon them to do so,—although platforms are in practice universally provided for the convenience of the travelling public. Now, if any part of a train projects beyond the end of the platform, after the train has been brought to rest, there is always a risk that the passengers who are not aware that they have not reached the platform may come to grief in alighting from the train. It has been decided that the risk thereby created imposes on the company the duty of giving warning to the passengers either to keep their seats until the train moves on to the platform, or to exercise care in alighting where they are.

In the present case it is admitted that the train had been stopped for the purpose of discharging passengers before the pursuer got out of the carriage, and there is no question here, such as sometimes arises, as to whether an invitation to alight had been given. Such a question can only arise in ambiguous circumstances, such as do not here exist. Accordingly it was the duty of the company to warn the passengers in the carriages which were outside the limits of the platform to keep their seats, but I cannot say that in order to discharge that duty the guard was at the risk of his life to leave his van while the train was travelling at a considerable speed as it approached the station. It must be remembered that with the present automatic brakes a train is able to run at a high speed almost to the point where it is brought to rest by the application of the brake, and I do not think that under these circumstances the guard can be expected to leave his van until the train has ceased to move. The passengers must allow him a reasonable time to leave his van and give the warning.

No. 159.

May 22, 1891.
Aitken v. North British Railway Co.

In such cases it may be a question of evidence whether the guard's warning was given in time, but I rather agree with Lord Adam that in the present case the pursuer has put herself out of Court, because upon her own evidence and that of her husband she only remained in the carriage a second after the train had stopped. Accordingly, there is no conflict between the parties and the railway guard on the question whether the pursuer waited to hear the guard's warning before getting out of the train.

If I had been considering this question as a juror, I should not have agreed with the result at which the jury arrived, but all such cases involve questions of credibility, and, especially where the presiding Judge has told us that he did not dissent from the verdict, I do not think it would be in accordance with our practice to disturb it. As there may be cases of a similar description, I only desire to say that I do not decide the case on any personal opinion that there was a failure of duty on the part of the railway guard.

Lord President.—In this case the verdict was a unanimous one, and it is approved by the presiding Judge. The question to be determined was a pure question of fact, and that being so, I think it would be contrary to all our practice to disturb it. When I say that the question was one purely of fact, I mean that it depended upon evidence which was to a certain extent not reconcileable, and was indeed conflicting. The female pursuer and her husband are distinct in saying that no warning was given until the former had left the carriage, and that the train was then at a standstill. On the other hand, the guard says that he stepped out when the train had barely stopped and called to the passengers to keep their seats. The carriage in which the pursuers were travelling immediately adjoined the guard's van, and accordingly it might very well be contended that if the evidence of the guard was to be relied upon the pursuers must have heard his warning before the female pursuer descended from the train. This raises a question of credibility, as there is thus a conflict of evidence. In these circumstances, I agree with Lord Kyllachy that this is not a case in which we ought to disturb the verdict.

Lord Kinnear was absent.

The Court discharged the rule.

Andrew Wallace, S.S.C.—Millar, Robson, & Innes, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 160.

May 23, 1891.

Wright's Trustees v. M'Laren.

JOHN BROWN ÆMILIUS WRIGHT AND OTHERS (Wright's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Rhind—Hay.
ROBERT M'LAREN, Defender (Reclaimer).—C. J. Guthrie—Guy.

Right in security—Transmission of personal obligation against singular successor—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 47.—The 47th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 provides that "an heritable security for money duly constituted upon an estate in land shall, together with any personal obligation to pay principal, interest, and penalty, contained in the deed or instrument whereby the security is constituted, transmit against any person taking such estate by succession, gift, or bequest, or by conveyance, when an agreement to that effect appears in gremio of the conveyance, and shall be a burden upon his title in the same manner as it was upon that of his ancestor or author, without the necessity of a bond of corroboration, or other deed or procedure."

A disposition of heritage, which was burdened under a bond and disposition in security, contained a clause exempting the bond from the warrandice, and also this clause,—Which sum of £800 it has been agreed is to remain on the security of the said subjects and others as aforesaid, and the said disponee is to take upon himself the obligation to repay the same; and it is further agreed that the disponee, by acceptance hereof, declares and agrees that the personal obligation to pay principal and interest and penalty contained in said bond and disposition in security shall be a burden upon his title in the same manner as it was on that of the disponer, without the necessity of a bond of corroboration or other deed or procedure, and the personal obligation may be enforced against the disponee by summary diligence and otherwise, in the same manner as against the disponer. The disposition was recorded on behalf of the disponee.

Held (1) that this was an agreement in the sense of the 47th section of the statute; and (2) that it was not necessary to its validity that the creditor in the bond should be a party to it.

Carrick, &c. v. Rodger, Watt, & Paul, Dec. 3, 1881, 9 R. 243, distinguished and questioned.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. J.

WILLIAM M'LAREN, heritable proprietor of certain subjects in the Cowgate of Edinburgh, granted a bond and disposition in security over them for £800 in favour of the North British Property Investment Company.

Wright's trustees acquired the creditor's right in the bond, and William M'Laren sold the subjects to Robert M'Laren.

His disposition contained in gremio a clause excepting from the warrandice the bond and disposition in security for £800, and a statement that it had been acquired by Wright's trustees. The disposition proceeded,—"Which sum of £800 it has been agreed is to remain on the security of the said subjects and others as aforesaid, and the said Robert M'Laren is to take upon himself the obligation to repay the same; and it is further agreed, as the said Robert M'Laren by acceptance hereof declares and agrees, that the personal obligation to pay principal and interest and penalty contained in said bond and disposition in security shall be a burden upon his title in the same manner as it was on that of me, without the necessity of a bond of corroboration or other deed or procedure, and the personal obligation may be enforced against him by summary diligence or otherwise, in the same manner as against me." The said disposition was recorded on behalf of Robert M'Laren.

The creditors found it necessary to raise an action of maills and duties, in which they called the tenants and Robert M'Laren, concluding against the former for their rents, and against the latter for expenses.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers, as trustees aforesaid, in respect of the aforesaid bond and disposition in security duly recorded, whereof they are now in right, are entitled to decree of maills and duties as concluded for, with expenses. (2) The defender, Robert M'Laren, having rendered himself personally liable for the sums contained in and due by the said bond and disposition in security, and being the feudal proprietor of the heritable subjects over which the said bond and disposition was granted, the pursuers are entitled to decree against him as concluded for, with expenses.

No. 160.

May 23, 1891. Wright's Trustees v. M'Laren.

M'Laren alone lodged defences, but offered to let decree go out unopposed, provided he were not found personally liable in expenses.

He pleaded;—(4) The defender, the said Robert M'Laren, not having rendered himself personally liable for the sums contained in and due by the said bond and disposition in security, and he not being liable therefor, decree of absolvitor should be granted in his favour, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) decerned against M'Laren in terms of the conclusion of the summons.

The defender, M'Laren, reclaimed, and argued;—(First) The import of the obligation undertaken was an obligation to relieve, and hence could not found a direct action. It fell under the principle of Carrick's case.[1] (Second) The intervention of the creditor was necessary to a good transmission of the personal obligation. Under the old law he had to accept the bond of corroboration, and the object of the new law was to obviate the multiplication of deeds, not to introduce new principles.[2]

Argued for the pursuers;—(First) If this clause did not constitute an agreement under the statute, could human ingenuity devise one? (Second) The intervention of the creditor was not required in cases of "succession, gift, or bequest." Why require it in the case of a singular successor? It was all the less necessary that the original debtor was not liberated by the introduction of the new obligant.[3]

At advising, the opinion of the Court (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER), was delivered by LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether the defender is personally liable to the pursuers for the sum contained in the heritable security. The answer depends first on the construction which is to be put on the 47th section of the Act of 1874, and secondly, on the terms of the disposition which the defender has obtained to the subjects over which the security has been created.

On the first point, the contention of the defender is that there can be no transmission of the personal obligation to a disponee unless the heritable creditor is a party to the agreement by which the disponee undertakes to become personally liable for the debt. Before considering the statute, I may observe that under the former law the personal obligation would not transmit against the disponee by the mere force of the disposition. If it was intended that he should become liable for the debt, the proper form was that he should grant a bond of corroboration. The effect of such a bond was not to discharge the original debtor, but to give the creditor in the security the further obligation of the granter of the bond. The creditor did not intervene. He merely accepted the bond of corroboration, if he desired to be vested in the obligation of the granter.

The purpose of the statute was to provide a less cumbrous form for the transmission of the personal obligation. It deals with two cases—the disposition of the lands charged with the debt—first, on a lucrative title, succession, gift, or bequest, and second, on an onerous title.

[1] Carrick, &c. v. Rodger, Watt, & Paul, &c., Dec. 3, 1881, 9 R. 243.
[2] See Lord Young's opinion on p. 246 of Carrick's case.
[3] University of Glasgow v. Yuill's Trustees, Feb. 10, 1882, 9 R. 643.

No. 160.

May 23, 1891. Wright's Trustees v. M'Laren.

In the first case, it is declared that the heritable security, together with the personal obligation, shall transmit against the disponee without the necessity of any bond of corroboration or other procedure. It is obvious that in this case the intervention of the creditor is not required. He becomes the creditor of the disponee by the mere force of the statute. There seems no reason why a different rule should prevail when the title is onerous, though a mere disposition may not in that case be sufficient to transmit the obligation.

In the case of a disposition on an onerous title, the personal obligation does not transmit, unless "an agreement to that effect appears in gremio of the conveyance." It is maintained that this means an agreement between the heritable creditor and the disponee. But while it is difficult to see why the creditor must intervene in the one case and not in the other, the necessity for the agreement is obvious.

When the disposition proceeds as on a lucrative title, the disponee takes the subject cum onere. There is no need for any declaration on his part that he is willing to become personally liable for the debt. His assent is implied as the legal inference from such a title. Consequently the statute declares that the personal obligation shall transmit against him. In the case of an onerous title, there is no room for any such implication. It is necessary that the disponee shall agree to be bound, or in other words, that he shall signify his assent to that effect. Without such assent, it would be manifestly unjust to bind him to pay the debt of the disponer. But when it is given, the two cases become identical.

I am therefore of opinion that it is not necessary that the creditor shall be a party to this agreement.

It was further contended that the defender did not undertake to pay the debt, but that he merely became liable in an obligation of relief. I am of opinion that this contention is not well founded. The disposition bears that the defender "is to take on himself the obligation to repay" the debt charged on the lands, and that "the personal obligation shall be enforced against him by summary diligence." These words can have but one construction. They signify in the plainest terms the agreement or assent of the defender to be bound in the personal obligation, and he is consequently by force of the statute in the same position as if he had granted a bond of corroboration.

The case of Carrick was cited to us. In that case there was a great difference of judicial opinion. But in forming the opinion that our judgment should be in favour of the pursuers, I do not think that I am doing violence to it. In that case the obligation undertaken by the disponee was one of relief only, and consequently it was said that there was no assent on his part to come under a direct obligation to the creditor in the security. For the obligation of relief is an obligation to the debtor, and not to the creditor. At the same time, I think it right to say that, in my opinion, the case deserves to be reconsidered.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN CLARK JUNNER, W.S.—REID & GUILD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 161.

May 26, 1891. International Exhibition, 1890, v. Bapty.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION ASSOCIATION OF ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING AND INVENTION, 1890, AND LIQUIDATOR THEREOF, Pursuers (Respondents).—Murray—A. S. D. Thomson.

SAMUEL LEE BAPTY, Defender (Reclaimer).—Strachan—Hay.

Jurisdiction—Citation—Meditatio Fugæ.—A domiciled Englishman resided in Scotland for six months for the purpose of managing an Exhibition for an association in Scotland. He became bound by a guarantee to contribute, if called upon, a certain sum to the funds of the exhibition, when it should come to be wound up at its close. After it had closed, and the association had gone into liquidation, and when he was about to return to England, he was apprehended as in meditatione fugæ at the instance of the liquidator as creditor under the guarantee, but was liberated on finding caution to answer any action to be brought against him for payment of the guarantee within a certain period, on being cited at the Sheriff-clerk's office, Edinburgh.

No. 161.

May 26, 1891.

International Exhibition, 1890, v. Bapty.

In an action for payment of the guarantee, which was served at the house at which he had resided during his residence in Scotland within forty days of his leaving it, and also at the place of citation assigned, under the bond of caution granted by him, he pleaded no jurisdiction, and stated that he was proceeding to reduce the meditatione fugæ proceedings as illegal.

Held that the action being one to enforce a ground of action arising in Scotland, and the defender having (whether the meditatione fugæ proceedings were regular or not) undertaken to answer the action in the Scottish Court, on being cited at the place fixed in the bond, and the defender having been so cited, the plea must be repelled.

Question, whether jurisdiction, which has been acquired over a foreigner by forty days' residence in Scotland, endures for forty days after he has left Scotland.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Stormonth Darling. M.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION ASSOCIATION OF ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING AND INVENTION was incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1886 for the purpose, inter alia, of carrying on an exhibition near Edinburgh in the summer of 1890.

The Exhibition was carried on from May to the end of October, and was closed on 1st November 1890.

The association went into liquidation on 5th November 1890, and on 21st November the liquidator raised an action against Samuel Lee Bapty designed as "lately general manager of the said association, residing at the said association's buildings, and whose domicile of citation is the Sheriff-clerk's office, George IV. Bridge, Edinburgh," for payment of £500 as the amount which the defender had subscribed to the guarantee fund of the association.

The summons was served both at the Sheriff-clerk's office and at the house the defender had occupied at the Exhibition buildings.

The pursuers stated;—(Cond. 8) "The defender was apprehended on a fugæ warrant, obtained on petition of the pursuers, . . . and having been taken before the Sheriff-substitute he was liberated on a bond being granted by the defender and Alexander Mackenzie Ross, . . . dated 8th November 1890. By this bond the said Alexander Mackenzie Ross judicially enacted, bound, and obliged himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, as cautioner and surety, acted in the Sheriff Court Books of Edinburghshire for the said defender, de judicio sisti in any action for payment of the debt now sued for to be brought against him at the pursuers' instance in any competent Court, within three months from the date of said bond. And further, by the said bond the said Alexander Mackenzie Ross and the defender assigned the Sheriff-clerk's office, Edinburgh, as a domicile, at which any citation or intimation might be left in connection with the said bond. With reference to the statement of facts for defender, it is averred that the defender had a domicile in Scotland, and resided during the six months which the Exhibition lasted within the association's buildings, near Edinburgh. The summons was served upon him both at the Sheriff-clerk's office and at his said residence at the Exhibition, and that within forty days of his leaving Scotland."

The defender stated;—(Stat. 1) "The defender is domiciled in England, and in the beginning of 1890 he was employed by the said association to act as their general manager. He merely came to Scotland for the purpose of performing the duties of that office, and his avowed intention was to leave Scotland when the said association was closed. Accordingly, when the Exhibition was closed on 1st November 1890, he proceeded to make arrangements to leave Scotland, and he did so upon 8th November 1890. The defender had no domicile in Scotland. He, while acting as said general manager, resided within the buildings of the said association." (Stat. 2) "The defender was, upon 8th November 1890, illegally and unwarrantably apprehended as in meditatione fugæ, and, without an opportunity of obtaining legal assistance, he entered into the bond referred to. The said bond is null and void, as the said apprehension was illegal. The defender is presently in communication with the pursuers as to the effect of the warrant for his apprehension, and he is in course of taking proceedings to have the said warrant set aside as being illegal. The summons in the present action has been served upon the defender at the Sheriff-clerk's office, Edinburgh, being the place of citation assigned in the said bond. Further, it has been served at the Exhibition premises, but such attempted service is illegal and inept in respect that the said premises were in the possession of the pursuers, and that the defender, after leaving them, had no domicile there."

No. 161.

May 26, 1891. International Exhibition, 1890, v. Bapty.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction.

On 7th February 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) repelled the defender's first plea in law.*

---

* "OPINION.—It is admitted that the defender, who is an Englishman, resided for six months or thereby within the Exhibition buildings in Edinburgh, that he left Edinburgh on 8th November 1890, and that the summons in the present action was served upon him at his residence in the Exhibition on the 21st day of the same month. In these circumstances he pleads no jurisdiction. I am of opinion that the plea is bad.

"It was not disputed by the defender's counsel that residence in Scotland for forty days is sufficient to found jurisdiction, but he contended vigorously that there is no warrant for holding that the jurisdiction so constituted endures for forty days after the actual termination of the residence. Mr Mackay, in his book on Practice, states the rule thus:—'The Court has also jurisdiction over persons who have resided in Scotland for forty days prior to the action, or who, having resided during that period, have not since been absent for forty days.' He cites as his authority for this statement the case of Calder v. Wood, 1798, M. 2250, which does not, according to the defender's counsel, bear out the latter part of the statement. What the case of Calder decided was that the Court had jurisdiction over a man who had resided for the requisite time in Glasgow, and on whom service had been made by leaving a citation at his lodging there two or three days after he had quitted it, and was on his way to England. This at all events recognises that the jurisdiction survives the actual termination of the residence. But the rule does not rest merely on the authority of Calder's case. I should be slow to believe that on an important point of practice the principal writers on the subject had concurred in misstating the law, for Mr Dove Wilson (Sheriff Court Practice, pp. 72-3), and Professor Rankine (in his edition of Erskine's Principles, 1, 2, 9), stated the law exactly as Mr Mackay does. This rule is customary, and for customary rules it is sometimes difficult to cite decisions. There is, however, a very distinct recognition of it in the opinion of the Lord President (then L. J.-C.) in the case of Joel v. Gill, 21 D., at p. 939 of the report.

"The Judicature Act (6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 53), provides that 'where a person not having a dwelling-house in Scotland occupied by his family or servants shall have left his usual place of residence, and have been therefrom absent during the space of forty days without having left notice where he is to be found within Scotland, he shall be held to be absent from Scotland, and be charged or cited according to the forms herein prescribed accordingly,' i.e., by

No. 161.

May 26, 1891. International Exhibition, 1890, v. Bapty.

By interlocutor of 18th March 1891 his Lordship also repelled the defender's remaining pleas in law, and decerned against him in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The jurisdiction founded on the temporary residence of a domiciled foreigner terminated with the cessation of that residence. The Lord Ordinary thought that it survived it, and referred to Calder v. Wood.[1] But the fuller report in the Faculty Collection[2] did not bear out that view of the case. The citation was good, but that did not give jurisdiction.[3] In Joel v. Gill[4] there was no question as to citation, and the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) was not directed to the founding of jurisdiction. What the case settled was, that if an Englishman came to Scotland and resided for forty days he was subject to the jurisdiction so long as he remained in Scotland thereafter. The arrestment under the fugæ warrant was illegal,[5] and therefore the agreement obtained under it was not valid.

The pursuers' counsel were not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it necessary to call for any answer here. I am myself of opinion that the ground of action in the case arose in Scotland. It is a letter of guarantee by the manager of an exhibition established in Scotland granted with a view to its existence, and to its being carried on for a considerable period, against any loss consequent upon it. The obligant, the defender in the action, was appointed manager with an agreed-on remuneration, and he granted this obligation. The Exhibition did not result in profit, but in loss, and accordingly the guarantors were called upon under their obligations of guarantee to make it good. This action is therefore to enforce a ground of action arising in Scotland, and I think the Scottish Court had jurisdiction against the obligant in the obligation, provided he was well cited to appear before the Scottish Court. Now, it appears on the face of the record that after the Exhibition was closed the defender proceeded to depart, and in such a way as to induce—I do not say whether they ought to have been induced or not—those having claims upon him, including the present pursuers, to seize hold of him as in the act of flight edictal citation. This provision does not directly enact how such a person is to be cited during the interval of forty days, but it very plainly implies that he is not to be held to have left Scotland till the end of that period, and consequently that citation at his former residence would be good. A direct enactment to that effect is to be found in the A. S., 14th December 1805 (quoted in Lord Ivory's note to Ersk. Inst. i, 2, 16). There is some doubt whether that Act did not expire with the statute to which it related, but Lord Ivory quotes (apparently with approval) Mr More's opinion to the effect that it might be considered as a declaration of the common law upon the subject. When read along with the Judicature Act it seems to put the matter on the intelligible footing that for a certain short time after the termination of actual residence of the required duration, a man shall be presumed to be still within Scotland, and if so, he is still in the eye of the law just as liable to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Court as when he was physically within the kingdom. It may be said that the rule is arbitrary, but so are all fixed periods and presumptions, and in such matters it is better that the law should be arbitrary than that it should be uncertain. At all events, I think the rule is well established by custom."

---

[1] M. 2250.

[2] Jan. 19, 1798, F. C.

[3] Johnston v. Strachan (Lord Kinloch's opinion), March 19, 1861, 23 D. 758, 33 Scot. Jur. 387; Brown v. Blaikie, Feb. 1, 1849, 11 D. 474, 21 Scot. Jur. 135.

[4] Joel v. Gill, June 10, 1859, 21 D. 929, 31 Scot. Jur. 511.

[5] Hart v. Anderson's Trustees, Nov. 28, 1890, 18 R. 169.

No. 161.

May 26, 1891.
International Exhibition, 1890, v. Bapty.

We are told that there are objections to their proceedings in seizing him and apprehending him as in the act of flight or meditating flight, but of course I do not enter upon that matter at all, but only refer to the fact that he was seized upon the allegation that he was meditating flight from the country. Of course the object of such apprehension is only that he may answer for his liabilities in the Courts of the country from which he is meditating flight. And when he is so seized, regularly or irregularly, he enters into a covenant with his adversary who seized him, and says,—"Let me go, and I will find caution to answer in a Scottish Court to any action which may be brought against me, and a summons may be served in the Sheriff-clerk's office, which I fix upon as my domicile of citation." Upon that condition he is let go, and this action, the summons of which is served at the domicile of citation then agreed upon, is the condition of his being left at liberty to depart. Now, joining these two things together, I think the defender was here well cited in the action raised upon a Scotch ground of action,—that is, a ground of action arising in Scotland,—and that he must answer accordingly, and I do not think his liability to answer in a Scotch Court depends at all upon the result of any proceedings by him to recover damages in respect of any irregularity in his apprehension.

If he had been apprehended here, however irregularly and so as to render the party liable in damages, and if a summons in an action upon a Scotch ground of action arising in Scotland had been then put into his hands, I do not think he would have been permitted just to throw it away, and say,—"You ought not to have stopped me on the street so as to put that into my hands." I think he is in the position of having the summons in an action upon a ground arising in Scotland put into his hands, and that his liability to answer for it will not depend upon whether he was regularly or irregularly stopped on the streets and ordered to take it. And so in respect of the jurisdiction of the Court in such an action, I do not think he can object to it upon the ground that he may be possibly successful in shewing that there were irregularities in connection with his apprehension upon which he granted the bond. I think that is sufficient for the judgment, and I would rather abstain from expressing any definite opinion upon the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded, although it is not to be understood that I dissent from it or express any opinion adverse to it. It is this, that the only jurisdiction here is that which is acquired by forty days' residence in the country, and that a jurisdiction acquired over any person resident for forty days in a country endures for forty days after he has left it. There are certain authorities, or at least dicta, upon that question. I do not say they are all on one side, but I should rather abstain from putting my judgment in this case upon an opinion on that question, in respect there exists another ground which to my mind is satisfactory. I would refuse the reclaiming note and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, but, so far as my opinion goes, upon the ground I have expressed, and without entering upon or expressing any opinion for or against the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD LOW concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the defender in his reclaiming note against Lord Stormonth Darling's interlocutor of 18th March 1891, refuse the reclaiming note and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against," &c.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—WM. OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 162.

May 27, 1891.
Trotter v. Torrance.

HENRY TROTTER, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Balfour—C. K. Mackenzie.
ARCHIBALD PETER TORRANCE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Asher—Dundas.

Lease—Power of resumption—Construction—Land and buildings.—In 1867 a landlord let to a tenant for nineteen years the farm of G., "with the cothouses and smithy at B." A small portion of the farm, including B., lay to the east of a certain public road. The lease reserved power to the landlord "to resume and take off such parts of the lands hereby let on the east side of" the road as he should think proper, on giving to the tenant certain notice, and allowing him "for the ground so taken off a deduction from the rent at the rate of £6 per acre, besides the value of the unexhausted manure on such land." Upon this detached portion of the farm there were at the date of the lease certain cothouses and a smithy, and soon thereafter the tenant, with the landlord's consent, converted the smithy into a byre, and the landlord built another byre beside the cothouse. Thereafter the tenant sublet the buildings for a dairy. In 1884 the parties agreed to continue the lease, which was about to expire in 1886, upon substantially the same terms. The landlord in 1889 gave notice that he intended to resume the fields to the east of the road in terms of the clause of resumption, and the tenant, while willing to remove from the fields, declined to remove from the buildings. Held that the tenant was bound to remove both from the fields and from the buildings.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney. M.

IN October 1890 Colonel Trotter, of Mortonhall, proprietor of the farm of Greenbank, raised this action against Archibald Peter Torrance, the tenant, for declarator that the defender was bound to remove at Martinmas 1890 from a certain portion of the farm, and from the "whole buildings and erections" thereon.

The following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—"By lease, dated in 1866, the late Richard Trotter, of Mortonhall, let to the defender the farm of Greenbank, 'with the houses thereupon and pertinents thereof, together with two cothouses and smithy at Braidburn, as these were then possessed by the defender, who had succeeded his father in a prior lease. The rent was £491,—£91 above the previous rent,—and apparently was at the rate of from £3 to £3, 10s. per acre. The term of entry was in 1867, and the lease would in ordinary course expire in 1886. The farm lies at a very short distance from the municipal boundary of the city of Edinburgh.

"The lease contained a clause of resumption as follows:—'Reserving full power to the said Richard Trotter and his successors, at any term of Martinmas during this lease, to resume and take off such parts of the lands hereby let on the east side of the road leading from Edinburgh to Linton as they shall think proper, on giving to the said Archibald Peter Torrance and his foresaids twelve months' previous notice of their intention to do so, and allowing them for the ground so taken off a deduction from the rent at the rate of £6 per acre, besides the value of the unexhausted manure on such land, as the same shall be fixed by arbitration as after mentioned.'

"The farm-steading and much the greater part of the farm lie on the west side of the road to Linton. A comparatively small portion, extending to nearly 30 acres, lies on the east side, and consists chiefly of a narrow stripe between two public roads, as shewn on the plan No. 6 of process. The 'two cothouses and smithy at Braidburn' are on this portion of the farm which the landlord takes power to resume.

"There is another clause in the lease empowering the landlord to resume 4 acres of land from any part of the farm, for planting or any other purpose, allowing an abatement from the rent of £4, 10s. per acre.

No. 162.
May 27, 1891.
Trotter v. Torrance.

"The lease contains stipulations of some importance with regard to the buildings on the farm. It bears that the landlord agrees to expend a sum not exceeding £350 for 'the purpose of erecting three new cattle-sheds, turnip-house, implement-house, smith-shop, and byre,' and of improving existing buildings. The tenant binds himself to keep up the whole of the buildings in good repair, and leave them so at the end of the lease, except two thatched cottages, which he was not to be bound to rebuild. The lease contains a provision for the insurance of the buildings by the tenant.

"These are all the clauses of the lease which appear material to the present question.

"There was no dairy on the farm when the lease was executed, and it contains no allusion to a dairy. The tenant has deponed that he had the dairy in contemplation when he offered an increase of £91 on the rent. But he does not say that he communicated this idea to the landlord. He depones that immediately after the execution of the lease he set on foot a dairy at Braidburn, and in a year or two afterwards a second dairy at his farm-steading.

"From a letter dated 26th February 1867 it appears that about that date, and therefore before the commencement of his lease, the defender, with the landlord's sanction, converted the smithy at Braidburn into a byre. About the same time, or shortly afterwards, the landlord built a second byre alongside of the cothouses. The defender depones that this was the byre mentioned in the lease as one of the buildings on which the landlord was to expend £350. There is only the tenant's word for that, and no documentary evidence, but there is no contrary evidence. Farther, in or about 1871 the tenant erected a third byre alongside of the second byre, with the sanction of the landlord, and on the understanding that he should have liberty to remove it at the close of the lease, or that the landlord should then take it off his hands at a valuation.

"The dairy buildings now at Braidburn consist of these three byres and the two cothouses. . . .

"The defender considers that he derives a great advantage in the working of his farm from the close proximity of these two dairies. They are sublet, and ever since they were established the dairymen have bought the defender's turnips and fodder, and have sold him the manure made on the dairies. He, besides, receives a considerable rent for the buildings.

"The pursuer succeeded to the estate in 1874. In 1884, two years before the expiry of the lease, proposals for a new lease were interchanged between the defender and Mr Mackenzie, then the pursuer's land-steward, now his factor, and on 3d May 1884 the defender offered a rise of £30 on the former rent; and by a letter dated 3d July 1884 Mr Mackenzie, with the pursuer's authority and on his behalf, accepted the offer 'for the farm of Greenbank, as presently possessed by you, and that for nineteen years from Martinmas 1884'; and in a letter dated 8th September Mr Mackenzie, after referring to various details, writes,—'As the new lease is on the terms of the old or current lease, except in so far as altered in writing, the position as to the engine and boiler remains unchanged.'

"Various letters followed, in which there are references to the clause of resumption, but they relate only to the rate per acre, and throw no light on this question.

"Various matters remained unadjusted,—it does not appear clearly why,—and the new lease has never been executed; indeed, it seems never to have been drafted, but the defender continued to possess and cultivate the farm."

In 1889 Colonel Trotter, the pursuer, entered into an agreement to sell

No. 162.
May 27, 1891.
Trotter v. Torrance.

two small fields to the east of the road to Linton, and gave notice to the defender that he intended to resume them at Martinmas 1890.

The defender had no objection to cede possession of the fields, upon one of which the dairy called Braidburn Dairy stood, or the garden behind the dairy, but he declined to remove from buildings thereon, being the byre which he had erected in place of the smithy, the cothouse, and the byre which had been erected with part of the money provided by the landlord.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The pursuer being entitled, under the terms of the contract between him and the defender, to resume the two fields referred to, is entitled also and at same time to resume the buildings which are situated on part of one of these fields.

The defender pleaded;—(4) In respect that the landlord's right under the lease to resume is limited to the resumption of lands only, the pursuers are not entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, so far as they conclude for removal from the buildings in question. (5) In respect that the buildings which the pursuer now seeks to resume are necessary for the proper cultivation and management of the farm, the pursuers are not entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

A proof was led. The defender led evidence to shew that owing to the nature of the farm and its situation the dairies thereon were of great value to him.

On 4th February the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) found the pursuer entitled to resume the fields, "including those portions thereof on which the buildings known as Braidburn Dairy were built, and that on the terms and conditions specified in the clause of resumption" in the lease, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons, "reserving to the defender his right of compensation in terms of said clause, and also all claims competent to him for payment of the value of the byre erected by him at Braidburn Dairy."*

* "OPINION.— . . . (After the narrative of the facts)—I take it to be clear that the pursuer cannot succeed in this action except in virtue of a power of resumption which he is in titulo to plead. But there is no existing clause of resumption except that in the old lease of 1866, and therefore this action must be rested on a concession of the defender's right to possess the farm, either by tacit relocation under the conditions of the lease of 1866, or by virtue of a new agreement constituted by the correspondence and the defender's consequent possession. The defender maintains that he is possessing under a new lease for nineteen years, binding on both parties. But in either view the present question must depend in the first instance on the true construction and effect of the clause of resumption in the former lease.

"Now it appears to me that if one seeks to construe the clause of resumption by itself, it will bear either of the meanings put on it by the parties. The pursuer maintains that the word land may include buildings, and certainly may include land covered with buildings, and that it must be read as including such land, because it is not excepted. The defender maintains that the word land, especially when used in connection with the word ground, primarily means land only and excludes buildings; and that it is reasonable to expect that buildings would have been specially mentioned if it had been intended to include them. It is difficult to choose, as a bare question of construction, between these two perfectly legitimate constructions. It is therefore important to consider the subject to which the clause relates, and the object of the clause. And, in the first place, it is to be observed that the power to resume is unusually great in a lease. It is a power to resume nearly 30 acres out of a total under 150 acres; and it is a power to resume the whole of a distinct section of the farm, separated from the rest of it by a public road. Having in view the proximity of the farm

No. 162.

May 27, 1891.

Trotter v. Torrance.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Clauses as to resumption were always read favourably to the tenant. Lands on which buildings were to Edinburgh, the extent, compactness, and situation of the land to be resumed, I find it impossible to doubt that one of the objects which the landlord had in view was the feuing of this portion of the farm. Perhaps that was not the only thing which he had in view. But it must have been one object. He could not have contemplated resumption of the land under conditions which would negative feuing. No other reason for the reservation of this unusually extensive power to resume has been suggested. It has not been suggested that the landlord had any wish to add this section of the farm to any other farm. Now, certainly, if this section of the farm were to be given off in feus, the very first thing to be done would be to clear away the cothouses. I have been unable to imagine any purpose to which the landlord could put this section of his farm after resuming it, consistently with leaving the tenants in possession of the cothouses. Hence it appears to me that he must have understood that the power to resume the land included power to take the land on which the cothouses stood. And for similar reasons it appears to me that the tenant must have understood the clause of resumption in the same sense. He could not but have recognised that the landlord could not resume this considerable portion of the farm to any useful purpose, if he should leave it encumbered with the cothouses in the tenant's possession. These considerations lead to the conclusion that the clause of resumption ought to be read as including the buildings, in accordance with the pursuer's contention. I speak only of the intention and meaning of the parties when they executed the lease, and not of the pursuer's purpose in now resuming a part of the resumable land. That has not been disclosed, and is not of importance.

"The defender disputed this conclusion on various grounds, some of which seem of considerable weight. He contended that the clause could not apply to the cothouses and smithy, because they were let as a separate and distinct subject; and on the assumption that they were, he referred to the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Smith and Nimmo, 5th June 1877, 14 S. L. R., 510. That case seems to me to be quite special and inapplicable. I am unable to hold that the cothouses and smithy are treated in the lease as subjects separate from the rest of the farm. I think they are included in it, and are expressed as forming part of it, especially seeing that they were a part of the subjects of which the defender had been in possession under the previous lease. . . .

"Farther, it was maintained that the houses were necessary for the due working of the farm in the ordinary course. I think it impossible to maintain this, looking to the extent to which the farm buildings at the steading are at present sublet, and to what I think is the fact, that these cothouses were never really used by the defender at all in the management of his farm. It is not proved that these cothouses would have been of any use in the ordinary occupation of the farm had no dairies been established, a circumstance which may account for the fact that no special mention is made of them in the clause of resumption.

"It occurred to me in the course of the argument that a point might be made for the defender on the clause by which the landlord agreed to expend £350 on certain buildings, and in particular on a byre. If it could have been shewn that the landlord contracted to build this byre at Braidburn, as the defender says he did build it, there would be a difficulty in holding that he meant to reserve power to remove it at his pleasure. I do not, however, think it proved that the landlord did so contract, and in any case I do not think that this difficulty would outweigh the reasons which induce me to hold that the parties intended that the clause of resumption should include the buildings.

"It was argued that the circumstance that the landlord built the one byre at Braidburn and sanctioned the defender's construction of the other shewed that it was not intended that the buildings at Braidburn should be subject to the landlord's power of resumption, and also imposed a personal bar on the landlord using his power in order to remove these buildings. I think, however, that

No. 162.

May 27, 1891.
Trotter v. Torrance.

erected were appropriated to a special purpose. The clause of resumption in the lease was not applicable to land on which there were buildings, as the words at the end of the clause, "besides the value of the unexhausted manure on such land," shewed that it referred only to agricultural land. Where the clause said "lands," "buildings" should not be read.[1] The dairy was most important to the working of the farm. For twenty years the tenant had worked and spent money on it with the knowledge and consent of the landlord. The landlord himself had built a byre on the lands with part of the £350 he agreed in the lease to expend. That being so, he had waived his right to resume the buildings, if such right ever existed. The clause of resumption in the old lease must be read as modified by the state of the buildings at the renewal of the lease in 1884.

Argued for the pursuer;—If the clause of resumption was read in accordance with the fair rules of construction, it entitled the landlord to resume the buildings.[2] A lease must be construed according to the plain object of the words. There was no other reasonable purpose for which the clause was inserted in the lease, except to provide for feuing. This case was distinguished from Caledonian Railway Co. v. Smith & Nimmo. In that case the lime-works were the subject of the lease, and the resumption would have stopped the works. In the present case the subject of the lease was a farm, to be occupied as an ordinary arable farm; a dairy business had never been contemplated in the lease, and the land to be resumed was separated from the greater portion of the farm. The landlord had never waived his right to resume. Any privileges he had granted to the tenant were gratuitous, and the latter during the nineteen years of the lease had been fully recouped for any expenditure he had laid out on the farm.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—In this case I cannot say that my views have not fluctuated. I do not think the case is unattended with difficulty. I have given to the argument on both sides the most careful attention, especially with the view of avoiding doing anything harsh to the tenant. He has been tenant in this farm for over twenty years, and seems to have conducted himself to the landlord's satisfaction. The landlord also would appear, as I gather from the correspondence, to have behaved throughout with great consideration and even generosity towards the tenant.

But what we have to determine is the true meaning and operation in the circumstances of the case of a clause in the contract of lease. This clause these acts of the landlord shew little more than that he was willing that the tenant should make the most beneficial use of the whole of his farm so long as he possessed it, and they cannot be held to import on the part of the landlord either an admission that his power of resumption did not extend to buildings, or an obligation not to exercise it. Whether the landlord is bound to pay for the byre at Braidburn put up by the tenant is a question which does not seem to arise in the present action. The defender has worked his farm so long in conjunction with this dairy that I do not wonder at his reluctance to give it up, and if I could have found any sound ground on which his defence could be maintained, I should readily have given effect to it. The case seems a somewhat hard one in this sense, that the compensation contracted for will, I think, leave him a loser. At the same time, if the view which I have taken be correct, he will only lose an advantage for which he never bargained."

---

[1] Caledonian Railway Co. v. Smith & Nimmo, June 5, 1877, 14 S. L. R. 510.

[2] Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 215 (4th edn.); Stewart v. Lead, March 25, 1825, 1 W. and S. 68.

relates to a power reserved by the landlord to himself and his successors "at any term of Martinmas during this lease to resume and take off such parts of the lands hereby let on the east side of the road leading from Edinburgh to Linton as they shall think proper, on giving to the said Archibald Peter Torrance and his foresaids twelve months' previous notice of their intention to do so, and allowing them for the ground so taken off a deduction from the rent at the rate of £6 per acre, besides the value of the unexhausted manure on such land, as the same shall be fixed by arbitration as after mentioned."

This clause is contained in a formal lease. It terminated in 1886. The parties, however, are agreed that it has been renewed since its expiration by arrangement standing on a correspondence, and the parties still continue landlord and tenant on terms which have never been finally adjusted, but which are substantially the same as those contained in the lease, a clause from which I have just read.

That clause, which applies to the existing contract under which the tenant is now in possession, relates to an outlying field at the extremity of the farm and adjoining the burgh of Edinburgh as now extended. It is plain on the face of the correspondence and the whole matter that the purpose of the insertion of this clause in the lease was that the landlord contemplated (and of course the tenant did so also) the possibility and probability of this part of the land being feued, or sold for other than agricultural purposes. The land upon the east side of the public road amounted to about thirty acres, and of this land the landlord in the lease reserved power to take off such part as he thought proper upon the terms specified.

Now, that was in 1867, when the lease was executed. At that time there were some buildings in the field in question, but I may make the observation in passing that these are not of a character to hinder the Court from reading the clause as applicable to the whole of these fields. These buildings were not costly, rather they were trifling and not of considerable value.

But we are told that a portion of a certain sum which the landlord bound himself in the lease to expend on buildings was expended on the erection of a dairy building on these lands. No one can tell exactly what the value of it was. We have only the tenant's statement, and there is no contradictory evidence. It was also pointed out to us that the tenant was allowed to put up a byre on condition that he should have liberty to remove it at the end of his lease, or that the landlord should then take it off his hands at a valuation. He was allowed to put it on the field to which the clause of reservation applies. There is a great deal to be said for the view that the tenant took the risk of the landlord's resuming this part of the farm under the clause of reservation. And any anxiety about hardship being occasioned to the tenant by such a course is out of the question in the present case, because the tenant has for twenty years had possession and use of the byre which he erected. It appears that he used these buildings for the purpose of subletting a part of the farm to a dairyman at a rent of £25, although I must regard the lease on which he holds these lands as containing a prohibition against subletting. This no doubt was a consideration with the tenant, Mr Torrance, in continuing tenant of the farm. Matters went on in this manner till 1888, the tenant always having the dairyman as subtenant in these lands and in possession of the dairy.

In 1889 the landlord gave notice that he desired to exercise his power of resumption in regard to the field in which the dairy stood. Therefore, for a period of twenty years, from 1871 till now, the tenant has had possession of these dairy buildings. Further, if the lease were at an end the tenant would be now entitled to remove the byre erected by him or get it taken off his hands at a valuation. He objects to the landlord exercising his reserved power to resume that part of the field which is occupied with the dairy buildings of the nature to which I have alluded.

No. 162.

May 27, 1891.
Trotter v. Torrance.

Now, in my opinion, the clause of resumption, and any clause in similar terms, is subject to construction, and considerations of good sense and equity are serviceable and to be resorted to in making such construction. I also pointed out more than once during the debate that I should not be indisposed to construe a clause of this sort by reference to the conduct of parties. One can easily figure a case in which a power reserved to the landlord to resume land upon condition of making an abatement of the rent, otherwise at a certain rate per acre, would not be held applicable according to the true intent and meaning of the contract as gathered from the nature of the contract and the actings of landlord and tenant towards each other in regard to buildings of a certain class. Thus, for example, suppose a landlord reserved power to resume ten acres of an arable farm, to be chosen by him from any part thereof, upon condition of abating the rent of the remainder at so much per acre, I would be slow to read that, in accordance with the rules of good sense and equity, and having regard to the intention of the parties, as applicable to the dwelling-house or the premises about the farm steading. These buildings might fall under the term of "land" and be part of the farm, but still I would be disposed to answer in the negative the question, Does such land fall under the reserved power of resumption? rather than answer that question in the affirmative and imply an obligation not expressed in the lease to erect other farm premises of a similar kind elsewhere.

But in the present case there is no occasion to encounter any consideration of this sort. The field is outlying and at the extremity of the farm, and the power to resume is applied to it by expressing the limits of it, its very boundaries and extent. I do not think that the power to resume this field can be met by the consideration that the cowhouses are there. Mr Asher indeed contended that the reserved power to resume would have been inapplicable to ground occupied by a pigstye or a dovecot. Such a contention is in my opinion unsound. I think that in the present circumstances the clause of resumption is applicable to the whole field, and that the landlord is entitled to exercise his power to resume on condition of abating the rent as provided in the lease.

With every anxiety to do justice to the tenant, I am of opinion on the whole matter that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed, with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The right of the pursuer to resume is bounded only by the conditions in the clause of resumption, and I think that the reading of that clause upon which the pursuer has relied is unfair and indeed the only permissible one.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ROMANES & SIMSON, W.S.—GEORGE F. SCOTT, S.S.C.—Agents.

ABERDEEN JOINT PASSENGER STATION COMMITTEE AND THE GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Murray—Ferguson.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—Dickson.

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.

Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

Railway—Running powers—Use of joint station—Statute—Construction—Act, 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccxi.—In 1864 the Scottish North-Eastern and the Great North of Scotland Railway Companies built a joint station at Aberdeen, which was by statute declared to be their joint property. It was provided that the control and management of it should be in a joint committee of the two companies. The Scottish North-Eastern Company, with "all the rights, interests, and estate" which it possessed, was afterwards transferred by the Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccxi. to the Caledonian Railway Company. The 99th section of the Act, after reciting that the railways of the North British Company formed, with other railways, lines of communication between London and Scotland, &c., and that it was expedient that free and expeditious transit of traffic over the said lines of communication should be secured, enacted that the expression "Scottish East Coast traffic," as used in the Act, should mean traffic of every description on the Scottish North-Eastern line from or to any place on or beyond and via the North British lines. And by the 106th section of the same statute it was provided that "the North British Railway Company may, for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic, run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description, the Scottish North-Eastern lines, or any part thereof, and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines." Further, the North British Railway were to be entitled to "the joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, wharfs, stopping, loading, and unloading places, sidings, and junctions of the Scottish North-Eastern lines, including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected. . . ."

After the North British Railway had been for some years admitted to the station, and had enjoyed its conveniences for their traffic, an action was brought by the Joint Committee and the Great North of Scotland Company for declarator that the North British Company had no right, without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Company, to use the station, and for interdict.

Held that, the object of the Legislature having been to give every possible facility for the passage of Scottish East Coast traffic upon the lines in question, the North British Company were entitled not only to running powers through the station at Aberdeen, but also to the use of the station itself, and all the conveniences and privileges connected therewith, in so far as these were enjoyed by the Caledonian Company.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kinnear. B.

(THIS was the sequel to the case reported ante, June 19, 1890, vol. xvii. 975.)

Under the Denburn Valley Railway Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. cxi.), a joint passenger station was built at Aberdeen, and lines of railway constructed through it, at the joint expense of the Scottish North-Eastern and Great North of Scotland Railway Companies, at a cost of £90,000. The works authorised by the Act were "a joint passenger station" and certain lines of railway intended to connect the systems of the Scottish North-Eastern and Great North of Scotland Companies.

By the 20th section of that Act it was provided,—"The joint passenger station shall be jointly and equally the property of the company (i.e., the Scottish North-Eastern) and of the Great North Company. . . : The joint passenger station, when made, shall be under the control and management of the joint committee. Each of the said companies shall be entitled to the free use of the joint passenger station for through and local

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.
Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

passenger traffic, and, in proportion to their traffic, to an equal amount of accommodation therein. . . . The expression 'joint passenger station' or 'station' in this enactment means the joint passenger station, the railway through the same, and the sidings, accesses, and works extending for two hundred yards on each side of the passenger shed of the joint passenger station." The joint committee was to consist of three directors of each of the two companies, there being provision for referring to arbitration any questions upon which they should be equally divided.

There were in the statute provisions binding the companies to give mutual facilities for the transmission of traffic.

In 1866, by the Act 29 and 30 Vict. c. cccxi., the North-Eastern Railway Company was amalgamated with the Caledonian Company.* In this statute the North British Company got running powers over the line from Montrose to Aberdeen, which were thus expressed (sec. 106):—"The North British Railway Company may, for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic, run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description, the Scottish North-Eastern lines or any part thereof, and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines; and the North British Railway Company shall be entitled to the conveniences and privileges, and be subject to the regulations and obligations, hereinafter mentioned" (that is to say) ". . . (4) The joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, wharfs, stopping, loading, and unloading places, sidings, and junctions of the Scottish North-Eastern lines, including, in so far as the" [Caledonian] "Company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected; the extent of such use, and the nature of the arrangements for working the traffic at the respective places, to be determined by agreement or by arbitration, and the payment to the company for the same to be the terminals as respects goods, mineral, and

* The 99th section of that Act provided,—"And whereas the railways of the North British Railway Company via Berwick, in connection with the North-Eastern and Great Northern Railways, form a line of communication between the Metropolis and Scotland, and the railways of the North British Railway Company via Hawick and Carlisle form, in connection with the railways of the Midland Railway Company and of the London and North-Western Railway Company, other lines of communication between the Metropolis and Scotland: And whereas the lines of the North British Railway Company, in connection with the Scottish North-Eastern lines, with or without other railways, form competing lines of communication with the railways of the company between Dundee, Aberdeen, and other places in the north of Scotland, on the one hand, and Edinburgh and Glasgow, and other places in the south, east, and west of Scotland, on the other, and it is expedient that the free and expeditious transit of traffic of every description should be secured and maintained over the said several lines of communication, and that nothing should be done to impede or obstruct, but that every reasonable facility should be afforded for promoting the free passage and transmission of such traffic: Be it enacted as follows:—The expression 'Scottish East Coast traffic,' where used in this Act, shall mean traffic of every description passing or destined or directed to pass to or from any place on or beyond the railways which, previously to the commencement of this Act, formed the undertaking of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company, and all extensions and branches of such railways which now belong to or are leased or worked by the company, except the Montrose and Bervie Railway, or which hereafter may belong to or be leased or worked by the company, and every or any part thereof (in this Act subsequently called the Scottish North-Eastern lines), from or to any place on or beyond and via the railways forming the undertaking of the North British Railway Company, and every or any part thereof" live stock traffic, and as respects passenger traffic, to be such special payment, if any, as may be determined by agreement or by arbitration; and further, if at the request of the North British Railway Company the arbitrator shall order any enlargement or alteration of any of the said stations or places, such enlargement or alteration shall be made by the company, and the annual payment therefor, if any, shall be settled by agreement or by arbitration."

From June 1878 the North British Company used these running powers, and were accommodated with a booking-office, &c., in the station at Aberdeen.

In November 1888 the Joint Committee, suing, as by statute they were empowered to do, in name of their clerk, and the Great North Company raised an action against the North British Company for declarator that the defenders were not entitled, without the consent of the Great North Company, to use the station, or any part thereof, or the conveniences connected therewith, for the purposes of their traffic, or to run over or use with their engines, trucks, or carriages of any description, the said station or the railway through the same, or the sidings, accesses, or works, extending for 200 yards on each side of the passenger shed of the said passenger station, or any part of the same; and that the said Joint Committee were not bound to admit the traffic of the defenders, or their engines, trucks, or carriages of any description, into or within the said station, as defined by sec. 20 of the said Act, or the conveniences connected therewith, or upon or over the railway running through the same, or the sidings, accesses, or works aforesaid, and for interdict conform to these conclusions.

The pursuers stated;—(Cond. 7) "The defenders are entitled to use the joint passenger station at Aberdeen and conveniences connected therewith only in so far as the Caledonian Company may lawfully empower them to do so. The Caledonian Company cannot lawfully empower them to do so, if the consent of the pursuers be withheld, as is the case. The defenders, in these circumstances, have no right or title to run their trains into the joint station, or to use it for the purposes of their traffic. . . . The pursuers have since 1878 allowed the defenders to run their trains into certain parts of the said station. This they have, however, hitherto done under protest, out of regard to the public convenience, and without prejudice to their rights, and in the hope that an arrangement might be made regarding the conditions on which the use of the station by the defenders might be permitted. The defenders have, however, failed to come to any arrangement with the pursuers, and they now claim the right to use the station without their consent, and usurp without payment the services of the pursuers' signalmen, porters, and other servants, to attend to the defenders' trains and passengers." (Cond. 8) "The accommodation of the said joint station is not more than sufficient for the traffic of the Caledonian and Great North of Scotland Companies, and the introduction of the defenders' traffic is causing serious inconvenience to the pursuers, especially with regard to the traffic of the Deeside Railway."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the Acts of Parliament condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. (2) The use of the joint passenger station at Aberdeen being restricted to the through and local passenger traffic mentioned in sec. 20 of the said Act of 1864, the defenders have no right to use the same. (4) The Great North of Scotland Railway Company being joint proprietors of the said station, the defenders are not entitled to use the said station without their consent.

The defenders stated;—(Stat. 3) "The defenders have, since June 1878, taken advantage of the powers conferred upon them by the Amalgamation

No. 163.

May 28, 1891. Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

Act of 1866, and have exercised, and still are exercising, the running powers conferred upon them by said statute, inter alia, by running their passenger and goods trains over a portion of the Scottish North-Eastern lines from Kinnaber Junction, near Montrose, to Aberdeen. In connection with their passenger traffic they are provided with accommodation in the joint station at Aberdeen, which has been constructed under the powers of 'the Denburn Valley Railway Act, 1864.' The accommodation provided consists of an office or box in the booking-hall for the use of their booking-clerk, and the use of a parcels-office, as well as a portion of the platform and rails for their trains. The defenders, however, only use the lines of railway forming the southern part of the station, which are part of the undertaking of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway. The defenders are now, and have for years past been, in the enjoyment and possession of the station, and the pursuers are now seeking to eject them therefrom."

In answer to this averment, the pursuers stated;—"Admitted, under reference to article 7 of the condescendence, that the defenders were, subsequent to 1870, allowed certain accommodation at the joint station, and have since 1878 (with the exception of the period from 27th December 1879 to 1st May 1883) been permitted to run their trains into the said station. . . . It is only for the limited purpose of collecting and allocating tolls, rates, and charges that the southern portion of the railway through the same, measuring from the centre of the joint passenger station, is under the said Act deemed part of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway."

The defenders pleaded;—2. The defenders should be assoilzied, or otherwise the action should be dismissed in respect, . . . (3) the defenders are authorised by the Caledonian Railway Company, and for many years have been with the consent of the pursuers in possession and enjoyment of the use now had by them of the station.

A preliminary plea by the defenders that the pursuers had no title to sue, and that they must call the Caledonian Company as defenders, having been repelled on a reclaiming note by the First Division (ante, vol. xvii. p. 975), the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) thereafter, on 24th October 1890, dismissed the action.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—It was to be kept in view in this case that the Legislature never took away private rights, without making provision for compensation.[1] The principle of that case applied to our-

* "NOTE.— . . . The joint station at Aberdeen appears to me to be a station connected with the Scottish North-Eastern line, both physically and by reason of the legal right which the company possessed in that station, and which is now transferred to the Caledonian Company. It is admitted that if the running powers given to the North British did not extend to the Aberdeen station, they would be useless for the purpose for which the statute declares that they are given, namely, for the free transit of Scottish East Coast traffic between Aberdeen on the one hand, and Glasgow and Edinburgh on the other. I find no sufficient reason for so restricting the construction of the words in question as absolutely to exclude the North British Railway from the Aberdeen station, with the result of defeating the avowed purpose of the statute.

"It does not follow that the defenders are entitled, without the pursuers' consent, to all the uses of the station which they now enjoy. But the pursuers' counsel have admitted that they are not in a position to obtain a judgment in this action by which the extent of the defenders' right shall be defined, on the assumption that they are not to be absolutely excluded. The proper course, therefore, appears to be to dismiss the action. A judgment of absolvitor might prejudice questions which are not at present before the Court."

[1] Wells v. London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., 1876, L. R., 5 Chanc. Div. 126.

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.

Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

porations as well as to individuals. There was therefore a strong presumption against the Legislature having assigned away the rights of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company and of the Joint Committee. The subsections of the 106th section of the Act, which particularised "the conveniences and privileges" to which the North British Company was to be entitled under the Act, could not be extended beyond their strict letter. The right to run over and use the line was confined to "the Scottish North-Eastern lines." There was a parliamentary surrender of the Scottish North-Eastern system to the North British in so far as they got running powers over it, which was the consideration they got in respect of the amalgamation of that system with the Caledonian. The language of the 4th subsection of the 106th section giving them the use of the station at Aberdeen "in so far as the company lawfully may" did not lead to the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary. The station was the joint property of the Caledonian and the Great North. What Parliament meant was that the consent of one of the two joint owners, i.e., of the Caledonian, might be forced, if the other joint owner consented. But Parliament could not be held to have bound the Great North to submit to a partition of the station in an Act by which they got nothing themselves. The North British were in no sense assignees of the Great North, and the other joint proprietor could not assign a portion of his share and introduce a third party, irrespective of the consent of the two joint proprietors. Interdict had been frequently granted in similar circumstances.[1] The conveniences "connected with" the Scottish North-Eastern lines were such as were physically and practically connected, and not legally as the Lord Ordinary construed it. The question was not one of the convenience of the public. The pursuers would be quite willing to admit the defenders to the use of the station, if they paid for the privilege to be granted to them. The toll clauses did not apply to stations; accordingly, although the North British Railway had paid the Caledonian for the use of their rails, including the 200 yards up to the platform, they had never paid anything for the use of the station either to the Caledonian or to the Joint Station Committee.

Argued for the respondents;—The true construction of the Act of 1866 was that which had been adopted by the Lord Ordinary. Otherwise the expressed object of the Legislature would be totally defeated; for there could be no doubt that the clauses in the Act of 1866 had been imposed upon the Caledonian Company much more in the interests of the public than in any other view, one object of Parliament being—looking to the terms of the 4th subsection of section 106—to keep up a competition. For the purposes of the toll clauses and the adjustment of rates and charges the travelling lines met in the middle of the station, the Joint Committee's property being entirely confined to the station. The object of giving the North British "the joint or separate use of the stations, &c., of the Scottish North-Eastern lines, including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen" was to make the right of the North British to the station perfectly clear, and as contrasted with the usual terms in which ordinary running-power rights were conceived.

---

[1] North British Railway Co. v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. and Caledonian Railway Co., Dec. 20, 1853, 16 D. 250, 26 Scot. Jur. 99; London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway v. London and South-Western, 1859, 4 De Jex and Jones, 362; Portpatrick Railway Co. v. Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Co., Feb. 3, 1882, 9 R. 510; cf. also Caledonian Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co., July 16, 1880, 7 R. 1147.

No. 163. At advising,—

May 28, 1891. Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When formerly reviewing the interlocutor of Lord Kinnear, we had occasion to become familiar with the history of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway and its amalgamation with the Caledonian Company, and it is unnecessary for the purpose of the present judgment to go back upon any of these details. It is sufficient to say that by the Act of 1866, which we are now to deal with, the Scottish North-Eastern Company was dissolved and the Caledonian Company came into its place as part of the line connecting the north and south of Scotland. The Act of 1866, in so far as it records and gives effect to an agreement between the Scottish North-Eastern and the Caledonian Company, may be passed over in the meantime, because what we have to determine in the present case is how far the North British Company have acquired any rights under that statute.

Now, it is necessary in the first place carefully to consider the 99th section of the Act of 1866, which proceeds upon a recital that the railways of the North British Railway Company via Berwick in connection with the North-Eastern and Great Northern Railways form a line of communication between the Metropolis and Scotland, and the railways of the North British Railway Company via Carlisle and Hawick form in connection with the railways of the Midland Railway Company and of the London and North-Western Railway Company other lines of communication between the Metropolis and Scotland, and "whereas the lines of the North British Railway Company in connection with the Scottish North-Eastern lines with or without other railways form competing lines of communication with the railways of the Caledonian Company between Dundee, Aberdeen, and other places in the north of Scotland on the one hand, and Edinburgh and Glasgow and other places in the south, east, and west of Scotland on the other, and it is expedient that the free and expeditious transit of traffic of every description should be secured and maintained over the said several lines of communication, and that nothing should be done to impede or obstruct, but that every reasonable facility should be afforded for promoting the free passage and transmission of such traffic: Be it enacted as follows:—the expression 'Scottish East Coast Traffic,' where used in this Act, shall mean traffic of every description passing or destined or directed to pass to or from any place on or beyond the railways which previously to the commencement of this Act formed the undertaking of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company, and all extensions and branches of such railways which now belong to or are leased or worked by the company, except the Montrose and Bervie Railway, or which hereafter may belong to or be leased or worked by the company and every or any part thereof (in this Act subsequently called the Scottish North-Eastern lines) from or to any place on or beyond and via the railways forming the undertaking of the North British Railway Company, and every or any part thereof." Now, one cannot help seeing upon the reading of this section of the statute that Parliament attached great importance to the definition of Scottish East Coast traffic, shewing that by the statute it was intended to give particular facilities for the transmission of that traffic upon the lines with which this Act is dealing. And the 106th section of the statute makes this provision, that "the North British Railway Company may for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description the Scottish North-Eastern lines or any part thereof, and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines." The section thus gives the North British Railway Company running powers, and it proceeds thus:—"And the North British Railway Company shall be entitled to the conveniences and privileges, and be subject to the regulations and obligations hereinafter mentioned." And then, under the 4th subdivision of the section there occurs this provision,—"The joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, wharfs, stopping, loading, and unloading places, sidings, and junctions of the Scottish North-Eastern lines, including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected; the extent of such use, and the nature of the arrangements for working the traffic at the respective places, to be determined by agreement or by arbitration, and the payment to the company for the same to be the terminals as respects goods, mineral, and live stock traffic, and as respects passenger traffic to be such special payment, if any, as may be determined by agreement or by arbitration: And further, if at the request of the North British Railway Company the arbitrator shall order any enlargement or alteration of any of the said stations or places, such enlargement or alteration shall be made by the company, and the annual payment therefor, if any, shall be settled by agreement or by arbitration."

Now, I think it is very plain that the object of the Legislature was to give every possible facility for the passage of the Scottish East Coast traffic upon the lines to which this station applies, and that for that purpose they were to be entitled not only to have running powers through the station at Aberdeen, but that they were entitled under subsection 4, which I have just read, to the use of the station itself, and all the conveniences and privileges connected with that station. No doubt this provision is limited apparently and in words by the insertion of this clause "including, in so far as the Company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen," and so forth.

Now, it has been said that that is a limitation of the accommodation and privileges conferred upon the North British Railway Company. I think it is necessary for the opponents of the North British Railway Company—the joint committee for managing the station—to shew in what respect anything has been given to the North British Railway Company which the Caledonian Railway might not lawfully give, and they have not pointed out any such privilege or accommodation communicated to the North British Railway Company which the Caledonian Company might not lawfully give; and therefore I confess I attach very little importance to these words in construing the 106th section of the statute. I think the true meaning was that the Scottish East Coast traffic was to enjoy all the privileges enjoyed by the Caledonian Company, not only in using the Scottish North-Eastern line, but in passing through and using the station at Aberdeen, and the Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor has suggested a conclusive reason for so construing the statute, because if that advantage is not given to the North British Railway Company, the object of the statute in providing facilities for the passage of the Scottish East Coast traffic would fail altogether. The object of the statute would be defeated by reading these words in such a way as to imply that there is some limitation in the amount of privilege or accommodation which the Caledonian Railway Company lawfully may give to the North British Railway Company.

It is upon that, I think, very simple ground that I come to the same conclusion with the Lord Ordinary, and hold that the North British Railway Company, with their running powers, and with the privileges and advantages bestowed by the 4th subsection of section 106, are just in as good a position as the Caledonian Railway Company, and as the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, in regard to the uses of the joint station at Aberdeen. I am therefore for adhering.

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.
Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

LORD ADAM.—It is desirable to see what the extent of the claim and the contention of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company is in this case. The leading conclusion of their action is to have it found "that the defenders" (that is, the North British Railway Company) "are not entitled, without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, part owners thereof, to use the joint passenger station at Aberdeen, or any part thereof, or the conveniences connected therewith, for the purposes of their traffic, or to run over or use with their engines, trucks, or carriages of any description, the said station or the railway through the same, or the sidings, accesses, or works, extending for 200 yards on each side of the passenger shed of the said joint passenger station"; and there are subsidiary conclusions following, so that the claim on behalf of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company is this, that they have the power of keeping the North British Railway Company's carriages, engines, and trains at a distance of 200 yards from the joint passenger station at Aberdeen. If we are to give effect to that contention, it comes to this, that no North British train, using the running powers conferred by this Act, can approach the station at Aberdeen without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, nearer than 200 yards, and if so, it cannot enjoy the benefit and use of the station.

Now, I think with your Lordship that that depends upon the construction of two clauses, the 99th and the 106th, of the Act of 1866. Now, the 99th clause is important, because it defines what the intention of the Legislature was as to the running powers with reference to the Scottish East Coast traffic. It is a clause which defines what Scottish East Coast traffic is, and it provides,—"And whereas the lines of the North British Railway in connection with the Scottish North-Eastern lines, with or without other railways, form competing lines of communication with the railways of the company between Dundee, Aberdeen, and other places in the North of Scotland, on the one hand, and Edinburgh and Glasgow, and other places in the south, east, and west of Scotland, on the other"—it is dealing with the traffic between Aberdeen and other places in the south; and then it goes on,—"And it is expedient that the free and expeditious transit of traffic of every description should be secured and maintained over the said several lines of communication, and that nothing should be done to impede or obstruct, but that every reasonable facility should be afforded for promoting the free passage and transmission of such traffic." Everything is to be done to promote the free passage and transmission of, inter alia, the traffic between Aberdeen and the south.

That is, if I may so call it, the preamble to this part of the Act which sets forth the reason for granting the running powers and facilities mentioned. It is to promote the free transmission of the traffic between Aberdeen and the south, and the claim on the part of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company is this, that notwithstanding that that is the avowed object and intention of the statute, they are entitled of their own ipse dixit to say, "We shall not allow that portion of the traffic between Aberdeen and the south carried by the North British Railway Company to come within 200 yards of the joint station."

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.

Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

That is the contention. Now, that may be a construction of the Act, but it does not appear to me a priori to be a probable construction, for the result is that the Great North of Scotland Railway Company are to do the very opposite of what the Act says is its intention should be done.

Now, when we come to the general powers given in section 106 we find that they are these—"The North British Railway Company may for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic"—which in the Act itself includes traffic between Aberdeen and the south—"run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description the Scottish North-Eastern lines, or any part thereof": Then we come to the use of the station, which is the great question here—"and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines." Now, this particular station is not a station, I think, upon the North-Eastern line proper. But I am perfectly clear that the Lord Ordinary's view in his note is right, that it is beyond doubt a station connected with the Scottish North-Eastern Railway, and in that respect I am clear that it falls within the general powers. If the Act had contained no further provisions on the subject, I should upon the construction of this clause have held that the North British Railway Company were entitled to the use of the station, just as they were entitled to the use of stations which were wholly the property of the North-Eastern, now of the Caledonian Railway Company.

But then there is a specialty connected with this particular station, that it was a joint station, and not the entire property of the Caledonian Railway Company; and therefore the Legislature has thought it right that it should be specially dealt with, and it has inserted a clause for the purpose. Accordingly the 106th section goes on to say that "the North British Railway Company shall be entitled to the conveniences and privileges, and be subject to the regulations and obligations hereinafter mentioned," and the "hereinafter mentioned" refers to the 4th subsection, which provides that they are to be entitled to "the joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, &c. of the Scottish North-Eastern lines,"—that is, the stations, and so on, which are the exclusive property now of the Caledonian Railway Company, and then of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company. And then it says, "including, in so far as the Company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected."

Now, what is the meaning of the words "in so far as the Caledonian Company lawfully may"? It is an elliptical form of expression, but I think the meaning is that they are to be entitled to the use of the joint station so far as the Caledonian Railway Company may themselves lawfully use it. That is to say, that the North British Railway Company were to have exactly the same privileges and uses as the Caledonian Railway Company, and the reason of that is this. The station is a joint station, it was constructed under the Denburn Valley Act of 1864, the 20th section of which provides for the powers of the joint owners —"Each of the said companies shall be entitled to the free use of the joint passenger station for through and local passenger traffic, and in proportion to their traffic, to an equal amount of accommodation therein." That is to say, that the Companies who built this station and whose joint property it was, were to have it appropriated for their accommodation,—in other words, part of it, in proportion to their traffic, is to be set aside for the particular use of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, and part of it is to be set aside for the use of the Caledonian Railway Company. Accordingly I think that the Caledonian Railway Company could not lawfully use the accommodation appropriated and set aside for the Great North of Scotland Railway Company in a common station. And so under the 4th subsection I do not think the North British Railway Company could, any more than the Caledonian Railway Company, insist on using that portion of the joint station set aside for the accommodation of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company. I think that was the meaning of the words "so far as they lawfully may"; or, in other words, that the North British Railway Company were to have all the powers and privileges which the Caledonian Railway Company could exercise or have in the joint station; but they were not to have the power, any more than the Caledonian Railway Company, of interfering, or insisting on any further rights or powers than the Caledonian Railway Company have in a question with the Great North of Scotland Railway Company.

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.
Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

Accordingly, my construction of these words is that the North British Railway Company have every privilege and every use which the Caledonian Railway Company may lawfully have of that joint station, but in exercising that use they are not entitled, any more than the Caledonian Railway Company would be entitled, to interfere with any parts or portions of that joint station which had been under their joint Act appropriated for the use of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company. That is my construction of this clause, and one sees that if that is the right construction, it is no hardship whatever upon the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, because the traffic with which the Act is dealing is traffic which was formerly brought into that station by the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company alone. The same amount of traffic and the same character of traffic—the traffic from the south by all converging lines,—was brought in by the North-Eastern Railway Company, and was all accommodated in that portion of the joint station which by the Act of 1866 was appropriated to the Caledonian Railway Company. The difference was this, that that traffic which was formerly brought in by the Scottish North-Eastern line was in future to be partially brought in by the Caledonian and partially by the North British Railway Company under their running powers, and I can see no hardship inflicted on the Great North of Scotland Railway Company when they are called on to admit that traffic. I cannot agree to the contention that in spite of the preamble of the Act, which says that such traffic is to be facilitated in every way possible, the Great North of Scotland Railway Company are to have the power to put a stop to this traffic, and to say that all the traffic which the North British Railway Company brings is to be stopped 200 yards from the station. That, in my opinion, is quite an inadmissible construction.

That is my view of this clause, and it comes to this, as the Lord Ordinary says, that it must lead to the dismissal of this action, because it is impossible under this action to define the extent of use which the North British Railway Company are entitled to have. If any question of that sort is raised, it must be by a different action. But my construction necessarily leads to the conclusion that this action must be decided against the Great North of Scotland Railway Company. I therefore concur with your Lordship.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of opinion that this action was rightly decided by the Lord Ordinary, and I concur in his Lordship's view as reported, and with your Lordship's additional observations on the construction of the statute in question. In the arguments addressed to us at the bar, I think the Lord

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.
Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

Ordinary's views were really not seriously controverted, but an attempt was made to displace the result at which his Lordship arrived by a very ingenious construction which was attempted to be put on these words, "in so far as the Company lawfully may." The argument was that the effect of these words was to make the right of the North British Railway Company entirely dependent on the power of the Caledonian Railway Company to communicate a right to the use of the station; and then it was said that inasmuch as the Caledonian has only a joint interest in the station along with the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, that Company has no power to communicate anything. And so the North British Railway Company, it was said, could take nothing under that clause.

I think there are two answers to this argument. First, if the meaning suggested was the meaning intended by the Legislature, then certainly Parliament, or the promoters of the bill, took the strangest mode of giving expression to their views, because the natural way of expressing what the reclaimers say is the meaning would have been to say simply, the North British Railway Company shall have no power to enter or to use the station at Aberdeen except with the joint consent of the Caledonian and the Great North of Scotland Railway Companies. But, secondly, I think the argument fails altogether, because it involves an assumption of fact which I take to be unfounded. It was pointed out by Lord Kinnear, in the course of the argument, that the Caledonian Railway Company were not antecedently to this Act in the position of being joint owners or having a joint interest in the station. They were receiving under this very statute, for the first time, the right to use the Aberdeen Railway Station; and the provision is that the North British Railway Company are to have all the rights which the Caledonian Railway Company have—all that they can lawfully communicate—out of the joint interest which they are now receiving. That does not seem to me to involve any reference to the goodwill either of the Caledonian Railway Company, or of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company. But the proviso is not without meaning. It in the first place makes it clear that the right of the North British Railway Company to the station was to be co-extensive with the right of the Caledonian Railway Company in the matter of the use, although different in its legal character; and secondly, as Lord Adam has pointed out, the proviso would also have the effect of making it clear that the North British Railway Company were not to interfere with the Great North of Scotland Railway Company in those parts of the station which had been specially appropriated to the accommodation of that company. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor under review should be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I remain of the opinion which I expressed in the Outer-House.

I only desire to add that I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the only question which we have to determine is whether the pursuers can stop the North British Railway at a point 200 yards south of the passenger shed at Aberdeen, so as to debar the North British Railway Company from a right of passage for its carriages and engines across that portion of the line into the station. It is now conceded, I think, that the pursuers cannot use the present action for the purpose of regulating the uses of the station to which the North British Railway Company may be entitled, or of fixing in any way the character and extent of the accommodation which may be lawfully given. The pursuers take

No. 163.

May 28, 1891.
Aberdeen Station Committee v. North British Railway Co.

their stand upon their position as joint owners of a part of the Scottish North-Eastern undertaking, and say, "in respect of our right of joint ownership, we peremptorily exclude the North British Railway Company from running its carriages and engines over any part of the line within the conclusions of our summons."

Now that they are not entitled so to exclude the North British Railway Company, I think, with all your Lordships, is very clear. I must confess that irrespective of the running powers given to the North British Railway Company by the Act of 1866, I should myself have some difficulty in seeing how these conclusions of the summons could have been sustained. The pursuers rest their right, as I have said, entirely upon their joint ownership in this station; but then they are joint owners of railway lines and a railway station subject to rights conferred by the Legislature upon all other companies and all other persons. Every company has the right to run over the lines of every other company. Of course we all know that that is not a right of any practical value, because the Legislature has given to other companies than the owning company a right of passage only, and has not added such facilities as are necessary to make the right of passage practically available, or to make it a right that could be safely exercised without the aid and concurrence of the owning company. But then the difficulty of practically working out a right which the Legislature has given does not prevent it being theoretically a perfectly good right; and it does appear to me that if the Caledonian Company had agreed so to work its signals and points as to enable the North British to run with safety beyond the point 200 yards south of the Aberdeen passenger shed, at which the pursuers desire to stop them, it would have been extremely difficult for the pursuers to say, "in respect of our joint right of property merely, we exclude such use." They might very well have made it practically of no avail to the North British Railway Company. That is perfectly possible. But that they may take their stand on their mere legal right, and say, that in respect of that joint right they may debar the North British Company at their pleasure from coming on that portion of their lines, would appear to me to be a proposition which it would be very difficult to maintain; because that is simply denying to the North British Company the right of passage which the Legislature has given to them and others by the Railways Clauses Act.

But it is not necessary to consider that question in determining this action, for the reasons your Lordships have given, because the Legislature has undoubtedly conferred on the North British Railway Company just those practical running powers which are necessary to enable the general right given by the Railways Clauses Act to all companies to be made effectually advantageous. Upon the construction of the clauses of the statute upon which the extent of the running power depends, I have nothing to add. I agree with your Lordship that the action must be dismissed,—the particular accommodations to which the North British Railway Company may be entitled, or to which the Caledonian Railway Company and the North British Railway Company together may be entitled, in the use of this station, being a question which we have no means of dealing with in this action.

THE COURT adhered.

T. J. GORDON & FALCONER, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN EDWARDS AND SPOUSE, Pursuers (Appellants).—M'Kechnie—Baxter.
THE PAROCHIAL BOARD OF KINLOSS AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Salvesen.

No. 164.

June 2, 1891.
Edwards v. Parochial Board of Kinloss.

Reparation—Public official—Statutory protection against claims of damages for irregularities in execution of office—Ultra vires—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 118.—Where a local authority had partly demolished an untenanted house within their district on the ground that the state of the roof was dangerous to public safety, held that the local authority were not protected by the 118th section of the Public Health Act, 1867,* against a claim for damages by the owner, the demolition of houses on account of their danger to public safety being outwith the powers of local authorities under the Act.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn. C.

IN July 1889 John Edwards, carpenter in Govan, and his wife, Charlotte Edwards, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Elgin against the Parochial Board of Kinloss, as the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1867, and Archibald Keir Leitch, clerk to the Local Authority, for damages for the demolition of certain house property belonging to the pursuers in Findhorn.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having, through their officer acting in their behalf, wrongously and unwarrantably interfered with and partly demolished the property of the pursuers, are liable in damages therefor.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers are barred by the 118th section of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, from insisting in the present action, and the same ought to be dismissed, with expenses.*

A proof was allowed. It appeared that the house in question had had the roof removed by order of the defender Leitch in February 1889, in consequence of complaints by neighbours that it was dangerous to public safety through the risk of slates falling off it. It also appeared that it was untenanted, and was in a filthy condition, some persons having been using it as a public convenience. The property was demolished without notice to the pursuers. Leitch deponed that he had been unable at the time to discover who were the owners of the property. In the course of the proof the Parochial Board admitted liability for the proceedings of Leitch in the matter.

On 2d August 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds that these proceedings by the defender Leitch, acting as aforesaid, did not fall within the scope of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, and were unwarrantable in law: Therefore sustains the pursuers' pleas in law: Finds the defenders liable in damages to the pursuers therefor; assesses the same at the sum of £50 sterling: Decerns," &c.

On appeal, on 23d October 1890, the Sheriff (Ivory) recalled that interlocutor, and after findings in fact, found in law that the action was excluded by the 118th section of the Public Health Act, 1867, and assoilzied the defenders.

---

* The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 118, provides,—"The local authority and the board shall not be liable in damages for any irregularity committed by their officers in the execution of this Act or for anything done by themselves in the bona fide execution of this Act, and every officer acting in the bona fide execution of this Act shall be indemnified by the local authority under which he acts in respect of all costs, liabilities, and charges to which he may be subjected, and every action or prosecution against any person acting under this Act on account of any wrong done in or by any action, proceeding, or operation under this Act shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen."

No. 164.

June 2, 1891. Edwards v. Parochial Board of Kinloss.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The proceedings of the defender Leitch, for which the other defenders had admitted liability, were wholly outwith the statute. The defenders had not even a colourable warrant for pulling down houses on account of their danger to the public safety. The act complained of, therefore, could not be described as an "irregularity" committed "in the execution of the Act," and thus did not come within the protection of the 118th section.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—The policy of the Legislature was to protect public officials so that they might not be hampered in the execution of their duties by the fear of claims for damages. Hence clauses of protection like the present received a very liberal interpretation,[2] which was wide enough to cover the irregularity here complained of. At anyrate, the buildings in question were a nuisance from their filthy condition, and a local authority had undoubtedly authority to remove nuisances.

LORD PRESIDENT.—With regard to the merits of this case I do not understand your Lordships to entertain any doubt. The Parochial Board of Kinloss, in acting as they have done, profess to have proceeded as the local authority under the Public Health Act of 1867, and Leitch, as their officer, professes to have acted under that statute also. The question therefore comes to be whether in performing the duties imposed by the Public Health Act a local authority is entitled to order the demolition of a house. I confess I am unable to find in the statute any authority at all for such a proceeding. The Public Health Act empowers local authorities to remove nuisances of all kinds which are injurious to sanitation or public health generally, but I cannot find any general warrant authorising a local authority to pull down houses. It is possible that a house may be in such a state that the public health cannot be effectually secured except by the removal of the house altogether. As to whether the removal of the house in such a case would be within the powers of the local authority I say nothing: it is sufficient to say that it is not the case with which we have here to deal. No doubt this house had become a nuisance in consequence of its having been so long unoccupied, because mischievous persons were in the habit of resorting to it, and making use of it as a public convenience, but any nuisance of that sort could easily have been removed without the necessity of pulling the whole house down. Therefore, upon the important general question under the statute I think the Sheriff has gone wrong, and that his interlocutor must be recalled. I am, however, unable to agree with the Sheriff-substitute in assessing the damages at so large a sum as £50, and I propose, if your Lordships should agree with me, that we should reduce the damages to £10.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Sheriff-substitute is right except as regards the amount of damages, which I think with your Lordship ought to be assessed at £10.

The question is whether a local authority, acting under the Public Health Act of 1867, is entitled to pull down a house on the ground that it is dangerous to public safety. Now, in the execution of that Act a local authority has power to remove nuisances, but, as far as I can discover, they are no more entitled than any private person to order the removal of a house on the ground that it is not in a safe condition. There are well known means by which houses that are dangerous to the public may be removed, but it is no part of the duties imposed on the local authority to see to the removal of such houses. That being so, this local authority, in ordering the removal of the pursuers' house, were doing what they had no warrant or authority whatever for doing. I cannot see that what they did was done in execution of the Act, or was done in bona fide, or that it was done under the Act. The whole defence to the present action is based on the 118th section of the Public Health Act, 1867. I do not think it necessary to examine the terms of that section critically, for I am very clear that the defenders were not acting under the Act, but were acting entirely outwith its provisions, and accordingly that they are not entitled to the protection of the 118th section.

[1] Knox v. Macarthur, June 7, 1865, 3 Macph. 890, 37 Scot. Jur. 528.

[2] Ferguson v. M'Ewen, Feb. 7, 1852, 14 D. 457, 24 Scot. Jur. 225; M'Laren v. Steele, Nov. 13, 1857, 20 D. 48, 30 Scot. Jur. 27; Murray v. Allan, Nov. 29, 1872, 11 Macph. 147, 45 Scot. Jur. 88; Ferguson v. M'Nab, June 12, 1885, 12 R. 1083; Hastings v. Henderson, July 15, 1890, 17 R. 1130.

LORD M'LAREN.—It was virtually admitted in the inferior Court, and was not disputed at the bar here, that the Act complained of was altogether outwith the powers of an inspector of poor acting as the sanitary authority. The Public Health Act, 1867, gives extensive powers to local authorities in connection with the removal of nuisances, subject to the approval of the Sheriff, but I agree with your Lordships that this was not a case of nuisance at all. In the present case a double error was committed, first, the error of treating as a nuisance what was not a nuisance, and secondly, that of carrying out the removal of the supposed nuisance in a way not contemplated by the statute. Now, it appears to me that when anyone is sued on account of the illegal actings of his agent, he must make up his mind whether he will adopt these actings or repudiate them. Here the Parochial Board has elected to adopt the act of their inspector, and to plead the benefit of the 118th section of the Public Health Act. I agree with your Lordships that the 118th section, wide as it is, will not exclude action where the thing complained of is something altogether outwith the powers conferred by the statute. It is not enough to entitle a local authority to the benefit of the protective clause that they choose to describe what they have done as something done in the execution of the Act. It must be something which can be represented as a proceeding taken in the execution of the statute, and where, as in the present case, there was no attempt either to carry out the procedure required by the Act or to ascertain whether the thing which it was intended to do was within the powers conferred by the Act, I cannot see that the Parochial Board is in a position to take any benefit from this protective clause. I think that if the Parochial Board had looked at the statute, as they were bound to do, they could not have failed to see that it gave them no authority to demolish houses. The same reasoning applies to the limitation as to the time within which proceedings may be brought, for it is a limitation of actions directed against persons acting under the Act, and consequently has no application where the person has been acting altogether outwith the authority of the Act. I further agree with your Lordships in thinking that the damages should be assessed at £10.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the Public Health Act of 1867 gives no power to local authorities to demolish houses on the ground that they are in a state dangerous to public safety. It therefore appears to me that there can be no effectual defence here on the ground that the defenders are entitled to the statutory protection against the consequences of irregularities committed in the execution of the Act, for what they have done cannot with propriety be described as an irregularity committed in the execution of the Act; on the contrary, it was something altogether beyond the scope and powers of the Act. Counsel were unable to refer to any provision in the statute which gave even the colour of a warrant for what the defenders have done. I therefore think that the defenders ought to be found liable in damages, which I concur with your Lordship in thinking should be assessed at £10.

No. 164.
June 2, 1891.
Edwards v. Parochial Board of Kinloss.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff; found in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute; found that the proceedings of the defenders did not fall within the scope of the Public Health Act, 1867, and were unwarrantable in law; sustained the first plea in law for the pursuers, repelled the pleas stated for the defenders, and assessed the damage at £10 sterling.

A. J. & J. DICKSON, W.S.—R. STEWART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 165.
June 2, 1891.
Jardine v. Grant.

SIR ROBERT JARDINE, Bart., AND OTHERS, First Parties.—C. J. Guthrie. SIR ARTHUR HENRY GRANT, Bart., Second Party.—Asher—G. R. Gillespie. CHARLES MICHELL AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—W. C. Smith—John Wilson.

Entail—Heir in possession—Provisions to children, authority to charge fee and rents with, by bond and disposition in security—Entail Amendment Act 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 21.—A deed of entail, dated in 1769, conferred power upon heirs of entail to grant provisions to their younger children "to affect the rents of the lands, . . . such provision to be given by each heir of tailzie to his or her children, . . . not exceeding three years' rent of the estate, and which provisions shall only affect the persons of the succeeding heirs of tailzie possessing the estate and the rents thereof, to the extent of one-half of whatever the heir does possess yearly, and any estate, real or personal, belonging to them, other than the said entailed estate or rents thereof, until the provisions given in manner foresaid to the children of the former heirs of entail shall be satisfied and paid, at least shall affect the same no further than to the extent of what shall have been paid, or otherways extinguished, of the provisions given to the children of the former heir, so that the whole provisions shall at no time exceed the sum of three years' rent."

In 1818 A, the heir of entail then in possession, granted a bond of provisions to his younger children to the amount of three years' rents. B, the succeeding heir, possessed from 1820 to 1859 without having paid off any of the bond.

C, the next heir, having in 1889 presented a petition for disentail, the question arose whether the bond was one which could be made to affect the fee of the estate under sec. 21 of the Rutherfurd Act.* C contended that it could not

* The Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 21, enacts that "in all cases where an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland shall be liable to pay or to provide by assignation of the rents and proceeds of such estate for any sum or sums of money granted by any former heir of entail, by way of provisions to younger children, in terms of the said recited Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Fourth, or in virtue of the powers to that effect contained in any deed of entail under which the heir of entail in possession holds, ... it shall be lawful for such heir of entail in possession to charge the fee and rents of such estate, other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or to charge the fee and

No. 165.

June 2, 1891.

Jardine v. Grant.

in respect that it was not intended to be a permanent burden, but to be paid off each year by the heir in possession to the amount of one-half of the rents, and that B's representatives were liable for the debt. Held that the bond was one which could have been made to affect the fee of the estate under sec. 21 of the Rutherfurd Act, and that it fell to be paid by the disentailer.

2D DIVISION. M.

On 4th January 1889 Sir Arthur Henry Grant, Bart., heir in possession of the entailed estates of Monymusk and others in Aberdeenshire, presented a petition for disentail under the Entail Amendment Act of 1848.

On 5th February the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) remitted the petition to Mr H. B. Dewar, S.S.C., for inquiry and report.

Mr Dewar reported that, in his opinion, a sum of £10,857 contained in the schedule of debts could not be made to affect the entailed estate.

This sum was contained in a bond of provision granted in 1818 by Sir Archibald Grant, then heir of entail in possession of the estates, as a provision for his younger children in virtue of powers contained in a deed of entail executed on 24th November 1769 by Sir Archibald Grant of Monymusk and his son, Archibald Grant.

This latter deed contained the following clause:—"And excepting also from the said restriction and limitation upon the heirs of entail power to the said heirs of tailzie above specified to give suitable provisions to their children, other than the heir of entail for the time being, to affect the rents of the lands and others contained in this deed of settlement, such provision to be given by each heir of tailzie to his or her children, other than the heir, not exceeding three years' rent of the estate, and which provisions shall only affect the persons of the succeeding heirs of tailzie possessing the estate and the rents thereof to the extent of one-half of whatever the heir does possess yearly, and any estate, real or personal, belonging to them, other than the said entailed estate or rents thereof, until the provisions given in manner foresaid to the children of the former heirs of entail shall be satisfied and paid, at least shall affect the same no further than to the extent of what shall have been paid, or otherways extinguished, of the provisions given to the children of the former heir, so that the whole provisions shall at no time exceed the sum of three years' rent."

Mr Dewar's view as to the sum in question was that it was a debt due by Sir James Grant, who had succeeded to the entailed estate in 1820 after the death of his father, Sir Archibald, the granter of the provision, and who had possessed the estate till 1859. The reporter recommended that the disentailer should grant a bond and disposition in security over the estates in favour of trustees for the £10,857, on condition (1) that in the event of its being judicially found or admitted that the sum could before the disentail have been made to affect the fee of the estates, the trustees should assign the bond to the present holders of the £10,857; (2) that if it were found or admitted that the sum could not have been made to affect the fee of the estates, and that the disentailer could not have been made liable therefor, the trustees should discharge the bond.

The interest upon the sum had been regularly paid by successive heirs of entail in possession down to Whitsunday 1889.

---

rents of any portion of such estate, other than as aforesaid, with the amount of such provisions, by granting bond and disposition in security over such estate or such portion thereof, other than as aforesaid, for such amount, with the due and legal interest thereof from the date of such bond and disposition in security, or any subsequent date, till repaid, and with corresponding penalties; and such bond and disposition in security may be in ordinary form, binding the granter and his heirs of entail, in their order successively, to repay the principal sum therein, with interest and penalties as aforesaid, . . ."

No. 165.
June 2, 1891.
Jardine v. Grant.

Objections were lodged to the report by the creditors, or representatives of creditors, in right of the sum under the bond of provision, and they maintained that the disentailer was not entitled to disentail until he had executed in their favour bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security in common form for the whole sums due to them.

In conformity with the report, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 29th October 1889, granted authority to disentail the lands of Monymusk, but superseded extract of the interlocutor until a trust-bond and disposition in security for the £10,857, with interest, in the terms recommended by the reporter, should be executed by the disentailer.

A reclaiming note was presented against this judgment, but was withdrawn on its being arranged that the disentailer should grant the bond in terms of the report.

On 18th December 1889 the bond and disposition in security was granted, and the instrument of disentail was thereupon recorded by authority of the Court.

The free rental of the estate was at this time about £6100, and the £10,857 was the only debt affecting the fee of the estate. The capital value of the estate was about £170,800.

To determine the question raised by Mr Dewar as to who was liable to the creditors in right of the £10,857, a special case was presented to the Court by (first) the creditors or representatives of creditors in right of the £10,857; (second) by the disentailer, Sir Arthur Grant; and (third) by the personal representatives of Sir James Grant, who (as already stated) had succeeded the granter of the provision in 1820.

The first and third parties maintained that the provision affected, or could before the disentail have been made to affect, the fee of the entailed estate, or the heirs of entail in possession of the same.

The second party maintained that the representatives of Sir James Grant were liable to pay off and satisfy the provision.

The questions of law were:—"(1) At the date of the disentail executed by the second party, did the said sum of £10,857 affect, or could it have been made to affect, the fee of the entailed lands of Monymusk, or the heirs of entail possessing the same? (2) If and in so far as the first question is answered in the negative, are the third parties liable in payment of the said sum, or any, and what part thereof?"

Argued for the second party;—The 21st section of the Rutherfurd Act did not contemplate provisions of a qualified nature, but only provisions which in accordance with the terms of the entail formed a continuous or indefinite burden upon the rents and proceeds of the estate. That had been established in Campbell's[1] case, where the deed of entail provided that the provisions for younger children should not affect the estate for a longer period than twenty-five years after the granter's death, and in Baillie's[2] case, in which there was a provision in the deed for payment of the amount of the provision by instalments. The question then came to be whether the provision in the present deed was of a qualified or terminable nature. It clearly was so. Power was given to affect the rents, and the rents only. Each heir of entail in succession had the power to grant provisions up to three years' rent, and he was liable to pay the bond by instalments of one-half of the yearly rents so as to give the succeeding heirs a chance of exercising the power each in their turn. The creditor's right was limited to a demand against the heir in possession at [1] Campbell, Jan. 26, 1854, 16 D. 396, per Lord Rutherfurd, 402, 26 Scot. Jur. 188.

[2] Baillie, Feb. 4, 1854, Duncan's Manual on Entail, p. 339.

No. 165.

June 2, 1891.
Jardine v. Grant.

the time for one-half of the annual income if there was no other estate, real or personal. The bond, in short, was not to be permanent, but it was contemplated that each provision should be paid off at a certain rate, one set nearly exhausted and another set coming on. [LORD YOUNG.—Supposing the creditor in the bond neglects to exact from the heir in possession at the time the one-half of the annual income to which you say his right under the bond is limited, and the heir dies in default, what is the legal result?] The creditor loses his right so far as the heir in possession is concerned, and his only recourse will be against the personal representatives of the deceased. [LORD YOUNG.—Is that not extravagant?] It is only an implication of what was expressly contained in the deed of entail in Baillie's case. The cases of Seymer[1] and Hope Johnstone[2] were inapplicable. In the former case the Lord Ordinary (Kinloch) was of opinion that it fell to be distinguished from the two cases already cited, inasmuch as the provision was made a general burden on the heir of entail, and was a burden not removable until the provision was fully satisfied. There was, too, no provision for extinction of the burden once created either by mention of a term of years or by payment by instalments. In Hope Johnstone's case each succeeding heir was entitled to burden up to three years' rent, under deduction of the interest already paid on previous provisions by previous heirs of entail. In the present case there could only be one bond for three years' rent effectual at the time against the heir in possession. The provisions were then not capable of being made to affect the fee of the estate under the Act, and the third parties were liable to pay them off.

Counsel for the first and third parties were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The deed of entail before us is somewhat obscurely expressed, but presents, in my opinion, little difficulty as regards the point which has been argued by Mr Gillespie. The question is whether the sum of £10,857 which was placed as a burden upon the lands and estate of which the second party is now fee-simple proprietor is to be dealt with as no longer due by him as heir of entail coming into possession of the estate with that burden upon it.

I do not find in the language of the deed which empowered the granting of the provision anything to indicate that if the creditor in the bond failed to exact from the heir of entail in possession during the lifetime of the latter the amount of the debt, the creditor's right was annulled as against the heir.

I do not see any distinction between this case and the case of Hope Johnstone. The first question must be answered in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I think the matter is very clear. The only argument which has been stated against the validity of the bond of provision as a charge upon the rents of the estate of which the second party is now fee-simple proprietor is based upon the clause in the deed of entail which protects any heir in possession for the time being from being compelled to pay yearly in extinction of the bond of provision more than one-half of the rent of the estate.

In the view which I take of that clause it is simply one for the protection of the heir in possession against the hardship of the creditor in the bond pressing him for payment beyond half of his income from the estate.

---

[1] Seymer, Jan. 29, 1859, 21 D. 361.

[2] Hope Johnstone v. Hope Johnstone, Nov. 27, 1880, 8 R. 160.

No. 165.
June 2, 1891.
Jardine v. Grant.

We are asked, however, to infer from the clause that if the creditor does not press him and exact payment to that extent of one-half of the yearly rent, then the creditor's right is annulled, so far as the heir of entail at all events is concerned, or that it will only exist against the personal representatives of the deceased heir. In my opinion, that is an erroneous and extravagant inference.

I have already indicated my opinion during the argument that the provision is a perfectly good charge against the entailed estate. It falls, therefore, to be paid by the disentailing heir.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion as Lord Young.

THE COURT answered the first of the questions in the affirmative, and found and declared accordingly.

JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 166.
une 5, 1891.
Maclean v. Maclean.

ALEXANDER JOHN HEW MACLEAN AND HIS TUTORS, First Parties.—Ure—Macpherson.
SELINA PHILIPPA DICKEN OR MACLEAN, Second Party.—Salvesen—C. K. Mackenzie.

Succession—Will—Revocation—Whether words revoking "previous testaments" revoked a revocable bond of annuity to take effect at death of granter.—The heir in possession of an entailed estate granted in favour of his wife a bond of annuity under the Aberdeen Act providing her an annuity out of the estate "during all the days of her life after my decease, in case she shall survive me." He reserved power to revoke the bond.

Subsequently he executed a trust-disposition and settlement prepared by a law-agent, whereby he revoked "all previous settlements and all writings of a testamentary nature, with the exception of" the bond of annuity.

By a later holograph will he revoked "all previous wills or testaments." Held that the holograph will did not revoke the bond of annuity.

2D DIVISION. M.

ON 16th July 1881, the late Alexander Thomas Maclean, one of the Judges of the High Court, Calcutta, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Ardgour, executed a bond of annuity under the Aberdeen Act over Ardgour in favour of his wife, Mrs Selina Philippa Dicken or Maclean, to the extent of one-third of the free rental "during all the days of her life, in case she shall survive me," as in full satisfaction of her legal rights, but excepting her right to an annuity as his widow from the Indian Civil Service fund. The bond reserved power to the granter "to revoke or alter these presents in whole or in part." Mr Maclean held the estate of Ardgour under an entail which excluded terce, and he had no marriage-contract.

On 19th August 1882, Mr Maclean executed a trust-disposition and settlement, prepared by a law-agent, containing a clause by which he revoked "all previous settlements and all writings of a testamentary nature, with the exception of a bond of annuity in favour of my wife, dated 16th July 1881."

On 29th November 1889, Mr Maclean executed a holograph will dealing with his whole estate, and containing this clause, "I revoke all previous wills or testaments."

By this will he gave his widow the liferent of his whole estate during her widowhood.

Mr Maclean died on 14th December 1890, survived by his widow and

No. 166.

June 5, 1891.
Maclean v. Maclean.

four children. He was succeeded in the entailed estate by his son, Alexander John Hew Maclean, who was born on 1st December 1880. Mr Maclean's personal estate amounted to about £14,000. The free yearly value of the estate of Ardgour was between £1300 and £1400.

A special case was presented by Alexander John Hew Maclean and his tutors and curators, first parties, and by Mrs Selina Philippa Dicken or Maclean, second party.

The first parties maintained that the bond of annuity was revoked by the holograph will of 29th November 1889, and Mrs Maclean maintained that it was not.

This question of law was stated:—"Does the holograph will, dated 29th November 1889, revoke the bond of annuity dated 16th July 1881?"

Argued for first parties;—The bond of annuity must be treated as testamentary for two reasons,—(first) because it was expressed in testamentary language; and (second) because it was clear that Mr Maclean so considered it. He referred to it as such in his settlement of 1882, when he excepted it from his revocation of "previous writings of a testamentary nature." The expression in the will of 1889 "all previous wills and testaments" must apply to the bond of annuity, for it was plural, and no other writings existed save that bond and the settlement of 1882.

The second party was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I doubt if we can legitimately interpret the words of the will of 1889 by the words of the revoked deed of 1882. Taking as they stand the words of the holograph will of 1889, "I revoke all previous wills or testaments," I am of opinion that they cannot be said to revoke the bond of annuity. The revocation is a revocation of testamentary writings, and this bond of annuity, though it may to some extent partake of a testamentary character, is not, as I think, a testamentary writing in the ordinary sense of that term. I therefore think that the question ought to be answered in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I do not go into the question whether we ought to interpret the words of the will of 1889 by using as a glossary for that purpose the expression in that of 1882 which has been referred to. I wish to guard myself against being supposed to have any decided opinion upon that question. I see two difficulties in deciding upon it, first, that there is no ambiguity in the language of the will of 1889, and we generally look to extrinsic evidence only where there is such ambiguity. Again, it is doubtful enough whether we ought to refer for interpreting a holograph writing to a formal deed prepared by a professional man.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur that the question should be answered in the affirmative. I think it quite clear that the bond of annuity was not revoked.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S., Agents.

No. 167.

June 6, 1891.
Mouat v. Lee.

MISS MARGARET A. C. MOUAT, Pursuer (Respondent).—Dickson.
WILLIAM LEE, Defender (Appellant).—M'Kechnie—M'Lennan.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Citation—Registered letter—Debts Recovery Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 26)—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77), sec. 3.—The proprietor of a fishing station brought an action under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, in the Sheriff Court of the county in which the station was situated, against his tenant, for arrears of rent. At the date of the summons the defender was in possession of the fishing station, and had thereon fish-curing stock and plant, but had ceased to carry on active operations. He was resident in another sheriffdom, and was cited by means of a registered letter sent by the agent of the pursuer. The defender pleaded (1) no jurisdiction, in respect that he had no domicile, and was not carrying on business in the county; and (2) that he had not been properly cited. Held (1) that the Sheriff had jurisdiction, and (2) that the citation was valid.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Caithness, Orkney, and Zetland. C.

ON 10th January 1891 Miss Margaret A. C. Mouat, of Bressay, Zetland, brought a summons under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, in the Sheriff Court at Lerwick, against William Lee, designed in the summons as "fish-curer, Baltasound, Unst, Zetland, residing at Fraserburgh," concluding for payment of £30 as the year's rent of the fishing station at Baltasound due at Martinmas 1889.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—1. No jurisdiction, in respect (1) that the defender has no domicile in Zetland or place of business there; (2) that he has not carried on a trade or business within the said county since the month of August 1889; and (3) that he has not been cited to appear in this action, either personally or at his place of business within said county; (4) citation by law-agent incompetent.

The parties by minute admitted;—"(1) That the defender, who resides in Fraserburgh, holds a lease of the fish-curing station mentioned in the summons, for a term of five years from and after 1st June 1889, at the yearly rent of £30, payable at Martinmas, beginning the first payment at Martinmas 1889; (2) that the defender entered on the possession of the station, as a fish-curer, and cured herrings thereon during the year 1889; (3) that the defender has not been removed from said station, nor renounced his lease; (4) that the sum sued for is the rent due for the first year of the lease; (5) that since then the defender has not carried on active operations on the station, but has been in possession thereof, and has thereon fish-curing stock and plant; (6) that the summons was served by the pursuer's agent by registered letter."

The execution returned by the agent bore that the registered letter had been addressed "Mr William Lee, fish-curer, Baltasound, Unst, Zetland, residing at Fraserburgh."

On 4th February 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) repelled the defender's first plea, and on 18th February granted decree as concluded for, with expenses.

On 25th February the Sheriff (Thoms) adhered.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff had no jurisdiction to entertain the present action. The circumstance that the defender was the tenant of a heritable subject within the sheriffdom was not per se sufficient to give the Sheriff jurisdiction.[1] Nor was the case within the 46th section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876.* For, in the first place, the [1] M'Bey v. Knight, Nov. 22, 1879, 7 R. 255.

* The Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 46, enacts,—"A person carrying on a trade or business, and having a place of business within a county, shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff thereof in any action, notwithstanding that he has his domicile in another county, provided he shall be cited to appear in such action either personally or at his place of business."

defender, though he might have a place of business within the county, was not at the date of the action carrying on business there; in the second place, he had not been cited personally or at his place of business; and thirdly, it was plain from the 2d and 3d sections of the Act* that the word "action," in section 46, meant action in the Sheriff's ordinary Court, i.e., under his common law jurisdiction, and did not include actions under such statutory jurisdictions as that of the Debts Recovery Court. The citation therefore was bad, as the warrant to cite had proceeded from a Court which had no jurisdiction. But even if the Sheriff had jurisdiction, the citation nevertheless was bad. The Citation Amendment Act, 1882,† introduced a new form of citation—by registered letter—but it had no effect in enlarging the powers of a Court to grant warrant to cite, and a Sheriff had no power at common law to grant warrants to cite persons beyond his territory. The 2d subsection of section 12 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876,‡ did not apply to the present case, for that section, like section 46 of the same Act, applied only to ordinary Sheriff Court actions, as was plain from the terms of subsection 2, which dealt with the service of "petitions," whereas the writ here was a summons.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was no direct authority for holding that a Sheriff had jurisdiction to entertain an action for the recovery of the rent of heritable subjects within his territory,—probably because the usual course was to sequestrate for the rent,—but the fair result of the authorities was that he had.[1] At all events he had jurisdiction under sec. 46 of the Sheriff Court Act, and any objection to the citation was cured by sec. 12, subsec. 2, of the same Act. Both these sections, whatever might have been the case originally, now applied to actions in the

---

* The Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, sec. 2, enacts that, "unless where otherwise expressly provided, this Act shall only apply to civil proceedings in the ordinary Sheriff Court"; and sec. 3 enacts,—"Action includes every civil proceeding competent in the ordinary Sheriff Court."

† The Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77), sec. 3, enacts,—"In any civil action or proceeding in any Court, or before any person or body of persons having by law power to cite parties or witnesses, any summons or warrant of citation of a person, whether as a party or witness, or warrant of service or judicial intimation, may be executed in Scotland by an officer of the Court from which such summons, warrant, or judicial intimation was issued, or other officer who according to the present law and practice might lawfully execute the same, or by an enrolled law-agent, by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant, or judicial intimation is to be served, or to his last known address, if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation, or to the office of the keeper of edictal citations where the summons, warrant, or judicial intimation is required to be sent to that office, a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons or other document required by law in the particular case to be served, with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, or containing such other citation or notice as may be required in the circumstances, and such posting shall constitute a legal and valid citation, unless the person cited shall prove that such letter was not left or tendered at his known residence or place of business, or at his last known address if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation."

‡ The Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, sec. 12, subsec. 2, enacts,—"A party who appears shall not be permitted to state any objection to the regularity of the execution or service as against himself of the petition by which he is convened."

[1] Aberdeen Railway Co. v. Ferrier, Jan. 28, 1854, 16 D. 422, 26 Scot. Jur. 198; Young v. Livingstone, March 13, 1860, 22 D. 983, 32 Scot. Jur. 417; Harris v. Gillespie, Cathcart, & Fraser, July 20, 1875, 2 R. 1003.

No. 167.

June 6, 1891.
Mouat v. Lee.

Debts Recovery Court. For the Small-Debt Amendment Act, 1889,[1] incorporated these sections expressly, and the Debts Recovery Act, 1867,[2] having incorporated the procedure sections of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, secs. 12 and 46 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1867, were also to be read into the Debts Recovery Act by implication. The requirements of sec. 46 had been fulfilled. Although the defender had not been cited personally or at his residence, he had been cited by registered letter, which must now be held as equivalent to the other modes of citation.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As regards the objection which has here been taken to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, I have really been unable to understand upon what it is founded. The action is one for the recovery of a year's rent of a fishing station in Shetland, and the sum sued for is £30. The Sheriff undoubtedly in all ordinary cases has jurisdiction to entertain actions for the recovery of the rent of heritable subjects in his county, and I can discover no peculiarity in the present case to take it out of the general rule. The only question of any interest here is as to whether the defender has been properly cited. I am of opinion that the citation is perfectly good. It appears from the minute of admissions that the defender has a place of business in the county—the fish-curing station, the rent of which is sued for; that he entered into possession of that station and cured herrings there in 1889; and that he is still in possession and keeps his fish-curing stock and plant there. It is also admitted that the summons was served upon the defender by means of registered letter, which is now sanctioned by statute as an effectual form of citation. I am therefore for adhering.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The action is just an action for the recovery of the rent of a heritable subject. It is an action for the rent of a fish-curing station, which I suppose means a house and ground adapted for that purpose; and that is exactly the same thing, as far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned, as an action for the rent of a farm, and it is needless to dispute the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to entertain such an action when the farm is within his county. I have therefore no doubt about the jurisdiction of the Sheriff.

The only other question is as to whether the defender has been properly cited. In my opinion the 3d section of the Citation Amendment Act, 1882, applies to the present case. The language of the section is very wide—(His Lordship then quoted the section). The objection to the present citation is that the summons was sent by the pursuer's agent in a registered letter instead of being served by an officer of Court, but that is just what the Act allows. I therefore think that this objection also fails.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and I only desire to add that if the question of jurisdiction had depended on the 46th section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, I should, for myself, have been of opinion that there was here a sufficient citation of the defender within the meaning of that section, for the defender does not say that he has not received the summons, but only objects to the person by whom the service was made.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

TORRY & SYM, W.S.—J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26, sec. 5.
[2] 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 96, secs. 3 and 5.

ALEXANDER SUMMERS AND OTHERS (Owners of the "Restless Wave") AND THE NORTH BRITISH FISHING BOAT INSURANCE COMPANY, Complainers (Reclaimers).—Murray—Salvesen.
PETER BUCHAN AND OTHERS (Owners of the "Christina"), Respondents.—Jameson—Shaw.

No. 168.
June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

Ship—Salvage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 460—Jurisdiction.—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 460, enacts that "whenever any dispute arises" as to salvage between the owners of the salved ship or boat and the salvors, and the parties cannot agree as to the settlement thereof by arbitration or otherwise—"then, if the sum claimed does not exceed £200, such dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of any two Justices of the Peace resident . . . at or near the place where such ship or boat is lying, or at or near the first port or place in the United Kingdom into which such ship or boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident, by reason whereof the claim to salvage arises."

Held that the words "at or near the place where such ship or boat is lying" mean at or near the place where the ship is brought immediately after the accident, and do not include any place where the ship may afterwards be when a dispute arises.

Opinions that an insurance company, with which a salved vessel is insured, cannot be convened in such proceedings.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low. M.

ON 14th November 1890, Peter Buchan and others, fishermen, resident in Peterhead, the owners and crew of the fishing boat "Christina" of Peterhead, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire, at Peterhead, under the 460th and 501st sections of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854,* to determine a dispute as to salvage which they claimed from Alexander Summers and others, the owners of the "Restless Wave," another fishing boat belonging to Peterhead, the owners of the "Restless Wave" and the North British Fishing Boat Insurance Company, Peterhead, with which it was insured, being also called as defenders.

It was averred that the "Christina" had on 2d October 1890 rendered salvage services to the "Restless Wave" when about seven miles from Whitby, and had assisted her into Scarborough; that the owners of the "Christina" had requested the owners of the "Restless Wave" and the insurance company to compensate them, but that they had refused to do so, it being disputed that the services rendered were salvage services. The request for compensation was originally made and refused at Scarborough, but was renewed when both boats had returned to Peterhead.

---

* 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 460,—"Whenever any dispute arises . . . between the owners of any such ship, boat, &c. and the salvors as to the amount of salvage, and the parties to the dispute cannot agree as to the settlement thereof, by arbitration or otherwise, then, if the sum claimed does not exceed £200, such dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of any two Justices of the Peace resident as follows,—(that is to say)

"In case of wreck, resident at or near the place where such wreck is found;

"In case of services rendered to any ship or boat . . . resident at or near the place where such ship or boat is lying, or at or near the first port or place in the United Kingdom into which such ship or boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident by reason whereof the claim to salvage arises."

Sec. 501,—"All matters and things that may, in pursuance of the eighth part (in which section 460 occurs) of this Act, be done by or to any Justice or any two Justices, may in Scotland be done also by or to the Sheriff of the county, including the Sheriff-substitute."

Sec. 461 provides that the Justices may call in a person skilled in maritime affairs to act as assessor, or may appoint an umpire. The Justices are to give their decision within forty-eight hours after the matter is referred to them, and any umpire is to give his forty-eight hours after his appointment.

Sec. 464.—"No appeal shall be allowed unless the sum in dispute exceeds £50."

No. 168.

June 6, 1891. Summers v. Buchan.

When the case was called in the Sheriff Court an agent appeared for the owners of the "Restless Wave" and the company, and objected that there was no jurisdiction against them in respect of the claim made, and that, in any event, the insurance company could not be sued in any such proceedings. The Sheriff-substitute (Grierson) repelled the objections, and ordered proof.

The owners of the "Restless Wave" and the insurance company then raised on 26th December a process of suspension and interdict against the owners of the "Christina" and the Sheriff-substitute to interdict the proceedings in the Sheriff Court. They set forth the circumstances already narrated, and in regard to the position of the insurance company they explained, while admitting that the local agent for the fishermen complainers was secretary of the company, that the respondents on their return to Peterhead called upon this agent and made a claim against the company, and that he made them an offer, which they declined.

The complainers pleaded;—(2) The said Sheriff-substitute having no jurisdiction under said sections of the Merchant Shipping Act to act as arbiter in said dispute, should be interdicted from proceeding therein.

The respondents pleaded;—(3) The proceedings complained of being well founded, both at common law and under the Merchant Shipping Acts, the note falls to be refused.

The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 6th January 1891, upon caution passed the note and granted interim interdict, and on 19th March 1891 repelled the reasons of suspension, recalled the interim interdict, and refused the note.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The complainers' contention was this:—Under the 460th section the claim may be brought before two Justices resident either, first, at or near the place where the boat is lying; or second, at or near the first port or place where the boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident. The complainers maintain that the concluding words 'after the occurrence, &c.' apply to both alternatives, and that the first alternative, the place where the boat is lying, contemplates the boat saved being beached, and not brought into any port.

"I cannot accept this construction of the statute. If the first alternative was inserted to meet the case of the boat being beached, it was unnecessary, because the words of the second alternative, the first place where the boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident, are clearly applicable to such a state of matters; but, further, the claim is to be referred, 'whenever any dispute arises, . . . and the parties cannot agree as to the settlement thereof,' and it is then to be referred to two Justices resident 'at or near the place where the ship or boat is lying.' The time is when the dispute arises, and the place is where the boat is then lying. The dispute in the present case arose when the boat was lying at Peterhead, and, therefore, the claim fell to be referred to two Justices resident at or near Peterhead, or to the Sheriff of the county.

"The complainers further contended that the Legislature could not intend that the salvors should be entitled to bring their claim at any place where the boat saved might happen to be, no matter how far that place might be from the scene of the salvage, and the residence of the witnesses whose evidence might be necessary to the determination of the claim. I do not think that considerations of supposed convenience, even if they were stronger than they are in the present case, could prevail against what, in my judgment, is the plain meaning of the words of the Act; but it is not unimportant to observe that in England it is expressly provided by statute that the claim may be brought at the place where the vessel is when proceedings were instituted. By the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 63, sec. 49, it is made competent for a County Court Judge to exercise the same jurisdiction in salvage cases as is given to two Justices. This provision is analogous to that of the 501st sec. of the Merchant Shipping Act in regard to Sheriffs in Scotland. Then, by Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 71, certain provisions are made for the exercise by the County Court of Admiralty jurisdiction, and by the 21st sec. it is enacted that proceedings shall be commenced '(1) in

No. 168.
June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

The complainers appealed, and argued;—(1) The statute contemplated a speedy and informal award to be made on the spot. The terms of the 461st section, in which it was implied that a decision on any dispute should be given within forty-eight hours of the reference being made, shewed that "lying" in the statute did not mean lying at the time of the dispute, but lying immediately after the occurrence. It was not solely intended to meet the case of a boat being beached, as the Lord Ordinary thought. The case of a ship being damaged and salved while lying in a dock would be a case covered by it. (2) The clause was limited to questions with the owners of vessels. The company were not owners, hence these statutory proceedings could not be taken against them.

The respondents argued;—The object of the statute was to give a speedy and simple remedy. That consideration met both grounds of suspension here, for where could this question be so well and cheaply decided as in Peterhead? What interest had the complainers to press either of their pleas?

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The facts out of which the present question arises seem to be these. Early in the morning of 2d October last, the "Restless Wave," a fishing-boat belonging to the complainers, was caught in a gale when about eight or nine miles off the Yorkshire coast; her mast gave way and fell over the side, leaving her, as the respondents allege, in a helpless and disabled condition. The respondents in their boat, the "Christina," observing the condition of the "Restless Wave," bore down upon her, and towed her safely into Scarborough harbour in the course of the same day. Immediately after both boats had got into Scarborough the respondents put forward a claim for salvage, but their claim as then made was not admitted. Both boats some short time thereafter proceeded to Peterhead (the port from which they both sail), and then on 14th November last the respondents commenced the proceedings complained of before the Sheriff-substitute in order to have their claim for salvage ascertained, and decree therefor pronounced. The respondents' petition to the Sheriff was the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings.'

---

"The complainers further contended that the note should be sustained, at all events to the extent of holding the proceedings in the Sheriff Court to be incompetent in so far as directed against the North British Fishing Boat Insurance Company, on the ground that it is only the owners of the boat against whom the claim of salvage lies. The boat was insured with the company for the period during which it was engaged in fishing at Scarborough, and it is not disputed that in the event of salvage being found due the company will have to pay at least three-fourths of the amount. Further, complainers' statements shew that the secretary of the company, who is also the other complainers' agent, negotiated with the respondents on the footing that the company was truly the party interested in the matter. In these circumstances, I do not think that it was unreasonable for the respondents to convene before the arbiter the party having the chief interest in securing that the question was properly laid before him. It is true that the application by which the proceedings before the Sheriff were instituted asks him to ordain the complainers, jointly and severally, to pay the salvage to the respondents. I think that probably the respondents are not entitled to decree directly against the company, but that is a matter with which I think that the Sheriff may properly be left to deal. I may add that no separate pleadings have been lodged, nor has any separate appearance been made for the company either here or in the Sheriff Court."

No. 168.
June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

founded upon the 460th and following sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The complainers objected that the Sheriff-substitute had no jurisdiction under the statute libelled, but that objection having been repelled, the complainers brought the present suspension and interdict to have the Sheriff-substitute interdicted from proceeding with the said petition. The Lord Ordinary has repelled the reasons of suspension and dismissed the note, holding that the Sheriff-substitute had and has jurisdiction to deal with the petition presented to him, under the sections of the statute there libelled and founded on. That judgment is now before us for review.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the question presented for decision depends upon the construction of the 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, but my agreement with the Lord Ordinary ends there. I cannot adopt the construction which the Lord Ordinary puts upon that section.

By the section in question it is provided that "whenever any dispute arises (with respect to salvage) between the owners of any ship . . . and the salvors, as to the amount of salvage, and the parties to the dispute cannot agree as to the settlement thereof, by arbitration or otherwise, then, if the sum claimed does not exceed £200" (which is the case here), "such dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of any two Justices of the Peace" (or in Scotland under section 501 to the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute) "resident . . . at or near the place where such ship or boat is lying, or at or near the first port or place in the United Kingdom into which such ship or boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident by reason whereof the claim to salvage arises."

The jurisdiction thus conferred is special and extraordinary. It is extraordinary in the sense that what the statute authorises the Justices or the Sheriff to do could not be done by them in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, and special in regard to the manner and time within which the jurisdiction is to be exercised,—special also in this respect that the judgment of the Justices or Sheriff on the salvor's claim is to be final in all cases where the sum awarded does not exceed £50. In short, what the statute provides for is a Court of arbitration to which the parties must submit, if its authority is invoked either by the salvor or the owner of the property salved, and by which the disputed claim shall be determined (finally as I have said in certain cases) practically at once, and without either the procedure or the necessary delay arising from the procedure of ordinary Courts of law. The respondents might have taken the benefit of this statute's provision, undoubtedly, had they chosen to do so, at Scarborough, immediately after their salvage service had been rendered. But the questions are, can they now, at Peterhead, adopt this statutory mode of having their claim determined, and has the Sheriff-substitute there any jurisdiction under the statute to entertain the respondents' demand? Both of these questions must, in my opinion, be answered in the negative. The jurisdiction conferred by the statute—extraordinary and special as I have pointed it out to be—can only be exercised by the persons, and in the circumstances, specified in the statute. According to my reading of the statute, the persons to exercise the jurisdiction are the Justices or Sheriff resident at or near the place where the salved ship is lying, or at or near the first port or place to which she has been brought after the salving,—that is to say, the Justices or Sheriff resident at or near the first port or place of safety which the salved ship has reached after or by reason of the salving, whether that place be a harbour in which she floats or a beach where she is stranded, or a dock or slip on which she has been placed

No. 168.

June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

for repair. The Lord Ordinary thinks that this statutory jurisdiction is conferred on the Justices or Sheriff resident at or near the place where the salved ship is lying when the dispute arises as to the amount of the salvors' claim, and holds that these two conditions are satisfied in the present case, because the dispute as to the salvors' claim arose at Peterhead, and the "Restless Wave" was then lying there. But I find nothing in the statute to warrant the view that the time when the dispute arises enters into the matter of conferring the jurisdiction at all. The words upon which the Lord Ordinary bases his view, and it was the view urged upon us in argument by the respondents—are these:—"Whenever any dispute arises," &c. These words, however, do not indicate a point of time; they point to a certain event. They are not equivalent to "at the time when any dispute arises," but "in the event of any dispute arising." If the Lord Ordinary's view was the right one, then the time of the dispute must be combined with the place where the salved ship is lying. You must have the dispute arising at the place where the salved ship is lying at that particular time. This might rarely occur, except in the case which I think the statute alone contemplated and provided for, namely, the salvors' claim advanced and disputed at the first place of safety to which the salved ship had been brought by the salvors. In short, I think the statute provides a special remedy for settling salvage claims, where such claims are made matter of dispute, at the place of safety to which the salved ship has first been brought after the occurrence which gives rise to the claim. If this special remedy is not then and there resorted to, the salvors' claim can only be enforced by an appeal to the ordinary Courts of law. It appears to me that this view of the statute is supported by the consideration that the Justices or Sheriff are required to issue their award within forty-eight hours of the time when the dispute has been referred to them. They are entitled, no doubt, to extend that time by a writing under their hand, but the contemplation of the statute is that the award will be issued within the time there specified. Now, such summary disposal of the dispute is quite intelligible if the dispute is to be taken up at the first place of safety which the salved ship shall reach. The salvors are there; the crew of the salved ship are also there. The salved ship itself is there, open to the inspection of the Justices, or any "person conversant with maritime affairs," whose assistance they are entitled to take. In these circumstances the Justices may quite well issue their award speedily. It is not contemplated, I think, that they shall have pleadings, lead proof, and pronounce judgment thereon as a Court of law. They are to determine as arbiters a question which it is in the interest of all concerned should be determined at once. But it is difficult to conceive how this summary mode of settling the dispute can be applied, if the dispute arises months after the salvage services have been rendered, and many miles away from the place to which the salved ship was first brought.

The Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeds upon the view that the dispute as to the salvage arose at Peterhead. But is it quite clear that that is so? It appears to me, taking the statements on record, that the dispute as to the salvage arose at Scarborough. The respondents aver that immediately after the two boats got safely into Scarborough the demand for salvage was made. The complainers admit this, and say that their answer to the demand was that it was extravagant, and if that statement is accepted then the dispute arose in Scarborough and not at Peterhead. But whether the complainers' statement is accepted as made or not, it is clear on the respondents' averments that they made their claim at Scarborough, and that their claim was not then admitted. They had undoubtedly some claim, and therefore the only question was as to its amount. Now, it seems to me that if the amount claimed was not admitted a difference or dispute as to the amount claimed at once arose. And thus the dispute as to the salvage claim arose at Scarborough, where the salved ship was lying, and the Justices at Scarborough alone had the right to determine under the statutory jurisdiction the amount to be awarded to the salvors. It is not necessary, however, to press this view after the opinion I have expressed as to the meaning of the 460th section of the Act.

No. 168.
June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

There is just one other point to be noticed. The respondents directed their petition not only against the owners of the salved ship, but against the company with which the salved ship was insured. I think it quite certain that the statutory jurisdiction does not cover such a claim. The Justices and Sheriff can only pronounce an award against the owners of the salved property, as it is only in disputes between the salvors and such owners that they are authorised to pronounce any award at all. In any view therefore, as regards the insurers, the Sheriff had no jurisdiction. But it is unnecessary to make any special finding with regard to them, for on the whole matter I am of opinion that the reasons of suspension should be sustained and the interdict formerly granted declared perpetual.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, and suspended, interdicted, prohibited, and discharged in terms of the note of suspension and interdict.

W. CROFT GRAY, B.L.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 169.
June 9, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson.

GEORGE DAVIDSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Jameson—Burnet.
ANN DAVIDSON, Defender.

Sheriff—33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, secs. 12 and 13—Appeal.—The Sheriff-substitute of a county divided into two districts by an order of a Secretary of State following on the Statute 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, refused a warrant to cite to the Court at the head burgh of the county a defender belonging to another district of the county. Held that an appeal against this refusal was incompetent.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.
I.

GEORGE DAVIDSON, residing in Aberdeen, raised an action of accounting against Ann Davidson, designed as residing at Gallahill, St Fergus, in the county of Aberdeen.

The Sheriff-substitute (Grierson), on 26th May, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard the pursuer's agent on his motion for a warrant to cite the defender to the Court at Aberdeen in respect of the order of the Secretary of State, of date 10th June 1885, refuses the same."*

* An order by a Secretary of State, on 10th June 1885, bore that the Secretary prescribed "that, from and after the date hereof, the following arrangements shall take effect with respect to the Sheriff Courts in the Peterhead district of the county of Aberdeen:—(1) All cases, civil and criminal, arising in the district of the county of Aberdeen, hitherto known as the Peterhead district, shall be called, tried, and proceeded with within the said district. (2) A Court shall be held at Peterhead once a-week, on a stated day, during three weeks out of every four, according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Sheriff,

No. 169.
June 9, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff had power to cite all persons within his jurisdiction to his head burgh.[1] This warrant should have been granted, and the defender after being cited could appeal to the discretion of the Sheriff to order the action to proceed elsewhere. The present case must be taken on the same footing as if the action had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, or for any other cause.[2] [LORD YOUNG.—But this action has not been dismissed. If the Sheriff-substitute had added the words "dismisses the action," you might have had an appeal, for then he would have disposed of the whole merits of the case.] But there was a difficulty in point of process, for an action could not be dismissed till it was in Court, and, without a warrant of citation, the action could not be brought into Court. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I do not at present see why you should not get the action dismissed, and then I think we could probably deal with it.] In substance that was what had been done.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we must dismiss the appeal as incompetent.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

HENRY & SCOTT, W.S., Agents.

No. 170.
June 10, 1891.
M'Lean v. M'Lean.

MRS FLORA M'LEAN AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Mackay—W. Campbell.
MALCOLM M'LEAN AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—M'Kechnie—Craigie.

Lease—Crofter—Bequest of holding—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29), sec. 16.—Held (1) that the power conferred on a crofter under section 16* of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, of

---

for the despatch of all business, civil and criminal, competent in the Sheriff Court."

[1] Tait v. Johnston, Feb. 28, 1891, 18 R. 606.

[2] Whyte v. Gerard, Nov. 30, 1861, 24 D. 102, 34 Scot. Jur. 58.

* The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29), sec. 16, enacts,—"A crofter may by will, or other testamentary writing, bequeath his right to his holding to one person, being a member of the same family, that is to say, his wife, or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy (hereinafter called the 'legatee'), subject to the following provisions:—

"(a) The legatee shall intimate the testamentary bequest to the landlord . . . within twenty-one days after the death of the crofter. . . .

"(d) If the landlord . . . intimates that he objects to receive the legatee as crofter in the holding, the legatee may present a petition to the Sheriff praying for decree declaring that he is the crofter therein as from the date of the death of the deceased crofter, of which petition due notice shall be given to the landlord . . . and if any reasonable ground of objection is established to the satisfaction of the Sheriff he shall declare the bequest to be null and void . . .

"(g) If the legatee shall accept the bequest, and the bequest is not declared to be null and void as aforesaid, the legatee shall be entitled to possess the holding on the same terms and conditions as if he had been the nearest heir of the crofter.

"(h) If the legatee does not accept the bequest, or if the bequest is declared to be null and void as aforesaid, the right to the holding shall descend to the heir of the crofter in the same manner as if the bequest had not been made."

No. 170. June 10, 1891. M'Lean v. M'Lean. 1st Division. Sheriff of Argyllshire. C.

bequeathing his holding was validly exercised in favour of a niece, although there were in existence sons and daughters of the crofter.

NEIL M'LEAN, a crofter, Cornaigbeg, Tiree, died, survived by two sons and five daughters, and by nephews and nieces.

He left a deed of settlement, dated 1st October 1890, in which he bequeathed to his niece, Flora M'Lean (a daughter of one of his brothers), his right to his holding under the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886,* as her own absolute property. The bequest was duly intimated to the landlord in terms of the statute, and he expressed his willingness to accept her as tenant.

In December 1890 Flora M'Lean, with the concurrence and consent of her husband and the executors under the will of the deceased, presented a petition of removing from the dwelling-house and lands of the croft of Cornaigbeg, against Malcolm M'Lean, the eldest son of the deceased, and Margaret M'Lean, one of the daughters of the deceased.

The pursuers founded upon the deed of settlement in favour of Flora M'Lean, and pleaded;—The female pursuer having the sole legal right and title to the holding of crofts at Cornaigbeg aforesaid, which belonged to the deceased, is entitled to decree as prayed for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The bequest founded on is null and void, in respect that the female pursuer is not a member of the same family as the deceased Neil M'Lean, and that nearer heirs have not failed. (3) The female pursuer does not possess the qualification of a legatee required by section 16 of the "Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886," and the bequest to her is null and void. (4) The defender being the eldest lawful son and nearest lawful heir of the deceased Neil M'Lean, is entitled to retain possession of the said croft.

On 10th March 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Maclachlan) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the deceased Neil M'Lean, crofter, Cornaigbeg, Tiree, by his settlement, dated 1st October 1890, bequeathed his right to the holding possessed by him at Cornaigbeg aforesaid to his niece, Mrs Flora M'Lean, the female pursuer: Finds that the said Mrs Flora M'Lean does not possess the qualification of a legatee required by section 16 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and that said bequest is insufficient to exclude the claim of the defender Malcolm M'Lean, as eldest son and heir to the deceased, to the said holding: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."†

---

* Quoted supra, p. 885, note.

† "NOTE.—By section 16 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, a crofter is empowered to bequeath his holding to one person being a member of the same family, and the question is whether a niece can be so considered when the deceased has left sons and daughters. The section defines a member of the same family as meaning the wife or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to the crofter in the case of intestacy. If this were to mean, as the pursuers contend, any who might succeed in the hypothetical case of there being no nearer heirs in existence, it would leave the power of bequest practically unlimited, and the section itself would be meaningless, because any person, however distantly related, might claim to be included in this description. It is not difficult, however, to come to the conclusion that by the above expression is meant those who would succeed in the case of intestacy, nearer heirs having failed—that is to say, the next of kin—and that the nearer heirs must fail before the holding can be bequeathed to more distant relatives. In the present case the deceased's next of kin are his sons and daughters, including the issue of any that may have predeceased him, and it is only when those fail that a niece can be included among the next of kin or have the holding bequeathed to her."

No. 170.
June 10, 1891.
M'Lean v. M'Lean.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—There was no trace in the Act of any intention on the part of the Legislature to restrict the crofter's choice in the bequest of his croft at his death. He might bequeath it to his wife or to any person of the same family. The word "family" included the whole series of persons standing in the order of intestate succession as heirs. The contention that the bequest was limited to the person who happened to be heir-at-law to the crofter at his death was obviously ill-founded when regard was had to the provisions contained in subsections (g) and (h) of the 16th section. These provisions contemplated that the legatee need not necessarily be the nearest heir-at-law in order to have right to the bequest.

Argued for the defenders;—Upon a sound construction of the 16th section all the nearest heirs must be exhausted before any person other than the wife or eldest son could succeed. In that view the pursuer could not have the croft bequeathed to her until the heir-at-law and those nearer than her in blood to the deceased were dead.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question which we have to determine is as to the construction of the 16th section of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, which provides that "a crofter may, by will or other testamentary writing bequeath his right to his holding to one person, being a member of the same family, that is to say, his wife, or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy (hereinafter called the 'legatee') subject to the following provisions."

Now, the power of bequest is limited thus. It must be exercised in favour of one person—to prevent the subdivision of crofters' holdings—and that one person must be a member of the same family. It may be his wife, but the only other person suggested in the section is a person who, "failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy."

Now, I do not think that the Act means the existing nearest heir. On the contrary, I think the language is repugnant to such a construction. It says,—"Any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed in case of intestacy." Now, a person who would not succeed except in a case of failure of nearer heirs cannot himself be the nearest heir. We must therefore look for some other person, and he is one who is not the nearest heir at present, but who, failing nearer heirs, would be in the legal order of succession ab intestato.

I entertain no doubt that that is the true meaning of the clause.

LORD ADAM.—This question depends upon the construction of the 16th section of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886. I agree with Mr M'Kechnie that the construction is clear, but I do not think that it is clear in the direction which he maintains.

The clause gives power to a crofter to leave his right to his croft to one person of the same family, who may be his wife "or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy," that is to say, any person who, if there were no nearer heirs, would be entitled to serve. There is a limitation to one person, who may be his wife, or some one else who is of the same blood as himself.

But the right is not confined to his wife and the nearest heir only, for there are subsections of the 16th section from which we find that the landlord has the right to object to the person named as legatee. But if the legatee accepts, and no objection is offered by the landlord, then the legatee is to be "entitled to possess the holding on the same terms and conditions as if he had been the nearest heir of the crofter." That plainly implies that he need not be the nearest heir, for he is to hold as if "he had been" such nearest heir. Then, again, from subsection (h) we find that if the legatee does not accept the bequest, or if the bequest is declared to be null and void, the right to the holding is to descend to the heir-at-law in the same manner as if the bequest had not been made. That, again, plainly implies that the Act contemplates that the legatee may not be the nearest heir.

No. 170.

June 10, 1891. M'Lean v. M'Lean.

LORD M'LAREN.—It seems reasonably clear that the Legislature did not intend to confine the crofter's testamentary power within such a narrow range as is implied in the construction which makes the crofter's wife and his heir-at-law the only possible objects of that bequest. If such had been the intention of the Legislature one would have expected to find a clear enactment that the crofter was to be entitled to leave his croft to his wife, and failing her that it was to descend to the heir by operation of law.

But it is plain that some selection other than the wife was intended, and it is also clear that, with the doubtful exception of the son-in-law, the person favoured must be of the blood of the testator.

It does seem strange and somewhat fanciful that the Legislature should have thought of giving the crofter the right to bequeath his croft to a person who should be distantly related to him, while withholding the power to bequeath it to a stranger.

No reason of public policy suggests itself to my mind for such a limitation of the testamentary powers, and I have sympathy with the view expressed by the Sheriff-substitute in his note on this matter. At the same time the Act does not define the class of heirs who may succeed to the bequest, and in the absence of such a definition we cannot make one. I can therefore come to no other conclusion than that anyone who is able to establish a traceable relationship with the testator is a proper object of the power of bequest conferred by the statute.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I should have no difficulty in construing the 16th section of the Act as your Lordships have done, even without referring to the subsections.

But if that were doubtful the difficulty would be entirely removed by a consideration of subsections (g) and (h) to which Lord Adam has referred.

These subsections make it clear that the legatee contemplated by the enactment is not the heir-at-law, but a legatee by whom the heir-at-law will be excluded, because the practical effect of the provision is that if the bequest is declared effectual the legatee is to have the same right to the bequest as if he were heir-at-law. If, on the other hand, the bequest is declared ineffectual, then the heir-at-law is to take the place of the legatee. How then it can be contended that no one but the heir-at-law is to take the bequest I cannot understand.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute: Sustain the plea in law stated for the pursuers, and decern."

LINDSAY, HOWE, & Co., W.S.—J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT AINSLIE BROWN, Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—Alison.
EDMUND LAMB BROWN, Defender (Reclaimer).—Strachan—Craigie.

No. 171.
June 11, 1891.
Brown v. Brown.

Prescription, Triennial—Mercantile Agency—Act 1579, c. 83.—Held that the triennial prescription did not apply to an account for commission charged by a mercantile agent on the purchase of goods wholesale.

1st DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy. C.

ON 20th August 1890 Robert Ainslie Brown, S.S.C., Edinburgh, raised an action against his brother, Edmund Lamb Brown, Sydney, New South Wales, for payment, inter alia, of £217, 5s. as commission at the rate of 2½ per cent upon the execution of orders after mentioned.

The pursuer averred, that between April 1876 and March 1886, the defender "regularly sent for and obtained, through the intervention, agency, and credit of the pursuer, large quantities of goods, amounting, with other consequent and relative disbursements, in the aggregate to £8772, 19s. 6d., conform to account after mentioned. In a letter dated 25th November 1877, with reference to the said order for goods, and a subsequent order, the defender wrote to the pursuer thus:—'I must return many thanks for your kindness in getting Matheson's goods sent off. I hope they will come safe, and trust will be able to send you the money soon, but will pay you at the rate of 6 per cent, and 2½ for your trouble. I have had an invoice from Mr Hardie, and the ship has been out 78 days now. She may be in any day. I have been thinking that you will be able to do what I have to do quite as well as he can, and if it will be the means of putting a few pounds in your way so much the better. I have paid him over £5 for the first transaction, and I may have to pay him ten times that during the year. If you think it worth your while, let me know by return. You would have nothing to do with the paying of the goods further than drawing a bill on me at six months, and, of course, seeing as to insuring and shipping. The Birmingham agents charge 2½ per cent, and I would allow 2 per cent on goods purchased through them, and 2½ on goods purchased by you, such as Matheson's, or any goods you could purchase. You would require to give me all discounts—that is, trade and cash—and then there would be a clear understanding. I hope you will undertake this, and I am quite satisfied it will be of advantage to both. There is every chance my orders will get larger every month.' This letter formed the terms on which the pursuer acted throughout for the defender. . . . The pursuer has charged interest at 5 per cent and commission at 2½ per cent, the original agreed-on rate."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The triennial prescription.

On 20th March 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the second plea in law stated for the defender, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation.*

* "OPINION.—In this case I am of opinion that the triennial prescription does not apply to the account sued for. In the first place, I incline to think that the action is laid upon a written obligation or written agreement. I do not say that it is an obligation absolutely liquid, or that the effect of the documents founded on may not be displaced by production of the further documents which the defender undertakes to produce, but the action appears to be founded on a written obligation, and I think that is enough to elide the plea of prescription.

"In the next place, the plea of prescription does not, I think, apply to a case of mercantile agency, and as I read this record, the relation of the parties was one of mercantile agency. No doubt if this had been a lawyer's account for legal business, in the course of which were included charges for commission incurred in the course of that legal business, I should have been bound to follow the case of Scott,[1] referred to by the defender, and to have held that the whole account must be dealt with as a unum quid. But here there is no mixing up

[1] Scott v. Gregory's Trustees, Feb. 24, 1832, 10 S. 375.

No. 171.

June 11, 1891.
Brown v. Brown.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) This was not a binding written contract or obligation requiring writing for its discharge. It was a mere proposal by the defender that the pursuer should conduct business on certain terms for the defender, and the proposal had never been accepted in writing.[1] It had been held that the statute applied to such a transaction.[2] Chisholm's case[3] differed from this. In it there was a concluded contract to hire the sacks on certain specific conditions. Here there was only a proposal to allow commission in certain events. (2) This was not a mercantile transaction, as the Lord Ordinary had also held. It entirely differed from the transaction in M'Kinlay's case,[4] where there was a buying and selling by commission-agents for their employers, which obviously did not fall within the statute. The pursuer was not a merchant but a lawyer, and simply interponed his credit for his brother by making cash payments on his behalf. The only commercial element was that the accounts were framed in commercial language. The claim for personal services[5] was analogous to charges of brokerage[6] or commissions on transactions, which had been held to be covered by the Act.

Argued for the pursuer;—The operation of the statute was excluded for three reasons—(1) This was a proper mercantile account for business in connection with a mercantile agency. The statute was only intended to apply to shopkeepers' accounts, or others of that class, which were usually settled without writing or receipts therefor.[7] (2) This was a case of employment of a professional person out of the ordinary line of his business.[8] In White's case,[9] on the other hand, the Act was held to apply, because the employment was in the ordinary course of the creditor's professional business. (3) The debt was founded upon "written obligation" in the sense of the statute, being such an obligation as naturally required a written discharge.[10] It was not necessary that there should be a written contract ascertaining the amount of the debt. It was enough if, as here, written obligation was the basis of it. The case of Chalmers[11] was dis-of commission with legal business. The commission charged is accessory to a proper mercantile account for mercantile business in connection with a mercantile agency, and therefore I think that I must repel the plea of prescription, and allow a proof of the averments of parties, which will, of course, be before answer, keeping everything open."

---

[1] 1 Bell's Com., 5th ed., p. 332.

[2] Chalmers v. Walker, Nov. 19, 1878, 6 R. 199; Grubb v. Porteous, March 3, 1835, 13 S. 603, 7 Scot. Jur. 293.

[3] Chisholm v. Robertson, March 10, 1883, 10 R. 760.

[4] M'Kinlay v. M'Kinlay, Dec. 11, 1851, 14 D. 162, 24 Scot. Jur. 71.

[5] Grant v. Fleming, Dec. 10, 1881, 9 R. 257, per Lord Young, p. 260.

[6] White v. Caledonian Railway Co., &c., Feb. 15, 1868, 6 Macph. 415, per Lord President, p. 419, 40 Scot. Jur. 198.

[7] 1 Bell's Com., 5th ed., p. 348; Laing and Irvine v. Anderson, &c., Nov. 10, 1871, 10 Macph. 74, per Lord President, pp. 74 and 75, 44 Scot. Jur. 53; M'Kinlay v. M'Kinlay, Dec. 11, 1851, 14 D. 162, per Lord Fullarton, p. 164; Hamilton v. Martin, Jan. 18, 1795, M. 11,120; Anderson and Child v. Wood, Jan. 18, 1809, Hume, 467.

[8] Barr v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., June 17, 1864, 2 Macph. 1250. 36 Scot. Jur. 626.

[9] White v. Caledonian Railway Co., &c., Feb. 15, 1868, 6 Macph. 415.

[10] 1 Bell's Com., 5th ed., p. 349; Blackadder v. Milne, March 4, 1851, 13 D. 820, per Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope), p. 835, 23 Scot. Jur. 373; Barr v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., supra, note 8; White v. Caledonian Railway Co., supra, note 9, per Lord President, 6 Macph. 419; Chisholm v. Robertson, supra, note 3.

[11] Chalmers v. Walker, Nov. 19, 1878, 6 R. 199, per Lord President, 201, and per Lord Shand, 202.

tinguishable. In it there was no writing signed as here by the alleged debtor. This distinction also applied to the case of Smith Sligo.[1] The present case differed from such cases as Barr,[2] where the writing referred to an antecedent contract, which was the true ground of action.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has repelled the plea of triennial prescription upon two grounds—(1) he thinks that the action is laid on a written obligation or written agreement. Now, I have some hesitation in affirming that proposition, because the document set out on record does not appear to me to contain terms of obligation at all. Proposals were put forward for certain transactions between the two parties, and the letter set forth on record gives the terms upon which the pursuer acted for the defender; but yet there was no obligation expressly constituted by that letter. I therefore hesitate to affirm that ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

But then as regards his Lordship's second ground of judgment, I entirely concur with him. If, as the Lord Ordinary has said, this had been a lawyer's account for legal business in course of which was included charges for commission, the ground of judgment could not be maintained, but "here there is," as his Lordship says, "no mixing up of commission with legal business. The commission charged is accessory to a proper mercantile account, for mercantile business, in connection with a mercantile agency." On that ground I am quite prepared to concur in the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship that, as the Lord Ordinary says, this is not a merchant's account in the sense of the prescription statute in question. It is an account in connection with a proper mercantile agency to which the statute has no application.

With reference to the other ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded, I think I should be prepared to agree with him, but it is unnecessary to give an opinion upon it, as we have already a sufficient ground of judgment.

LORD M'LAREN.—It results from the decisions that those contracts of sale which fall under the statute are, generally speaking, sales by the trader to the consumer. The mere extent of the order is immaterial. I imagine that if a contractor undertakes to supply clothes or boots for a regiment of soldiers he would be in the same position as a tailor or shoemaker who sells to individuals.

On the other hand, it has been clearly laid down in the two cases referred to (M'Kinlay and Laing) that the statute does not apply to accounts between merchant and merchant. One of these was the case of a contract between parties and their agents in Glasgow, who were remunerated by commission, and the other was a case of a contract between manufacturers and a mercantile house abroad, in which the remuneration or consideration for the contract was the price of the goods.

It appears to me that the present case belongs to the class of mercantile transactions, because, although the pursuer is not by profession a merchant, he did mercantile business with the defender, who was abroad.

As regards the other ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, it is always a difficult question to decide whether correspondence amounts to legal obligation;

[1] North British Railway Co. v. Smith Sligo, Dec. 20, 1873, 1 R. 309, per Lord Shand, p. 312.

[2] Barr v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., vide supra, p. 890, note 8.

No. 168.
June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

founded upon the 460th and following sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The complainers objected that the Sheriff-substitute had no jurisdiction under the statute libelled, but that objection having been repelled, the complainers brought the present suspension and interdict to have the Sheriff-substitute interdicted from proceeding with the said petition. The Lord Ordinary has repelled the reasons of suspension and dismissed the note, holding that the Sheriff-substitute had and has jurisdiction to deal with the petition presented to him, under the sections of the statute there libelled and founded on. That judgment is now before us for review.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the question presented for decision depends upon the construction of the 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, but my agreement with the Lord Ordinary ends there. I cannot adopt the construction which the Lord Ordinary puts upon that section.

By the section in question it is provided that "whenever any dispute arises (with respect to salvage) between the owners of any ship . . . and the salvors, as to the amount of salvage, and the parties to the dispute cannot agree as to the settlement thereof, by arbitration or otherwise, then, if the sum claimed does not exceed £200" (which is the case here), "such dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of any two Justices of the Peace" (or in Scotland under section 501 to the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute) "resident . . . at or near the place where such ship or boat is lying, or at or near the first port or place in the United Kingdom into which such ship or boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident by reason whereof the claim to salvage arises."

The jurisdiction thus conferred is special and extraordinary. It is extraordinary in the sense that what the statute authorises the Justices or the Sheriff to do could not be done by them in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, and special in regard to the manner and time within which the jurisdiction is to be exercised,—special also in this respect that the judgment of the Justices or Sheriff on the salvor's claim is to be final in all cases where the sum awarded does not exceed £50. In short, what the statute provides for is a Court of arbitration to which the parties must submit, if its authority is invoked either by the salvor or the owner of the property salved, and by which the disputed claim shall be determined (finally as I have said in certain cases) practically at once, and without either the procedure or the necessary delay arising from the procedure of ordinary Courts of law. The respondents might have taken the benefit of this statute's provision, undoubtedly, had they chosen to do so, at Scarborough, immediately after their salvage service had been rendered. But the questions are, can they now, at Peterhead, adopt this statutory mode of having their claim determined, and has the Sheriff-substitute there any jurisdiction under the statute to entertain the respondents' demand? Both of these questions must, in my opinion, be answered in the negative. The jurisdiction conferred by the statute—extraordinary and special as I have pointed it out to be—can only be exercised by the persons, and in the circumstances, specified in the statute. According to my reading of the statute, the persons to exercise the jurisdiction are the Justices or Sheriff resident at or near the place where the salved ship is lying, or at or near the first port or place to which she has been brought after the salving,—that is to say, the Justices or Sheriff resident at or near the first port or place of safety which the salved ship has reached after or by reason of the salving, whether that place be a harbour in which she floats or a beach where she is stranded, or a dock or slip on which she has been placed

No. 168.

June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

for repair. The Lord Ordinary thinks that this statutory jurisdiction is conferred on the Justices or Sheriff resident at or near the place where the salved ship is lying when the dispute arises as to the amount of the salvors' claim, and holds that these two conditions are satisfied in the present case, because the dispute as to the salvors' claim arose at Peterhead, and the "Restless Wave" was then lying there. But I find nothing in the statute to warrant the view that the time when the dispute arises enters into the matter of conferring the jurisdiction at all. The words upon which the Lord Ordinary bases his view, and it was the view urged upon us in argument by the respondents—are these:—"Whenever any dispute arises," &c. These words, however, do not indicate a point of time; they point to a certain event. They are not equivalent to "at the time when any dispute arises," but "in the event of any dispute arising." If the Lord Ordinary's view was the right one, then the time of the dispute must be combined with the place where the salved ship is lying. You must have the dispute arising at the place where the salved ship is lying at that particular time. This might rarely occur, except in the case which I think the statute alone contemplated and provided for, namely, the salvors' claim advanced and disputed at the first place of safety to which the salved ship had been brought by the salvors. In short, I think the statute provides a special remedy for settling salvage claims, where such claims are made matter of dispute, at the place of safety to which the salved ship has first been brought after the occurrence which gives rise to the claim. If this special remedy is not then and there resorted to, the salvors' claim can only be enforced by an appeal to the ordinary Courts of law. It appears to me that this view of the statute is supported by the consideration that the Justices or Sheriff are required to issue their award within forty-eight hours of the time when the dispute has been referred to them. They are entitled, no doubt, to extend that time by a writing under their hand, but the contemplation of the statute is that the award will be issued within the time there specified. Now, such summary disposal of the dispute is quite intelligible if the dispute is to be taken up at the first place of safety which the salved ship shall reach. The salvors are there; the crew of the salved ship are also there. The salved ship itself is there, open to the inspection of the Justices, or any "person conversant with maritime affairs," whose assistance they are entitled to take. In these circumstances the Justices may quite well issue their award speedily. It is not contemplated, I think, that they shall have pleadings, lead proof, and pronounce judgment thereon as a Court of law. They are to determine as arbiters a question which it is in the interest of all concerned should be determined at once. But it is difficult to conceive how this summary mode of settling the dispute can be applied, if the dispute arises months after the salvage services have been rendered, and many miles away from the place to which the salved ship was first brought.

The Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeds upon the view that the dispute as to the salvage arose at Peterhead. But is it quite clear that that is so? It appears to me, taking the statements on record, that the dispute as to the salvage arose at Scarborough. The respondents aver that immediately after the two boats got safely into Scarborough the demand for salvage was made. The complainers admit this, and say that their answer to the demand was that it was extravagant, and if that statement is accepted then the dispute arose in Scarborough and not at Peterhead. But whether the complainers' statement is accepted as made or not, it is clear on the respondents' averments that they made their claim at Scarborough, and that their claim was not then admitted. They had undoubtedly some claim, and therefore the only question was as to its amount. Now, it seems to me that if the amount claimed was not admitted a difference or dispute as to the amount claimed at once arose. And thus the dispute as to the salvage claim arose at Scarborough, where the salved ship was lying, and the Justices at Scarborough alone had the right to determine under the statutory jurisdiction the amount to be awarded to the salvors. It is not necessary, however, to press this view after the opinion I have expressed as to the meaning of the 460th section of the Act.

No. 168.
June 6, 1891.
Summers v. Buchan.

There is just one other point to be noticed. The respondents directed their petition not only against the owners of the salved ship, but against the company with which the salved ship was insured. I think it quite certain that the statutory jurisdiction does not cover such a claim. The Justices and Sheriff can only pronounce an award against the owners of the salved property, as it is only in disputes between the salvors and such owners that they are authorised to pronounce any award at all. In any view therefore, as regards the insurers, the Sheriff had no jurisdiction. But it is unnecessary to make any special finding with regard to them, for on the whole matter I am of opinion that the reasons of suspension should be sustained and the interdict formerly granted declared perpetual.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, and suspended, interdicted, prohibited, and discharged in terms of the note of suspension and interdict.

W. CROFT GRAY, B.L.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 169.
June 9, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson.

GEORGE DAVIDSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Jameson—Burnet.
ANN DAVIDSON, Defender.

Sheriff—33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, secs. 12 and 13—Appeal.—The Sheriff-substitute of a county divided into two districts by an order of a Secretary of State following on the Statute 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 86, refused a warrant to cite to the Court at the head burgh of the county a defender belonging to another district of the county. Held that an appeal against this refusal was incompetent.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.
I.

GEORGE DAVIDSON, residing in Aberdeen, raised an action of accounting against Ann Davidson, designed as residing at Gallahill, St Fergus, in the county of Aberdeen.

The Sheriff-substitute (Grierson), on 26th May, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard the pursuer's agent on his motion for a warrant to cite the defender to the Court at Aberdeen in respect of the order of the Secretary of State, of date 10th June 1885, refuses the same."*

* An order by a Secretary of State, on 10th June 1885, bore that the Secretary prescribed "that, from and after the date hereof, the following arrangements shall take effect with respect to the Sheriff Courts in the Peterhead district of the county of Aberdeen:—(1) All cases, civil and criminal, arising in the district of the county of Aberdeen, hitherto known as the Peterhead district, shall be called, tried, and proceeded with within the said district. (2) A Court shall be held at Peterhead once a-week, on a stated day, during three weeks out of every four, according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Sheriff.

No. 169.
June 9, 1891.
Davidson v. Davidson.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff had power to cite all persons within his jurisdiction to his head burgh.[1] This warrant should have been granted, and the defender after being cited could appeal to the discretion of the Sheriff to order the action to proceed elsewhere. The present case must be taken on the same footing as if the action had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, or for any other cause.[2] [LORD YOUNG.—But this action has not been dismissed. If the Sheriff-substitute had added the words "dismisses the action," you might have had an appeal, for then he would have disposed of the whole merits of the case.] But there was a difficulty in point of process, for an action could not be dismissed till it was in Court, and, without a warrant of citation, the action could not be brought into Court. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I do not at present see why you should not get the action dismissed, and then I think we could probably deal with it.] In substance that was what had been done.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we must dismiss the appeal as incompetent.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

HENRY & SCOTT, W.S., Agents.

No. 170.
June 10, 1891.
M'Lean v. M'Lean.

MRS FLORA M'LEAN AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Mackay—W. Campbell.
MALCOLM M'LEAN AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—M'Kechnie—Craigie.

Lease—Crofter—Bequest of holding—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29), sec. 16.—Held (1) that the power conferred on a crofter under section 16* of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, of

---

for the despatch of all business, civil and criminal, competent in the Sheriff Court."

[1] Tait v. Johnston, Feb. 28, 1891, 18 R. 606.

[2] Whyte v. Gerard, Nov. 30, 1861, 24 D. 102, 34 Scot. Jur. 58.

* The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 29), sec. 16, enacts,—"A crofter may by will, or other testamentary writing, bequeath his right to his holding to one person, being a member of the same family, that is to say, his wife, or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy (hereinafter called the 'legatee'), subject to the following provisions:—

"(a) The legatee shall intimate the testamentary bequest to the landlord . . . within twenty-one days after the death of the crofter. . . .

"(d) If the landlord . . . intimates that he objects to receive the legatee as crofter in the holding, the legatee may present a petition to the Sheriff praying for decree declaring that he is the crofter therein as from the date of the death of the deceased crofter, of which petition due notice shall be given to the landlord . . . and if any reasonable ground of objection is established to the satisfaction of the Sheriff he shall declare the bequest to be null and void . . .

"(g) If the legatee shall accept the bequest, and the bequest is not declared to be null and void as aforesaid, the legatee shall be entitled to possess the holding on the same terms and conditions as if he had been the nearest heir of the crofter.

"(h) If the legatee does not accept the bequest, or if the bequest is declared to be null and void as aforesaid, the right to the holding shall descend to the heir of the crofter in the same manner as if the bequest had not been made."

No. 170. June 10, 1891. M'Lean v. M'Lean. 1st Division. Sheriff of Argyllshire. C.

bequeathing his holding was validly exercised in favour of a niece, although there were in existence sons and daughters of the crofter.

NEIL M'LEAN, a crofter, Cornaigbeg, Tiree, died, survived by two sons and five daughters, and by nephews and nieces.

He left a deed of settlement, dated 1st October 1890, in which he bequeathed to his niece, Flora M'Lean (a daughter of one of his brothers), his right to his holding under the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886,* as her own absolute property. The bequest was duly intimated to the landlord in terms of the statute, and he expressed his willingness to accept her as tenant.

In December 1890 Flora M'Lean, with the concurrence and consent of her husband and the executors under the will of the deceased, presented a petition of removing from the dwelling-house and lands of the croft of Cornaigbeg, against Malcolm M'Lean, the eldest son of the deceased, and Margaret M'Lean, one of the daughters of the deceased.

The pursuers founded upon the deed of settlement in favour of Flora M'Lean, and pleaded;—The female pursuer having the sole legal right and title to the holding of crofts at Cornaigbeg aforesaid, which belonged to the deceased, is entitled to decree as prayed for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The bequest founded on is null and void, in respect that the female pursuer is not a member of the same family as the deceased Neil M'Lean, and that nearer heirs have not failed. (3) The female pursuer does not possess the qualification of a legatee required by section 16 of the "Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886," and the bequest to her is null and void. (4) The defender being the eldest lawful son and nearest lawful heir of the deceased Neil M'Lean, is entitled to retain possession of the said croft.

On 10th March 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Maclachlan) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the deceased Neil M'Lean, crofter, Cornaigbeg, Tiree, by his settlement, dated 1st October 1890, bequeathed his right to the holding possessed by him at Cornaigbeg aforesaid to his niece, Mrs Flora M'Lean, the female pursuer: Finds that the said Mrs Flora M'Lean does not possess the qualification of a legatee required by section 16 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and that said bequest is insufficient to exclude the claim of the defender Malcolm M'Lean, as eldest son and heir to the deceased, to the said holding. Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."†

---

* Quoted supra, p. 885, note.

† "NOTE.—By section 16 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, a crofter is empowered to bequeath his holding to one person being a member of the same family, and the question is whether a niece can be so considered when the deceased has left sons and daughters. The section defines a member of the same family as meaning the wife or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to the crofter in the case of intestacy. If this were to mean, as the pursuers contend, any who might succeed in the hypothetical case of there being no nearer heirs in existence, it would leave the power of bequest practically unlimited, and the section itself would be meaningless, because any person, however distantly related, might claim to be included in this description. It is not difficult, however, to come to the conclusion that by the above expression is meant those who would succeed in the case of intestacy, nearer heirs having failed—that is to say, the next of kin—and that the nearer heirs must fail before the holding can be bequeathed to more distant relatives. In the present case the deceased's next of kin are his sons and daughters, including the issue of any that may have predeceased him, and it is only when those fail that a niece can be included among the next of kin or have the holding bequeathed to her."

No. 170.

June 10, 1891.
M'Lean v. M'Lean.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—There was no trace in the Act of any intention on the part of the Legislature to restrict the crofter's choice in the bequest of his croft at his death. He might bequeath it to his wife or to any person of the same family. The word "family" included the whole series of persons standing in the order of intestate succession as heirs. The contention that the bequest was limited to the person who happened to be heir-at-law to the crofter at his death was obviously ill-founded when regard was had to the provisions contained in subsections (g) and (h) of the 16th section. These provisions contemplated that the legatee need not necessarily be the nearest heir-at-law in order to have right to the bequest.

Argued for the defenders;—Upon a sound construction of the 16th section all the nearest heirs must be exhausted before any person other than the wife or eldest son could succeed. In that view the pursuer could not have the croft bequeathed to her until the heir-at-law and those nearer than her in blood to the deceased were dead.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question which we have to determine is as to the construction of the 16th section of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, which provides that "a crofter may, by will or other testamentary writing bequeath his right to his holding to one person, being a member of the same family, that is to say, his wife, or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy (hereinafter called the 'legatee') subject to the following provisions."

Now, the power of bequest is limited thus. It must be exercised in favour of one person—to prevent the subdivision of crofters' holdings—and that one person must be a member of the same family. It may be his wife, but the only other person suggested in the section is a person who, "failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy."

Now, I do not think that the Act means the existing nearest heir. On the contrary, I think the language is repugnant to such a construction. It says,—"Any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed in case of intestacy." Now, a person who would not succeed except in a case of failure of nearer heirs cannot himself be the nearest heir. We must therefore look for some other person, and he is one who is not the nearest heir at present, but who, failing nearer heirs, would be in the legal order of succession ab intestato.

I entertain no doubt that that is the true meaning of the clause.

LORD ADAM.—This question depends upon the construction of the 16th section of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886. I agree with Mr M'Kechnie that the construction is clear, but I do not think that it is clear in the direction which he maintains.

The clause gives power to a crofter to leave his right to his croft to one person of the same family, who may be his wife "or any person who, failing nearer heirs, would succeed to him in case of intestacy," that is to say, any person who, if there were no nearer heirs, would be entitled to serve. There is a limitation to one person, who may be his wife, or some one else who is of the same blood as himself.

But the right is not confined to his wife and the nearest heir only, for there are subsections of the 16th section from which we find that the landlord has the right to object to the person named as legatee. But if the legatee accepts, and no objection is offered by the landlord, then the legatee is to be "entitled

No. 173.
June 12, 1891.
Pringle v. Pringle.

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Lord Ordinary was right upon the first point. The question as to competency depended upon the provisions allowed by the statute for 'the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage who shall not succeed to the said entailed lands.'

"It is declared that 'the said provisions to younger children are granted by the said Alexander Pringle under all the conditions and provisions, and subject to all the restrictions and limitations contained in the said statute.'

"It is also declared that the 'provisions before written to children of the said intended marriage are hereby declared to be in full satisfaction to the whole children of the said intended marriage (including the heir who will succeed to the foresaid lands and estates) of all bairns' part of gear, legitim,' &c. It is provided in the last place 'that execution shall pass hereon at the instance of' certain persons named, 'for the implement of the whole provisions hereinbefore written, conceived in favour of' Mrs Pringle 'and the child or children of the said intended marriage.'

"It was contended for the second and third heirs that the marriage-contract contained an implied obligation securing the descent of the estate to the issue of the marriage, and that as no children had been born of the marriage the disentail was incompetent without the consent of the marriage-contract trustees, which had not been obtained. This contention was founded upon the fact that although the provisions are for the children 'who shall not succeed to the entailed estates,' the legal rights of the heir who will succeed to the entailed estates are excluded.

"I am of opinion that the argument of the next heirs is not well founded, there being, in my judgment, no obligation in the marriage-contract of the nature contemplated in the 17th section of the Act of 1882.

"The provisions for children in the marriage-contract are those authorised by the Aberdeen Act, and are necessarily limited to the children who shall not succeed to the entailed estates.

"For the heir who shall succeed to the estate there is no provision whatever. The exclusion of his legal rights might or might not be effectual if he should claim legitim, and I do not think it necessary to express any opinion upon that question. But I cannot find anything in the contract amounting to an obligation securing the descent of the estate to him.

"It is probably true that his legal rights were excluded, because it was assumed that he would succeed to the estates, but I do not think that that amounts to an obligation securing that he shall succeed. . . .

"2. It will be observed that the main differences between Mr Menzies and Mr Hope are (1st) as to the value of the hill pasture; and (2d) as to the number of years' purchase upon which the capital value of the estate should be ascertained.

" . . . As regards the number of years' purchase, however, I think that Mr Menzies has proceeded upon an erroneous principle. He explains that the estate is in an exceedingly dilapidated condition; and in his second report he says that he has taken only twenty years' purchase of the annual value, because a purchaser would have to expend £7000 or £8000 upon necessary buildings, improvements, and repairs. 'I considered it better,' he says, 'to reduce the number of years' purchase to suit the dilapidated condition of the estates than to take off a fixed sum.'

"Now, Mr Menzies has estimated the yearly value of the estate as it at present exists, that is, in its present dilapidated condition, and he informs me that the number of years' purchase of the rental which an estate in the district in which Whytbank and Yair are situated might be expected to bring is twenty-six. As, however, an expenditure of £7000 or £8000 would be required to put the estate into thoroughly good order, he allows only twenty years' purchase. It seems to me that by following this method of calculation Mr Menzies has to some extent deducted the depreciation of value caused by the dilapidated condition of the estate twice over. No doubt if money is not spent on the estate it will become still more dilapidated and of still less yearly value. But the construction of the 17th section of the Entail Act of 1882. Cases which dealt with the barring of legitim could therefore only be used the £7000 or £8000 of which Mr Menzies speaks is not only the sum which is necessary to keep the estate up to its present value, but also what would be required to convert it into an estate in thoroughly good order and repair, including the building of an additional farm-steading. But if the estate was put into thorough order it would become of greater yearly value than it is at present, and the increased yearly value would represent the return which the purchaser would expect to get for his additional expenditure. He would get an estate of the present value for his purchase-money, and would increase the value of that estate by spending £7000 or £8000 more. What Mr Menzies has really done, therefore, is to take the present value of the estate, calculated according to the ordinary rules of valuation (i.e., twenty-six years' purchase of the present yearly value), and then to deduct from that the sum required to make the estate more valuable. I do not think that that is a sound principle, and therefore, while I accept Mr Menzies' estimates of the present yearly value, I shall allow twenty-six years' purchase of that value, which he tells me is what might reasonably be expected for a residential estate in the district. I therefore take twenty-six years' purchase where Mr Menzies has taken twenty (except as regards the feu-duties at Clovenfords), and the result is to bring out a total value of £30,184, 11s. 8d. instead of £24,358, 11s. 8d.

"I should further explain the view which I take of the principle upon which the woods and plantations (other than those around the mansion-house and in the policies) should be valued in a case of this sort, because I heard a good deal of argument upon this point. Mr Menzies reports that almost all the woods are of that age that they might be cut down and sold by the heir in possession. In these circumstances, it was suggested on the one hand that no value should be given for the woods at all, as the petitioner might cut them down and sell them; and on the other hand that, as the woods have not been cut down, they form part of the estate, and that their full value—that is the value of all the trees—should be included.

"I do not think that either of these extreme views is sound. In valuing an estate upon which there are woods and plantations the valuer would assume that the woods would be dealt with in the ordinary course of prudent administration—that ripe or backgoing trees would be cut, that young plantations would be thinned, and that the removal of old trees would be accompanied by a reasonable amount of planting. Upon such an assumption only can the value of woods be properly estimated, because the value of woods to an estate does not lie wholly in the value of the timber. For example, one use of woods is for shelter, and another is as a covert for game, and both of these uses involve the maintenance of the woods. I see no good ground for adopting a different mode of valuation in a question between heirs of entail. What the Court has to do in a case of this sort is, I apprehend, to ascertain the fair value of the estate, so that the value of the expectancy or interest of the next heirs may be fixed. Such fair value cannot in my opinion be arrived at by assuming that the heir in possession will act in a way totally opposed to the course of prudent estate management, simply because he has in law power to do so.

"Applying these principles to the present case I am satisfied with the way in which Mr Menzies has dealt with the woods.

"He has added something to the value of the adjoining fields in respect of shelter, and he has placed a value upon the woodlands and upon the annual cuttings, which are capitalised at the same rate of purchase as the other yearly returns from the estate.

"I was asked to note that both parties moved me to allow a proof as to the value of the estate. I did not, however, see my way to do so. The practice of ascertaining the value of the estate in entail petitions by remit to a man of skill selected by the Court is well settled, and I should be sorry to disturb that practice, because there is no class of questions less suited to determination by proof than questions of mere value."

No. 173.

June 12, 1891. Pringle v. Pringle.

illustratively, and had no bearing here. "Securing by obligation" under the 17th section could only mean by obligation enforceable by law, and there was no such obligation here. There was no contract here, like that in the case of Scott Douglas,[1] which would have been defeated by the granting of the petition without the consent of the marriage-contract trustees. An heir of entail in the position of the present petitioner could not settle anything upon the next heir. All that he could do was to bar himself from taking advantage of his statutory right to disentail. (2) Here the Lord Ordinary ought to have given effect to Mr Menzies' views. Mr Menzies was of opinion that a large expenditure was necessary in order to maintain the present rental, and he had done rightly in making a deduction on that account. If good ground were shewn, it might be just to split up what he had allowed for necessary maintenance, and what for improvement, but it had not been shewn that any portion of the sum deducted fell under the latter category.

Argued for the second and third heirs;—(1) The consent of the persons at whose sight execution of the marriage-contract provisions was to pass was required before the petition could be granted. By the terms of the marriage-contract "the heir who will succeed to the foresaid entailed lands and estates" was specially included in the whole children of the marriage, whose legal rights were barred. There was a necessary implication running through the deed that the eldest child was to succeed, and the obligation by which it was secured was that the petitioner would not challenge the entail or defeat the succession.[2] (2) Mr Menzies had made a palpable error in arriving at his valuation here, and the Lord Ordinary's mode of dealing with it was right.

The first objection was ultimately not insisted in.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case relates to the mode of ascertaining the value of the estate upon which the interests of the substitute heirs fall to be computed, and it is a question which may admit of doubt. The estate is represented as being in a very dilapidated condition, and as requiring very considerable outlay in sanitary arrangements and repairs before it can be made an eligible place for purchase. But it must at the same time be kept in view that this dilapidated estate as it stands is all that the heir in possession has got under the entail, and that it is so dilapidated is a misfortune alike for the heir in possession and for his successors. In estimating the value of the lands in order to compute the interests of the next heirs, it seems to me therefore that we must take this estate as it at present stands, and then determine the number of years' purchase of the rental.

Mr Menzies, in his report, has estimated property in that neighbourhood to be worth twenty-six years' purchase of the rental, but in order to obtain that price for this estate he considers that it would be necessary, in the first place, to expend a sum of from £7000 to £8000 upon it. He accordingly reaches his valuation by taking twenty instead of twenty-six years' purchase of the rental. I do not follow his reasoning when he does so. I do not think there is any valid ground why the value of the estate of the heir in possession should be diminished in this way. The estate as it stands is in a dilapidated condition and is hardly in a fit state to be exposed, but neither the heir in possession nor

[1] Scott Douglas, June 9, 1883, 10 R. 952.

[2] Maitland v. Maitland, Dec. 14, 1843, 6 D. 244, 16 Scot. Jur. 162; Kintore v. Kintore, June 28, 1884, 11 R. 1013, affd. H. L. 13 R. 93.

No. 173.

June 12, 1891.
Pringle v. Pringle.

the heir in expectancy states that it is to be made better. Accordingly, I think we must take the rental as it actually stands.

The Lord Ordinary has arrived at the result that the value of the estate must be taken as it stands at present, and without addition or deduction of any kind, and I agree with him.

LORD ADAM.—I think the question which we have to decide is what is the present marketable value of the estate in its existing condition. If it is in a dilapidated state the value will be so much the less, if on the other hand it is in good condition the value will be so much the more. For my own part I should say that in such a question as the present, where the value of an estate has to be computed with regard to the expectancies or interests of the next heirs, each estate must be valued according to its own circumstances; and that no general rule can be laid down applicable to all such cases.

In this particular instance, I understand that what Mr Fletcher Menzies has done is in the first place to take the ordinary average value of estates in the neighbourhood and to fix that at twenty-six years' purchase of the present rental as it stands, holding that to be a fair and proper value to put upon the estate. I can quite fancy that an estate may be in a very dilapidated condition, such as would require an immediate expenditure of a considerable amount in order to maintain the existing rental. In such a case I think it would be right that a diminution should be made either from the number of years' rental or from the capital sum at which the value has been calculated. Such a deduction would be made because any purchaser would take the condition of the estate into consideration in offering a price. On the other hand, I can also understand that a small expenditure might largely increase the value of an estate, and a purchaser in this view might be induced to think that it was worth more than twenty-six years' purchase. In such a case I think it would be right to add something to the twenty-six years.

The present is a different case. As Mr Menzies informs us, the ordinary value of estates in the neighbourhood is twenty-six years' purchase. Mr Menzies says it would take an expenditure of £7000 or £8000 to put the estate into good order and repair, and, accordingly, he proposes to deduct a sum of that amount from the capital sum representing the twenty-six years' purchase value. The way in which he does this is to reduce the twenty-six years' purchase to twenty years, which is to do the same thing in another way. But he has failed to observe that by the expenditure of £7000 or £8000 a very much more valuable estate than the present would be created, an estate which would probably produce a larger rental.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the method which Mr Menzies has taken is wrong in principle, and that the value of the heir's expectancy must be taken according to the present rental. Accordingly, if twenty-six years' purchase is the value of the estate in its present condition, I think that is the value upon which the expectancy of the next heirs falls to be computed.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question in this case relates to the value of the estate upon which the expectancies of the substitute heirs of entail fall to be computed. The interests of these heirs are recognised by statute, and the calculation involves an actuarial problem—one of the elements of which is the capital value of the estate. The question as to which the Lord Ordinary and the professional gentle man who has been consulted have expressed opinions as is to the proper mode of calculating the value of an estate like the present.

No. 173.

June 12, 1891.
Pringle v. Pringle.

I have not been able to satisfy myself that either the Lord Ordinary or Mr Menzies has proceeded on proper data in fixing the principle upon which the value of the estate is to be determined. I shall state the objections I have to the course they have adopted, and state what I conceive to be the better way, in the hope that this subject (which does not involve matter of law, but only of arithmetic) may be reconsidered. I agree that Mr Menzies' method is open to criticism, because he takes a low rental and applies to it a reduced number of years' purchase corresponding with the depreciation of the subject. I think the Lord Ordinary's criticism upon this method is sound, that it seems to involve a double deduction referable to the same cause. It was said at the bar that substantial justice would be done, and that the value of the estate might thus be arrived at approximately. It certainly appears to be a rough and unsatisfactory method of reaching that result.

But I think that the Lord Ordinary's method is likewise fallacious, because he proceeds by taking a low rental and capitalising it at twenty-six years' purchase. I am unable to see that this method will result in a true valuation. How do we know that a purchaser would give twenty-six years' purchase for the estate in its present condition? He might consider that the present rental could not be maintained and that further expenditure would be required. Within a very short time a large sum of money would probably have to be expended in order to obtain a suitable tenant for the place; and without such expenditure the present rental could not be maintained for twenty-six years.

The view which I venture to suggest is, that the capital value should be estimated in the same way as it is usually estimated for an intending purchaser.

It is no doubt true that the heir in possession is not called upon to lay out money to increase the value of the estate, but seeing that he has the power of selling the estate and also of charging it for improvements, it seems not unreasonable that in estimating the value of the expectancy we should take the estate in its dilapidated condition, but keeping in view that it is capable of being put into shape by its present owners or by a purchaser. The purchaser would be likely to reason in this way,—the estate in its present condition will not yield me a return for my money, how much money will it cost me to put it into such order that it will yield me a proper return?—that is to say, the full yearly rental which the estate is capable of yielding if put into tenantable condition. He would then consider, what is the number of years' purchase at which land of this description generally sells in the district. Having got these elements, and assuming that twenty-six years' purchase is a proper basis, then the value would be twenty-six times the amount of the full rental, less the sum necessary to put the estate into proper tenantable condition.

In suggesting this mode of valuation, I think I do no injustice to the heir in possession, because I assume that he is not bound to lay out anything upon the estate, at the same time that I affirm that the true test of value is the sum which an intending purchaser would give for the property.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT adhered.

MURRAY & FALCONER, W.S.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM ROSS RANNIE, Pursuer.—M'Kechnie—G. W. Burnet.
GEORGE OGG, Defender.—Johnston—M'Clure.

No. 174.
June 12, 1891.
Rannie v. Ogg.

Process—Proving of tenor—Untested deed—No written adminicles—Parole evidence.—In an action of proving the tenor, the pursuer sought to set up a deed by which he alleged that the defender had, during his lifetime, conveyed away from himself certain property absolutely to A, his deceased wife's sister, with whom he lived as his wife, whose heir-at-law the pursuer was. No draft or other written adminicle was produced, and the deed libelled in the summons as the deed to be set up was undated, unsubscribed, and untested. The casus amissionis alleged was that the granter had destroyed the deed while it was in his possession. The pursuer adduced parole proof, and the only material evidence was that of a solicitor who deponed that the deed had been fifteen years before the date of the proof, and some years after its execution, submitted to him for his opinion as to its effect, and while he was unable to speak to its terms, his impression, derived from entries in his ledger, was that it was or must have been an absolute inter vivos deed in favour of A and her heirs. The defender, while admitting that he had destroyed a deed in favour of A, deponed that it was mortis causa and undelivered.

Held that the pursuer had failed to prove his case.

Question whether even if the pursuer had established the tenor of the body of the deed, decree of proving the tenor could be pronounced in respect he was unable to prove the tenor of the testing-clause.

Observations on the remedies in the case of an alleged fraudulent destruction of a deed.

1ST DIVISION. C.

In 1852 George Ogg, feuar, Turriff, Aberdeenshire, went through a form of marriage with Alexina Rannie, sister of his deceased wife, and thereafter lived with her till 1875, when she died intestate, leaving two children by him.

In February 1890 William Ross Rannie, confectioner, Penn Yan, New York, having served heir-at-law to his aunt, Alexina, raised an action against Ogg, to have it declared "that the defender, the said George Ogg, executed a disposition in favour of the now deceased Alexina Rannie, daughter of John Rannie, sometime baker in Turriff aforesaid, of date the 1854, and that the said disposition was of the following tenor, videlicet:—'I, George Ogg, feuar, residing in Turriff, Aberdeenshire, for the love, favour, and affection which I have and bear to Alexina Rannie, daughter of John Rannie, baker in Turriff aforesaid, have disponed, as I hereby alienate and dispone, from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of the said Alexina Rannie, her heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole that piece of ground lying within the town of Turriff and county of Aberdeen —[the boundaries of the subjects were then described],—and I oblige myself to infeft the said Alexina Rannie and her foresaids, to be holden a me vel de me, and I resign the said lands and others for new infeftment, and I assign the writs, and have delivered the same, according to inventory, and I assign the rents, and I bind myself to free and relieve the said Alexina Rannie and her aforesaids of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens, and I grant warrandice, and I consent to registration hereof for preservation; moreover, I desire any notary to whom these presents may be presented to give to the said Alexina Rannie or her foresaids sasine of the lands and others above disponed.—In witness whereof': And it ought and should be found and declared by our said Lords that the decree to be pronounced by them herein shall be in all respects as valid and effectual a document to the pursuer in all cases, in probation as well as others, as the original disposition would be if extant, notwithstanding the same has been abstracted or lost, and cannot now be found."

No. 174.

June 12, 1891. Rannie v. Ogg.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "In or about the year 1854 the defender, who was then heritable proprietor of the subjects described in the summons, conveyed the said subjects to the said Alexina Rannie. The disposition or other deed of conveyance granted by the defender in favour of the said Alexina Rannie was delivered by him to her." (Ans. 2) "Admitted that defender was at said date proprietor of said subjects. Quoad ultra denied." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer, as heir-at-law of the said Alexina Rannie, is now proprietor of the said subjects. He did not however become aware that the succession had opened to him till October 1888. Shortly after the fact became known to the pursuer, he came to this country and went to see the defender at Turriff in December 1888. The defender then admitted to the pursuer that he (the pursuer) was the rightful owner of the property. The defender at the same time handed to the pursuer the title-deeds of the property, and they still remain in the possession of the pursuer." (Ans. 3) "Admitted that pursuer called upon defender in or about the month of December 1888. Quoad ultra denied." (Cond. 4) "On examining the title-deeds so handed to him the pursuer did not find among them the disposition or deed of conveyance granted by the defender in favour of the said Alexina Rannie, and as the defender refused to deliver to the pursuer the said disposition or other deed of conveyance, the pursuer raised an action against the defender in the Court of Session, concluding, inter alia, for delivery of the said disposition or other deed of conveyance. A print of the closed record in that action is herewith produced, and referred to." (Ans. 4) "Admitted that there was not a deed of conveyance in favour of the said Alexina Rannie among the title-deeds, and that pursuer raised an action as stated. Quoad ultra denied, under explanation that no such deed as that alleged at any time existed." (Cond. 6) "Thereafter, on 11th January 1890, the defender was examined as a haver before Sheriff-substitute Hamilton Grierson at Banff, and being called upon to produce the said disposition or other deed of conveyance, he deponed that the deed was in his possession about fifteen years ago, that he then destroyed it by burning it, and that he had no copy or draft of it. A copy of the deposition is herewith produced, and referred to." (Ans. 6) "Admitted that defender was examined as a haver upon 11th January 1890, and the said deposition is referred to. Denied that defender deponed, or intended to depone, in the sense or to the effect alleged, and explained that the deed referred to in said deposition as having been destroyed was an unstamped and undelivered deed of settlement by the defender, containing provisions in favour of the said Alexina Rannie. The defender is in his eightieth year, and at the diet of the commission foresaid he was entrapped, owing to the ambiguous form of the question as put, into making an apparent admission, which if it is to be understood in the sense set forth in this action by the pursuer, has no foundation in fact. . . ." (Cond. 7) "The pursuer has been unable to ascertain by whom the said disposition was prepared, or to discover any copy or draft thereof, and he believes that no copy or draft thereof is now extant. It is necessary, in order that the pursuer's right of property in the said subjects may be established, that the tenor of the said disposition or other deed of conveyance should be proved. In these circumstances the present action has been rendered necessary." (Ans. 7) "Admitted that there is no draft or copy of the kind alleged in existence, and averred that no such principal, copy, or draft did at any time exist. Quoad ultra denied."

The pursuer pleaded;—The disposition libelled having been destroyed by the defender, and being necessary for the purpose of establishing the

No. 174.

June 12, 1891.
Rannie v. Ogg.

pursuer's title to the said property, decree of proving of the tenor ought to be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (2) No written adminicles being libelled on for proving the tenor of the alleged disposition, the action should be dismissed. (3) The disposition libelled never having been in existence, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 16th May 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) made great avizandum with the cause to the First Division.

On 4th July the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before answer as to the sufficiency of the adminicles and of the casus amissionis, allow the pursuer to prove the tenor of the writ libelled on, and the casus amissionis thereof; and allow the defender a conjunct probation."

Alexander Rannie, one of Alexina's brothers, deponed,—In 1852, when, after his first wife's death, Ogg desired to marry Alexina, the proposed marriage was opposed by her family. The family, however, ultimately consented on condition that Ogg should execute a deed making over to her absolutely the property in question which he had acquired in 1849 from John Rannie, brother of witness and of Alexina Rannie. In 1875 witness came from America, where he resided, to visit Alexina, who was ill, and he then obtained possession of the deed, which he found in a trunk upstairs in Alexina's house. He was unable to speak to the terms of the deed further than that it was an irrevocable deed to Alexina, her heirs, or assigns whomsoever. Immediately after Alexina's death, he, accompanied by Ogg, went to consult a Mr Alexander George, solicitor at Macduff, with a view to seeing if the deed in question could not be set aside. The pursuer, who was Alexina's heir-at-law, had been well provided for by his father, and it was proposed that, if possible, some provision should be made for Alexina's children by Ogg. Witness and Ogg took the deed with them and left it with George, who next day told them that, in his opinion, it was an irrevocable deed in favour of Alexina, and that under it the pursuer would succeed. George advised that the deed should be put aside, and that Ogg should make up his own title, and then proceed to execute a will in favour of the children. Ogg accordingly made a will in terms of this advice.

The pursuer deponed as follows,—In 1888 he visited this country from America for the purpose of enforcing his claims to the property, and paid a visit to Ogg at Turriff. Ogg there admitted that he had executed a deed absolutely in favour of Alexina, and on witness' agreeing to allow him to stay on in the premises rent free until a certain date, he handed to witness the title-deeds to the property in order that witness might get a disposition drawn up by a lawyer in his own favour. Witness produced a note-book in which the terms of this agreement were entered. Witness then handed the papers to Alexander M'Lennan, a cousin of his wife's, and M'Lennan having told him that the deed in question was not among the papers, he returned to Ogg, who then told him that he did not know where it was. Thereafter, by advice of his friends, Ogg drew back from the agreement and refused to admit witness' claim. A few days later, at Banff Bridge Railway Station, when called upon to explain his conduct, Ogg, in the presence of M'Lennan, admitted to witness that he had executed the deed absolutely in Alexina's favour. Witness then, accompanied by M'Lennan, visited George to take legal advice on the matter.

Alexander M'Lennan deponed that he had himself handed the deed to Alexina. He was unable to speak to its terms further than that it was an absolute deed in her favour. He corroborated the last witness as to the conversation at Banff Bridge Railway Station.

No. 174. June 12, 1891. Rannie v. Ogg.

Alexander George (the material parts of whose evidence are quoted below),* deponed, that when the pursuer and M'Lennan paid him the

* Alexander George deponed,—"I am a solicitor at Macduff, and provost of that burgh. I remember having a call from the pursuer along with M'Lennan, a friend of his, on 10th December 1888. They produced to me a letter of introduction from Alexander Rannie, the uncle of the pursuer. Shortly, their object was to take steps for the recovery of the property which is the subject of this action. I had no recollection of the transaction in which I had been engaged in 1875, beyond the fact that there had been one, and I arranged that they should call for me next day. They did so. They both called. Before they called I had looked up my ledger, and some of the facts and circumstances were brought to my mind in consequence, and they gave me their story of what had taken place in 1875. . . . Rannie came back on the 13th December. He brought with him the title-deeds of the property. He said he had got them from Mr Ogg in order that I might prepare a conveyance by Mr Ogg to him, the pursuer. He handed me the titles. . . . Going back to 1875, I remember having a call during that year from Alexander Rannie, the pursuer's uncle, with reference to this same property. I have looked up an account which stands in my business books, and which was rendered to Mr Ogg in connection with what was done then, and have by that means refreshed my memory of what took place. Alexander Rannie called first on 2d July 1875. He brought those titles I have now produced, along with the disposition by Mr Ogg conveying the property covered by these titles to Alexina Rannie. His sister Alexina Rannie had died shortly before that, and he wished to know who would succeed to this property in respect of his sister's death. I said that on the statement he made to me my opinion was in favour of the heir-at-law, Alexina Rannie's heir-at-law. Alexina Rannie had left children, and Alexander Rannie wished the property to go to her children, and my duty was to prepare a deed in favour of the children in respect of this disposition in favour of Alexina Rannie; and in consequence the titles were left with me that I might consider the matter. . . . My advice was that, in my opinion, Alexina Rannie's heir-at-law had right to the property, but that if Mr Ogg was to take the risk of that, I thought he should just put a warrant of registration upon his disposition in his own favour, i.e., the disposition dated 1849, and record it, and be infeft. (Q.) And what was to happen to Alexina Rannie's deed? (A.) It would just be laid aside. (Q.) Was that advice taken by Mr Rannie and Mr Ogg? (A.) Yes. I received instructions to put on the deed a warrant of registration, which I did, and which you will find on the disposition in favour of Mr Ogg. He did more than that at this time. He then instructed me to prepare a settlement. I did so. He signed it on 28th July 1875. I have the draft here. The testing-clause is not in. Referring to business account, I find I wrote him on 28th July to come and sign the settlement. I do not find a meeting signing it, but I know it was signed. I am aware that it was executed about that time, and that it was delivered to them. Generally, that settlement is in favour of Ogg's children by Alexina Rannie. I cannot tell who was Alexina Rannie's heir-at-law at that time. . . . (Q.) Tell me as precisely as you can the nature and terms of the deed by the defender in favour of Alexina Rannie? (A.) I could not tell the terms of the deed. All I know is this, that I have a distinct recollection that I advised that in my opinion the heir-at-law had a claim. Consequently, I can only say I was satisfied it was a valid deed, otherwise I could not have given the advice that the heir-at-law had a claim to the property. (Q.) Can you give us the date of the deed? (A.) I have no recollection of the date of the deed. (Q.) In the second place, can you inform us who the witnesses were? (A.) Not at all. (Q.) In the third place, can you tell us who the solicitor was who drew the deed? (A.) No. (Q.) Do you recollect whether there was one name in the testing-clause? (A.) I do not recollect anything of the deed beyond the fact that I can tell that I was satisfied at the time that the deed was valid, and effectually

No. 174.

June 12, 1891.
Rannie v. Ogg.

visit in 1888, he refreshed his memory as to what had taken place in 1875 by referring to entries in his ledger. From these he was able to say that Alexander Rannie and Ogg had left the deed with him for his consideration, and that although he could not speak to the terms of the deed, his impression was that the deed must have been an absolute disposition in Alexina's favour.

The defender deponed that he had refused to sign a deed absolutely in Alexina's favour, but consented to sign, and did sign, a mortis causa deed in her favour. That deed was preserved in a trunk in which the spouses kept their papers and clothes. Witness admitted the visit to George spoken to by Alexander Rannie, but denied that the deed in question was the subject of conversation at the consultation, for he had prior to the visit burnt it. The only object of the visit was to make a provision in favour of Alexina's children.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) On a consideration of the proof, he had established the tenor of the deed in question as well as it could possibly in the circumstances be established. The evidence of Alexander Rannie, George, and M'Lennan led irresistibly to the conclusion that the deed was in existence shortly after Alexina's death, and contained an irrevocable inter vivos gift. It could not be said that the deed was not duly delivered, for the defender admitted that it was put away by his wife in a trunk in which they kept their mutual effects. If the deed had been, as the defender maintained, merely a mortis causa deed, where was the use of the defender's destroying it, for under it his wife could have no rights until his death? (2) As matter of law, the question as to the necessity of adminicles in an action of proving the tenor had been treated by the Court as a question depending on the circumstances of the case.[1] In the present case conveyed the property to Alexina Rannie. . . . (Q.) Why do you say that it was a valid deed? (A.) I just say that it was a valid deed, and hence my advice, my opinion that the heir-at-law was entitled to the property, and not George Ogg. That was the whole substance of the inquiry. (Q.) Do you mean anything more than this—that it was a probative deed in the first place, and that it bore to convey the property in the second place? (A.) It was just a deed of conveyance, valid according to Scotch law; that is all I have to say. (Q.) Was there anything to indicate whether it was a mortis causa deed or an inter vivos deed? (A.) I am satisfied it was not a mortis causa deed, or the heir-at-law would have had no claim. (Q.) What satisfied you that it was an inter vivos deed? (A.) Just what I have said already. (Q.) What satisfies you now that the deed was an inter vivos deed? (A.) What satisfies me now is the fact that I advised the heir-at-law to claim under it. . . . . (Q.) Can you tell me why you were so satisfied? (A.) Just upon the information submitted to me by looking at the deed, and upon information submitted to me by Alexander Rannie. (Q.) Will you tell me what information was submitted to you by Alexander Rannie? (A.) That this deed was given by Ogg to this Alexander Rannie's sister, who lived with him as his wife, as a consideration to her—as a provision for her; and more than that, was given to her as a provision for her, and that the deed was handed over to her and was in her possession, and it was on that information that I gave my opinion. (Q.) Was the deed stamped? (A.) I will just answer that question as I did all the others—it must have been stamped, otherwise I would not have had the opinion that I had."

---

[1] Lithgow v. Murray, Jan. 2, 1680, M. 15,799; Stair, iv. 32, 9; Ersk. Inst. iv. 1, 55; Ogilvy v. Napier, Jan. 22, 1612, M. 15,786; Earl of March v. Montgomery, July 19, 1743, M. 15,820; Winton & Co. v. Thomson & Co., June 10, 1862, 24 D. 1094; A v. B, Nov. 21, 1749, M. 15,823; Winchester v. Smith, March 20, 1863, 1 Macph. 685, 35 Scot. Jur. 395; Falconer v. Stephen, Dec. 9, 1848, 11 D. 220, and July 12, 1849, 11 D. 1338, 21 Scot. Jur. 520—[See also Leckie v. Leckie, July 12, 1884, 11 R. 1088, Ed.].

No. 174. June 12, 1891. Rannie v. Ogg.

they fell to be dispensed with. The defender admitted that he had destroyed a deed in favour of his wife, and therefore everything must be assumed against him.

Counsel for the defender were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defender in this action of proving the tenor must, in my opinion, get decree of absolvitor. No adminicles have been produced, and the casus amissionis is said to be that the deed, of which it is sought to prove the tenor, was destroyed by the defender while it was in his possession, and while it might be presumed to have been an undelivered deed.

In these circumstances it appears to me that this is an attempt for the first time in our law to set up a written document by parole evidence alone. The deed, being in the possession of the supposed granter, must be presumed to have been an undelivered deed, and therefore one which it was in his power to put an end to at his pleasure. It is not averred that the granter was under any obligation to grant such a deed as this is represented to have been, and therefore not entitled to destroy it.

The tenor of the deed cannot be proved except by parole evidence, and this is an entire novelty in the practice of actions of proving the tenor. The evidence led here is quite insufficient for the object desired.

But the difficulty of the pursuer's case does not end there. He sets forth as the deed to be set up a deed which ends with the words "in witness whereof," and proceeds no further.

There is no evidence whatever to shew that the deed ever had a testing-clause or was ever subscribed by the granter. No names of witnesses are given, and it is not said that it was a holograph deed.

I see no escape from the conclusion that the pursuer has failed to shew anything like sufficient grounds to support his case, and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. As your Lordship has said, this is a proposal to set up an alleged disposition by parole proof only, there being no written adminicles whatever.

That is a very uncommon case, but I desire to guard myself from saying that in no conceivable case would it be competent to set up the tenor of a writing by parole proof only. There may be cases (I can figure them myself) in which the tenor, i.e., the words sought to be set up, may be ascertained by parole evidence distinctly. I reserve my opinion until such a case arises.

In this particular case, however, I have no difficulty, and I agree with your Lordship that there is no evidence whatever of the tenor of the deed which it is proposed to set up. We have only the evidence of a law-agent, who says that the deed was left with him upon a certain day, and that, in his opinion, it was a binding absolute disposition of the property conveyed in it. He does not profess to know the terms of the deed, nor can he state its tenor. In such a case it appears to me the pursuer has entirely failed to prove the tenor of the writing.

It further appears to me that, even if we were to pronounce decree in terms of the libel, we should be setting up a document which is absolutely worthless, in respect it lacks a testing-clause and the subscription of the maker and witnesses.

LORD M'LAREN.—There is no doubt that this case contains an element of

No. 174.
June 12, 1891.
Rannie v. Ogg.

novelty in that there is no written evidence to supplement the parole evidence as regards the tenor of the deed which is sought to be set up. I should be sorry to think that the law was such that in no circumstances could a deed which had been fraudulently destroyed be set up by parole evidence, supposing its tenor could in fact be ascertained by such evidence.

A case might arise for the consideration of the Court in which the deed sought to be set up was a mere copy of a statutory form, with the names of the parties and a description of the subjects disponed duly inserted. In such a case every word might be supplied from the memory of the draughtsman having before him the printed style and the deed from which the description of the subjects was taken.

But the second point adverted to is really the critical point in the case. It is not proved that the deed alleged to have been destroyed was an absolute and irrevocable deed in favour of the lady with whom the granter lived as his wife. We have not got the evidence of the solicitor who prepared the deed or of the instrumentary witnesses. It is very remarkable that it has not been found possible to trace the draft of the deed, because we know that solicitors are in the habit of preserving their drafts.

That being so, the only evidence of the contents of the deed which we have before us is the statement of a solicitor who many years after saw the deed, and who states his impression (an impression which he says he derived from entries in his ledger), that the deed was or must have been an absolute deed. Such evidence is altogether insufficient to establish the tenor of the deed in dispute as an absolute deed.

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has failed to prove his case. That is his misfortune. It may be a hardship to the pursuer that a deed which was once in existence, and in which he thinks he has an interest, cannot now be set up, but this is only the unavoidable result of the inability of the pursuer to adduce more satisfactory proof of the tenor of the deed.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree that even if the pursuer had made out his case in substance we could not have given decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, because such a decree would have been perfectly futile. The purpose of an action of proving the tenor is to replace a lost document by a new document in precisely the same terms, and with the same legal effect. Now, if decree were to be given in terms of the conclusions the pursuer would be furnished with a document of no legal effect whatever, because he would be given a document undated, untested, and not even subscribed. I do not say this as a mere criticism of the summons, because I think the draughtsman could not help himself. He could not libel a complete instrument, because he did not know what were in fact the terms of the instrument which is said to have been destroyed. And therefore, if the case had been proved in substance, it would seem to me very doubtful whether the pursuer's remedy would have been a proving of the tenor.

If the pursuer had proved what he alleges, that the granter of the deed had delivered it to the grantee for the purpose of constituting a legal right in her and her heirs, had recovered possession of it without her consent, and destroyed it after her death for the purpose of defeating the right of her heirs, I am far from thinking that he would have had no remedy even although he could not prove the tenor of the deed. That would have been a case of fraud, and if the

No. 174.

June 12, 1891.
Rannie v. Pigg.

granter of a deed has fraudulently destroyed it, I do not doubt that he may be compelled to execute and deliver a new deed in its place. But I doubt very much whether the grantee could have decree of proving the tenor if he could not prove the exact terms either of the entire deed or at least of as much of it as is required to make a complete legal instrument.

But I agree with your Lordships that he has failed to prove the substance of his case, and I think it material to observe what it is that he undertakes to prove. He has to prove that this document was conceived in such terms as to give him a benefit which there is no reason for supposing that the defender ever intended for him. It was perfectly reasonable and natural that he should settle his property upon his wife and her children, and all the more so because the law did not recognise the marriage. But it is not to be supposed that he had any intention of settling it in terms that would carry it away from the children and from himself to a stranger if his wife should die during his lifetime. And therefore the pursuer has to satisfy us that as matter of fact it was expressed in terms that would have that effect. But there is no evidence of its terms. The only evidence is that of a solicitor, who says that "in his opinion" it had a certain legal effect. That is not evidence of matter of fact on which we can proceed.

The kind of evidence that is necessary must go to prove the actual contents of the deed. The solicitor might not be able to speak to the exact words of the deed, but if he had studied it and had any recollection of it he could without much difficulty have said whether it was a conveyance in fee to the deceased lady, with a destination to her heirs and assignees. He might have said that there was no destination in favour of her children or of anyone except her, and no clauses reserving the granter's liferent or dispensing with delivery. If he could have spoken to these matters of fact, his evidence might have deserved consideration. These are ordinary clauses, and a solicitor who had read and remembered the deed would have known whether it contained these clauses. But he is not asked what its clauses were, and we cannot accept a statement of opinion as a substitute for evidence of fact.

There is only one other matter remaining—the defender's alleged admission made to the pursuer when he came upon a visit to Turriff. That is not corroborated in any essential respect, and I do not think that the admission is proved by the pursuer's statement alone.

I therefore agree with your Lordships in thinking the pursuer has failed to prove his case in substance.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I desire to add that I think the element of fraud is not in this case at all. If there had been a relevant averment of fraud on the part of the maker to destroy a right created by himself, there would certainly be a remedy, but not such as the present action. As to what that remedy would have been, I reserve my opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the tenor of the deed libelled has not been proven: Therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decern."

WAUGH & M'LACHLAN, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 175.

June 12, 1891.*
Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

JAMES STEEL, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Asher—Taylor Innes—M'Lennan.
KIRK-SESSION OF ST CUTHBERT'S PARISH, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Balfour—Ure.

Church—Encroachment on burying-ground—Powers of kirk-session—Heritors.—Held that the heritors in a parish, as proprietors in trust of the parish church and churchyard, along with the kirk-session, as administrators thereof, were entitled, in a case of high expediency, to encroach upon the burying-ground in enlarging the church, although this involved the removal of soil from a portion of the ground which had for a long period been used as a common burying-ground—no private rights being interfered with, sixteen years having elapsed since the last interment, and the churchyard having been closed as a burying-ground.

Observed (per the Lord President) that the rights of a kirk-session in regard to the church and burying-ground of a parish are rights of administration only.

Church—Burying-ground—Right of singular successor.—Observed that a singular successor in an estate has no right of sepulture in part of a burying-ground which has been acquired by his predecessor in title.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth Darling.

THE CHURCH OF THE PARISH OF ST CUTHBERT'S, Edinburgh, was built in 1775, and having been for some years prior to 1887 in an unsatisfactory condition, both as regards its sanitary and its structural arrangements, the kirk-session resolved in that year, with the consent of the heritors and afterwards of the presbytery, to make considerable alterations and improvements upon it. For this purpose, and to satisfy the requirement of the heritors that there should be as many lineal feet for allocation in the restored church as in the old one, it was found necessary to encroach upon the churchyard, by which the church was surrounded. The churchyard had been closed as a burying-ground by order of the Sheriff in 1874, as it had become so crowded with interments as to be a nuisance under the Public Health Act, 1867.

It was originally proposed that the foundation of the new building should be a thick layer of concrete laid above a portion of the ground which had been used as the common burying-ground prior to 1874. But it afterwards appeared that, in 1840, from 10 to 15 feet of forced earth had been deposited on the original surface east of the church, and that about 4 to 5 feet had been added in 1858, and that, in order to make the new building perfectly secure, it would be necessary to carry the foundations down to the solid ground, and this course was approved of at a meeting of the heritors of the parish on 5th May 1890.†

Immediately after the meeting this action was raised by James Steel, one of the heritors, against the kirk-session, concluding for declarator (first) that the defenders "are not entitled to build over the burying-grounds of said parish or any portion thereof; (second) that they are not entitled to encroach upon and destroy or change the original and natural use and purpose of said burying-grounds; (third) that they are not entitled to open up or remove any of the soil or earth of the graves of said burying-grounds, or of the remains of the bodies which have been interred therein." There were corresponding conclusions for interdict.

C.

* Decided May 28, 1891.

† The minute of this meeting bore that the chairman stated that valued rent heritors only would be entitled to take part in it; that Bailie Steel had moved in opposition to the motion authorising the kirk-session to proceed with the excavations, that the operations be not sanctioned, as they would interfere with the graves to the east of the church,—five voting for the motion and two for Bailie Steel's amendment. The notice calling this meeting bore that it was to be held "for the purpose of considering certain matters in connection with the reconstruction of the parish church, and for taking any action in regard thereto, or otherwise, and for dealing with any other parochial matters."

No. 175.

June 12, 1891. Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

The pursuer stated that the proposed new church was to extend to a distance of 70 feet from west to east and 120 feet from north to south over the entire breadth of the common burying-ground, which had been the place of public sepulture for the parishioners of St Cuthbert's for centuries down to 1874; that the proposed transepts to the north and south of the church would encroach upon the private tombs, and particularly on the private tomb belonging to the estate of Dean, now the property of the pursuer. "If the proposed building operations be carried out, the portion of the graveyard so built over will be destroyed, the graves of centuries desecrated, and the use and purpose of the burying-grounds will be wholly changed and destroyed, and several tombstones, some of great age, and others so recently erected as 1873, will be removed." The pursuer further stated that it was quite possible to do all that was necessary without encroachment on the burying-ground.

It was further alleged that the meetings of the heritors at which approval was given to the proposal of the kirk-session to proceed with the reconstruction of the church were not legally convened, no proper notice of the intention to build over the churchyard having been given. There were several thousands of heritors in the parish, many of whom would have been present had they known what the real intention was, while in point of fact the approval was carried by a majority of five votes against two.

The defenders stated that the ventilation and means of egress from the church, which had both been condemned as radically bad, could not be improved except by a complete change of the entire structure of the building, the cubic capacity of the church being totally inadequate for the number of sitters; that it was found to be necessary, if the defects in question were to be efficiently remedied, that the churchyard should be encroached upon, but only to the extent of about 43 feet on the eastward side of the church.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The public burying-ground in question being wholly filled with human remains deposited for generations down to 1874, the defenders are not entitled to build over the said ground, or to dig up, remove, or otherwise disturb or violate the remains of the dead. 2. Separatim, The said burying-ground having been for centuries before 1874 the parochial place of sepulture, and all interments in it having been made in reliance upon the protection of the law, the defenders are not entitled to change its proper use and destination, and to build over the same, or to dig up, disturb, or remove the remains committed to it. 3. No necessity existing or being stated for opening up, encroaching upon, or building over the said burying-ground, decree of declarator and interdict should be at once pronounced as concluded for. 4. The burying-grounds in question having been declared by the Sheriff to be a nuisance, under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, as stated, and having been ordained "to be closed," the defenders are not entitled to open up said grounds, nor to disturb the soil or earth thereof, or the remains of the bodies interred therein, in breach of the said order, without legal sanction. 5. The pursuer is further entitled to decree in respect that the duty of maintaining the church and the burying-ground as separate subjects is by law entrusted, not to the kirk-session, but to the heritors, who are not entitled to delegate their trust or to bargain for its abandonment. 6. The alleged consent of the heritors to the defenders making encroachments upon the burying-grounds is of no legal avail, in respect (1) it is ultra vires of the heritors; (3) certain heritors were at said meeting refused liberty to vote by the chairman, and this refusal affected the decision of the meeting.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—3. The proposed encroachment on the churchyard being, in the circumstances condescended on, necessary

No. 175.

June 12, 1891. Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

or at all events strongly expedient, interdict ought not to be pronounced as craved.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof, and the pursuer having reclaimed, the Court adhered.

It appeared that the proposed extension of the church eastward would cover 269 superficial yards of what had been prior to 1874 common burying-ground, and that it would be necessary to carry the foundations of the walls through from 15 to 20 feet of forced earth. The laying of the foundations would necessitate the removal of soil in which nearly 300 interments had been made. It also appeared that the soil was of a porous nature, and that seven or eight years was an average time for a body to decay, and that it had been the custom while the burying-ground remained in use to reopen graves for fresh interments after the lapse of seven or eight years. It further appeared that at a depth of from 3 to 5 feet the soil contained no more carbonic acid than was commonly found in ordinary forced earth, shewing that the organic remains had been entirely decomposed with the exception of dry bones. The public authorities of the city had remonstrated with the kirk-session as to the state of the sanitary arrangements of the church, and the heritors had obtained a report from Dr Hunter Stewart, Demonstrator of Public Health in Edinburgh University, to the effect that the church was in a thoroughly insanitary condition from insufficient ventilation, and had at meetings previous to that of 5th May 1890 agreed to contribute £2000 towards a sum of £17,000, which it was estimated the proposed work would cost, the £15,000 being defrayed by the congregation.

The tomb belonging to the family of Nesbit of Dean, which estate had been purchased by the pursuer, was an arched vault under the doorway. It was sunk, and there was a stair going down to it and a door at the bottom of the stair, but the evidence shewed that it would not be materially interfered with by the reconstruction of the church.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 9th January 1891, assoilzied the defenders.*

---

* "OPINION.—The object of this action is to prevent a proposed reconstruction of the parish church of St Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, on the ground that it involves an encroachment on a portion of the churchyard. This reconstruction has been resolved on after full deliberation by the proper authorities, i.e., the heritors and kirk-session, with the approval of the presbytery, as a measure necessary for the health and comfort of the congregation. No appeal can be made to a Court of law against such a resolution except on the ground either of interference with private right, or of breach of the trust reposed in the heritors and kirk-session, as administrators of the church and churchyard for parochial purposes. The pursuer puts his case on both grounds, for he says that the proposed operations will interfere with the 'Dean Tomb,' which is situated under the present church, and which contains the ashes of his predecessors in title in the estate of Dean, and he also says that the reconstructed church will enclose, and its foundations will disturb, a very large number of graves in the portion of the churchyard to the east of the present church, which formerly was part of the common burying-ground of the parish, but was closed by order of the Sheriff in 1874. I am of opinion that the pursuer has not made out his case on either head.

"The question of the 'Dean Tomb' may be disposed of in a sentence. It is the resting-place of the ancient family of Nesbit of Dean, and the pursuer does not say that it has been in use for many years. In argument he disclaimed all intention of using it himself. Nevertheless he might be entitled to protect it from encroachment if he could shew that the proposed operations were calculated to injure it. But it is an arched vault below the present church, and it at present carries the weight of the outer wall. The architect explains that the

No. 175.

June 12, 1891. Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—1. It was the duty of the heritors to maintain and keep intact the burying-ground for the benefit of the only change to be made is that one of the pillars supporting the new gallery will rest on the haunches of the arch. It seems to me that the pursuer has altogether failed to prove that this slight alteration will to any extent affect its stability.

"His main contention, however, relates to the disturbance of the common burying-ground, and here he appeals to that natural sanctity which the law recognises as attaching to places of sepulture. I speak of course of the public churchyards of Scotland and not of private cemeteries, which are regulated by the law of contract.

"It seems to me that a distinction must be drawn between churchyards which are still in use, and those, like the present, which have been closed by order of the proper authority. With regard to the former, surviving relatives have an interest to see that they are preserved for future interment. With regard to the latter there is, I think, no higher right than to secure that, in the words of Erskine (ii. 1, 8), 'these, when they are no longer to continue such, should be sequestrated from the ordinary uses of property till the remains of the bodies there interred shall have returned to their original dust.' This may involve a right on the part of representatives of the dead to have the lairs enclosed, and to have free access to visit them at suitable times. Nothing more than this was decided by the cases of Mansfield v. Wright, March 17, 1824, 2 Sh. App. 104, and Turner v. Arbuckle, February 16, 1869, 7 Macph. 538.

"In the present case the pursuer does not appear in the character of a representative of any of the dead whose graves he says will be disturbed. Nor has he been able to adduce as witnesses any such representatives, for Mr Crawford and the Rev. A. B. Brown are relatives of a family whose burying place is not to be interfered with, except by the temporary removal of a mural tablet, and the corbelling of a few stones over the area of the lair; and the grave of Mr Hutton's relatives is outside the proposed building altogether. Even when a graveyard is still in use, the case of Hill v. Wood (Jan. 30, 1863, 1 Macph. 360), fully recognises that a case of necessity, or of such high expediency as amounts in law to necessity, may be made out for encroaching on a private burying place, against the wishes of those who have a right to it, for the purpose of enlarging the parish church. It seems to me that much less is required to justify encroachment for this purpose on ground which has ceased to be used for sepulture, and that a dissentient heritor, asserting no private interest either of a patrimonial or sentimental kind, must, before he can succeed, be able to shew that the proposed interference with the disused graves is wanton, without adequate reason, and of a kind to outrage public decency by desecration of the resting-places of the dead. In my view, these considerations have a direct relation to one another, for it will require a much stronger case to justify a serious disturbance of graves, involving the re-interment of recognisable human remains, than if the operations are to be conducted in ground where the resolution of the remains into their kindred dust is all but complete.

"It is of importance, therefore, to consider what are the defects in the present church which have led the kirk-session to resolve on an expenditure of over £17,000, and the heritors to assess themselves for a contribution of £2000. It may be conceded that the disrepair is not such as to impose on the heritors a legal obligation to rebuild. But the test of what they might be compelled to do cannot, I think, be the test of what they may lawfully do or consent to being done. It has been proved that the church is in various respects inconvenient, insanitary, and even dangerous. The seats and passages are too narrow, the floor is too low, there is no vestry, there is no retiring-room of any kind except the session-house, the upper gallery is objectionable on many grounds, the egresses have been condemned by the burgh engineer, the ventilation is most defective, and the air-space available for each sitter is quite insufficient, being something like 113 cubic feet per sitter, whereas it ought to be from 150 to 200 feet. It is out of the question to suggest that the accommodation for parish. They held it in trust for that purpose, and they were not entitled to give up any part of it or divert the use to which it was put to any

No. 175.

June 12, 1891.

Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

the population of so large a parish could properly be curtailed, and if the present number of sittings is to be maintained, and all these defects are to be remedied, it is obvious that a considerable enlargement of the area of the church is absolutely necessary.

"The pursuer hardly ventures to deny this, but he suggests that there are other modes of obtaining the desired improvements without encroaching on the burying-ground. In particular, he says that a new site might be obtained, or that the church might be extended on the present site without going beyond the walks which surround it. With regard to the latter suggestion, it is enough to say that on the north there are private lairs still in use which are close to the church, that on the west there is the steeple which bars extension on that side, and that the space occupied by the walks on the south and east is not sufficient, besides being of such configuration as to make it impossible to build an edifice of suitable shape. With regard to the suggestion for a change of site, I cannot assume that the Teind Court would authorise transportation. A strong instance to the contrary is afforded by the case of Wilson v. Ogilvie, Dec. 16, 1809 (reported in the Supplement to Connell on Parishes, pp. 63-5), where a small majority of the heritors of the parish of Falkirk had resolved that a new church should be erected on a different site, 'chiefly on the ground that, as the new church was to be considerably larger than the old, a number of the graves in the churchyard would be thereby disturbed,' but the change was opposed by the minister and a minority of the heritors, and the report bears that 'the Court were of opinion that no change should be made on the situation of a church unless upon very strong grounds, and that no sufficient reasons had been shewn in this case for making the change. The Judges were clear, however, that the proprietors of the graves disturbed must receive full indemnification, and that a clause to this effect should be inserted in the interlocutor.' From this it appears that the lairs to be encroached upon were still in use, and therefore the case is instructive as shewing that the conversion, even of such ground from the use of sepulture to the kindred use of forming a site for a new parish church, so far from being unlawful, may be preferable to a change of site where enlargement of the church becomes necessary.

"It remains to be considered what is the character and extent of the encroachment which the proposed operations will involve. The pursuer calculates that about 700 interments made within the twenty years immediately preceding the closing of the common ground will be included within the area of the new building. So far as these are to be affected merely by being enclosed within the walls of the church, it cannot, I think, be said that there is anything to shock the feelings, even of the most sensitive. But the pursuer further says that, of these 700 interments, about 300 will be actually displaced by the necessity which has arisen for carrying the outer walls down to the solid ground, through a depth of from 15 to 20 feet of forced earth. I think these calculations may be accepted as fairly accurate. But the important fact is, that not one of these interments took place later than sixteen years ago, and that they all were made under what may be called normal conditions, i.e., in plain deal coffins, placed in earth of a character which is precisely ascertained by the witness Henderson's journal of bores, but which may roughly be described as a sandy clay. That being so, it is plain that the pursuer's allegation in his answer to the defender's fourth statement (page 17 of record), to the effect that the new church 'will be planted in a pit of human bodies, mouldering through every stage of decay,' is a mere piece of forensic hyperbole. The answer supplied by the evidence in this case to Hamlet's question, 'How long will a man lie in the earth ere he rot?' is very similar to the answer which was made by the gravedigger in the play. Ferguson, one of the sextons of St Cuthbert's, says, from his own observation, that a body decomposes there in from five to eight years, and Dr Hunter Stewart, who examined the soil, and made some interesting experiments on the air contained in the soil, gives it as his opinion other purpose, except upon reasons of necessity or of the highest expediency.[1] The whole ground here over which it was proposed to build was occupied by graves, and the evidence shewed that it would be impossible to find a foundation without very serious interference with the remains with which the common burying-ground to the east of the church was crowded. There was no case of necessity or of high expediency here. The church might be altered and repaired without any encroachment on the churchyard, and the defects in the structure and sanitary arrangements of the church ought to be, and could be, adjusted without violating public decency or desecrating the graveyard. 2. Further, the valued rent heritors only had been convened to the meeting of heritors at which approval was given to the proposals of the kirk-session. But it had been held in a series of cases[2] that all the owners of heritable property in the parish—including feuars—were liable to assessment upon their real rent for such purposes as the rebuilding of the church. There were several thousands of such persons in the parish of St Cuthbert's,—and as they were legally bound and might be called upon to pay the cost of the contemplated repairs, they ought to have been called to the meeting,—and not, as was the case, the valued rent heritors only. Accordingly, the resolutions passed at the meeting of heritors on 5th May 1890 were inept, and the consent of the heritors to the scheme of the kirk-session was still wanting.

No. 175. June 12, 1891. Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

Argued for the respondents;—1. It was admitted that if a case of necessity or of the highest expediency were shewn, a portion of the parish churchyard might be diverted by the heritors from its original use to the object of enlarging the parish church. Here there was such a case, and the authorities which had been cited supported that view. The public officials had called attention to the defect in the sanitary arrangements that 'eight to ten years in such a soil as the common ground of St Cuthbert's would result in the complete decomposition and disappearance of the soft parts of the human body.' This opinion is strongly confirmed by his examination of the air, which, at depths of 3 and 5 feet, was found not to contain more carbonic acid than is commonly found in ordinary forced earth. His conclusion, therefore, is (and in this Professor Crum Brown agrees), that the ground in question does not now contain any traces of burial except pieces of bone, decomposed, but recognisable as bone, and some fragments of the wood of coffins.

---

"In these circumstances I think it is impossible to say that the proposed operations will involve anything like desecration of the graveyard, or any outrage on public decency or private sentiment. If the concurrent belief of practical and scientific men should, in any particular case, turn out to be erroneous, I assume that the defenders will take care that any coffin remaining entire, shall be reverently re-interred. I assume the same with reference to the bones which will certainly be discovered. But I do not think it necessary to insert any proviso in the interlocutor to that effect, nor, indeed, are the conclusions of the summons appropriate for such a purpose. From these conclusions, as they stand, I think the defenders are entitled to absolvitor."

[1] Russell v. Marquess of Bute, Dec. 8, 1882, 10 R. 302; Earl of Mansfield v. Wright, March 17, 1824, 2 Sh. Apps. 104; Wright v. Elphinstone, July 20, 1881, 8 R. 1025; Turner v. Arbuckle, Feb. 16, 1869, 7 Macph. 538, 41 Scot. Jur. 283; M'Bean v. Young, Jan. 22, 1859, 21 D. 314, 31 Scot. Jur. 167; Hill v. Wood, Jan. 30, 1863, 1 Macph. 360, 35 Scot. Jur. 216; Wilson v. Ogilvie, Dec. 16, 1809, Connell's Parochial Law, Supplement, p. 63; Ure v. Ramsay, June 5, 1828, 6 S. 916.

[2] Highland Railway Co. v. Heritors of Kinclaven, June 15, 1870, 8 Macph. 858, 42 Scot. Jur. 487; Scottish North-Eastern Railway Co. v. Gardner, Jan. 29, 1864, 2 Macph. 537; Boswell v. Hamilton, June 15, 1857, 15 S. 1148.

No. 175.
June 12, 1891.
Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

of the church, and it was impossible to remedy these and to reseat the church for the accommodation of the same number of persons as before without encroaching on that part of the graveyard which had at one time been used as the common burying-ground. But the important fact was that this part of the graveyard had been closed since 1874, when, by order of the Sheriff, burials in it had ceased. There was ample evidence to prove that any remains interred in that ground had long since been resolved into dust. 2. In regard to the objection that the real rent heritors had not been called to the meeting of heritors and had not sanctioned the proposed alterations, no real rent heritor had appeared at that meeting and tendered a vote which had been rejected, or had taken or now took any exception to what had been done. It was not sought to levy the assessment upon real rent, and, in truth, the valued rent heritors were alone entitled to deal with a question relating to the reconstruction of the church.[1] It was only when objection was taken by a valued rent heritor to his being made exclusively liable that the Courts had in certain cases held that the assessment must be levied upon real rent. The body who had been subjected to assessment here were the valued rent heritors, and the administration of the trust was necessarily with the body who were subject to assessment.[2] This objection therefore failed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary by the interlocutor under review has assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and in order to appreciate fully the effect of that judgment we must attend to what the conclusions of the action are. The action concludes that the defenders are not entitled to build over the burying-ground of the city parish of St Cuthbert's, or any part thereof; and, second, that they are not entitled to encroach upon and destroy or change the original and natural use and purpose of the said burying-ground; and third, that they are not entitled to open up or remove any of the soil or earth of the graves of said burying-ground, or of the remains of the bodies which have been interred therein.

Now, I am of opinion that the pursuer has not succeeded in establishing any of the propositions which are embraced in the conclusions of declarator. On the contrary, I think he has entirely failed to establish any one of them. The defenders are the kirk-session of the parish of St Cuthbert's, and the pursuer is an individual heritor who challenges the proceedings of the kirk-session upon the grounds embodied in the conclusions to which I have just referred. Now, the position of the kirk-session in regard to the church and burying-ground of any parish in Scotland may be described generally as administrative merely. But the position of the heritors is different. They are the proprietors of the church and of the churchyard.

I think that is so important a proposition in regard to the present case that I venture to repeat what I said in the case of the Duke of Roxburghe, 3 R. 734, —"The legal rights of the heritors in connection with the parish church are, I think, very well settled. I do not think there can be any dispute about what they are. The heritors have the burden, which is imposed by statute, of building and maintaining parish churches, as well as other ecclesiastical buildings, and the buildings which they so build and maintain are in law the property of the heritors. But I need hardly add that they are only property in trust—in trust, that is to say, for the whole body of the parishioners within the parish,

[1] Connell's Parochial Law, Supp., p. 17.

[2] Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 96), sec. 23.

No. 175.

June 12, 1891.
Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

and when in the division of the area among the heritors the accommodation in the parish church comes to be appropriated, so much to one heritor and so much to another, I think, in like manner, each individual heritor becomes trustee for those of the parishioners that reside upon his estate. The portion of the area that is assigned to him is not his property in any sense of the word." And I see that Professor Rankine says, in reference to churchyards (2d edn., p. 163), that "the rules of law in regard to the property and use of the parish church apply equally to the churchyard, with some modifications, which may be traced in the main to the difference between the occupation had of the two subjects." Now, in the Duke of Roxburghe's case there was some division of opinion, but not upon the matter which I am now referring to. And the judgment was also in part reversed, but still that does not affect the proposition in law which I think is established by that case.

Now, the heritors of the parish, in conjunction with the kirk-session—that is, the proprietors of the church and churchyard, along with the existing administrative body—have become satisfied that the church is not in a fit condition for the occupation of the large congregation which resort to it, and they find that the only way in which the evil can be remedied is that a portion of the churchyard shall be built over by the addition to the church. The heritors, being proprietors in trust both of the one subject and the other, are entitled to consider and decide, with the approval of the kirk-session and of the presbytery of the bounds, in what way they shall exercise their trust powers, in this sense, that if it is found that it is desirable or highly expedient that one of the trusts should yield to the other—as in the present case—that a portion of the churchyard should be built over in order to increase the accommodation in the church, then I apprehend it is quite within the power of such parties to come to that resolution and act upon it. Now, it is undoubtedly the condition of their doing so, in the first place, that no one shall be debarred from any legal right by what they propose to do, and in the second place, that there shall be no undue or improper interference with the rights of the parishioners either in the one subject or in the other, and therefore it becomes necessary to consider, as the Lord Ordinary has done, what is the condition of the churchyard, or rather of that portion of it which is proposed to be built over in order to extend the church and make it more convenient for occupation.

In the first place, it is to be observed that the portion of the churchyard to be built over is no longer in use as a burying place. It has been shut up by lawful authority, and no more burials can take place there. And this has been the condition of that portion of the churchyard for a long period. It has not been for a great many years lawful to bury the dead in that portion of the churchyard. The ground proposed to be built over no doubt was a part of the public burying-ground of the churchyard for a very long period; and human remains were for a long period of years undoubtedly consigned to mother earth in that portion of the ground. But it is a very well established fact, leading to a rule of law, that after a certain period human remains resolve into their original dust, and it is by no means necessary to maintain the ground, in which they are buried, intact. Now, in these circumstances, it appears to me that the defenders have completely established their defence. They have shewn that the churchyard, which belongs in property to the heritors, is no longer required, as regards that portion of it proposed to be built over, for the purposes of burial. Indeed, it would be unlawful to continue to bury bodies there. And therefore any legal obstacle to the extension of the church over that ground is entirely removed.

It is perhaps not necessary, but it may be desirable, just in a word to advert to that species of right which a heritor or even a parishioner may have in a portion of the churchyard which has been dedicated to the use of his family, where he has acquired a right of sepulture by possession, or by a grant from the heritors and kirk-session. But it must be observed that there is no question of that kind raised here, or at least raised in such a way that it can be disposed of. Mr Steel, the pursuer, says that he is the successor in title of Nisbet of Dean, and as such has a right of property, or some inferior right, in that portion of the churchyard which has been used by that family. Now, it is quite new to me to hear that a successor in title has a right to continue the sepulture of his own family in ground which has been acquired for the burying place of another family altogether, to whom he has merely succeeded by purchase of land. That is quite unknown, and there is no other case of alleged interference with ground where there is any right of this description claimed by anyone.

Therefore the obstacles which the pursuer has sought to set up against the proposed reconstruction or addition to the parish church seem to me to be entirely removed, and I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

LORD ADAM.—The defenders in this case, the kirk-session of St Cuthbert's, have at their own hand no right or title to interfere with the burying-ground of the parish, but they say, and I think correctly in point of fact, that they have obtained the consent of the heritors of the parish, and therefore it appears to me that the question in this case is whether the heritors could be interdicted from carrying out the proposed extension of the church.

Now, I agree with your Lordship that the heritors are the proprietors of the church and the churchyard for parochial purposes. The church, no doubt, is primarily intended for the purpose of worship, and the churchyard for the purpose of sepulture, but it cannot be said that the heritors are under no circumstances entitled to divert the church or the churchyard from the primary purposes for which they were intended. There have been numbers of cases where the churchyard has been appropriated for the extension of the church. The question therefore is one of necessity, desirability, or high expediency, and I think the kind of case which must be made out depends on circumstances. I can quite understand that, where patrimonial, or, as Lord Neaves called them in one case, "quasi-patrimonial" rights have been acquired, a strong case of expediency, amounting almost to necessity, must be made out before such rights can be interfered with. Again, I can understand that if the portion of a churchyard which is desired for the purpose of enlarging the church would probably be required for the primary purpose for which it was intended, a strong case would have to be made out for interfering with that primary purpose. I can understand further that a strong case would have to be shewn, where the ground affected had been in quite recent times used for purposes of burial, and it was proposed to disturb human remains when it was neither decent nor proper that they should be disturbed. There is no case here of any such kind. The ground proposed to be taken for the extension of the church was formerly the common burying-ground of the parish of St Cuthbert's, and there will therefore be no interference with any patrimonial rights. Again, there would never be any further burials in this part of the churchyard in any case, because the common burying-ground was closed by the authority of the Sheriff in the year 1874. Further, the seventeen years which have elapsed since 1874 make it impossible that there should be any interference with graves where recent interments have taken place, and it was also brought out in the proof that in such places as this human remains return, as the Lord Ordinary says, to their "kindred dust" in the course of seven or eight years.

No. 175.

June 12, 1891.
Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

I think, therefore, that it is not necessary that any great case of expediency should here be made out, because I cannot see that there can be any great interference with the feelings or rights of anyone. There would indeed have been as much or more interference with the graves in question if the ground had remained a burial-ground, as in that case they would ere this have again been used for the purpose of burial.

The question remains whether a case of expediency or necessity has been made out, and I think enough has been shewn with regard to the safety of the congregation in the matter of access, their health in the matter of ventilation, and the necessary conveniences and comforts of a church like this at the present time, to justify what seems to me to be a case of very limited interference with other rights. I think it is also proved that the necessary enlargement of the church cannot be made in any other direction than the proposed one. I accordingly have no hesitation in saying that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and I have really very little to add. The enlargement of the church is proposed to be made by the kirk-session mainly out of funds provided by the congregation and by public subscription, but I think the sum of £2000—which was considered to represent truly the sum necessary to put the existing church in proper repair—has been contributed by the heritors. In all that the kirk-session propose to do they have the support of the heritors, and therefore I think the case must be taken, in any question of power, just as if the heritors were themselves coming forward by a resolution of the majority proposing to do this thing. I conceive that the whole administrative title to the church and the churchyard is represented by the heritors and the kirk-session, who in this matter are agreed. Then I think that unless we are to say that under no circumstances can a parish church, planted in the middle of a churchyard, be enlarged, it follows that the administrators of the churchyard and the fabric erected upon it must have the discretion of encroaching upon that part of the churchyard which has been appropriated to sepulture, and that is in most cases the whole of the part unoccupied by the fabric of the church. They are the best judges as to the direction in which the enlargement is to proceed, and as to the time of making it, and if they exercise their discretion properly and according to law, they would of course not make an extension which would involve the disturbance of the ground in which interments had recently taken place. Now, it is admitted that if such a thing were proposed, and I do not think it likely that any body of heritors would propose it, the Court might interfere, because the discretion of this public body, if exercised in a manner contrary to law, is open to challenge. But in my opinion no case has in fact been made out for interfering with that discretion. It does not appear to me that any injury has been qualified to anyone, or that there is any disturbance of human remains of a nature or in a degree different from what would necessarily take place if there had been no burial in this ground for a hundred years. I think there are ample precedents to justify the course which the heritors and kirk-session here propose to take, and that they are entirely within their rights. No. 175.

June 12, 1891. Steel v. Kirk-Session of St Cuthbert's Parish.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN PAIRMAN, S.S.C.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

SIR W. T. F. A. WALLACE, BART. AND OTHERS (Wallace's Marriage-Contract Trustees), First Parties.—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie. No. 176.

TESTAMENTARY TRUSTEES OF R. A. WALLACE AND SPOUSE, Second Parties.—Dickson—Fleming.

JOHN A. A. WALLACE AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

JANETTE F. A. WALLACE AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

June 12, 1891. Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace.

Succession—Faculties and powers—Power to appoint under "conditions, provisions, and limitations."—By antenuptial marriage-contract the trustees were directed, after the death of the survivor of the spouses "to pay over" certain funds "to or for behoof of" the surviving child or children of the marriage, "in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations" as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint.

By mutual trust-disposition and settlement, in exercise of the reserved power of appointment, the spouses directed their testamentary trustees to hold these funds for behoof of their children in equal shares, and to pay to them the income, it being provided that the shares of the sons should be paid at majority, and that in the case of the daughters the share of each should be settled upon her at marriage for her sole and exclusive use, and held by trustees for her behoof, "with power to her to dispose of the fee of the same by any testamentary deed, and failing her disposing of the same by such deed, the same shall be paid, assigned, and conveyed to her heirs and executors." In regard to the disposal of the fee of the shares of unmarried daughters the trustees were directed to pay or assign the same "according to the direction which each such daughter may leave by any testamentary deed," and failing the execution of such deed "to her heirs and executors."

In a question raised after the death of the survivor of the spouses between the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement and the daughters (none of whom were married), who contended that their parents were not entitled to restrict their rights to a liferent with power to test, held (following Lennock's Trustees v. Lennock, 8 R. 14), that the appointment was valid.

Succession—Faculties and powers—Conditions annexed to a gift—Ultra vires.—By antenuptial marriage-contract the trustees were directed after the death of the survivor of the spouses "to pay over" certain funds "to or for behoof of" the surviving child or children of the marriage, "in such shares or proportions, and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations" as the spouses or the survivor of them should appoint.

By mutual trust-disposition and settlement, in exercise of the reserved power of appointment, the spouses directed their trustees in making payment to their children of their respective shares of the funds in question to take them bound to repay the same "in the event of such son or daughter succeeding to the said estate of L." The contingency had not occurred at the death of the survivor of the spouses.

Held that the direction was ultra vires and ineffectual, but that its invalidity did not affect the appointment in other respects.

BY antenuptial marriage-contract, dated 25th August 1859, between Robert Agnew Wallace and Jane Colquhoun Bell, the former bound himself to pay to the trustees under the contract a sum of £5000, to be invested in their names, the interest to be paid to him, and if he died survived by his wife, to her. 1ST DIVISION. C.

No. 176.

June 12, 1891. Wallace's Trustees v. Wallace.

Then followed this provision,—"Upon the death of the survivor of the said promised spouses, the said trustees shall pay over the said principal sum to or for the behoof of the surviving child or children of the said intended marriage, and the issue of any of them who may have died leaving issue, in such shares or proportions and subject to such conditions, provisions, and limitations as the said promised spouses, during their joint lives, and failing either of them, as the survivor of them, shall appoint by any writing under their, his, or her hand, and failing such appointment, equally among them, share and share alike (such issue succeeding always only to the shares to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life), at the periods and under the same powers of advance as are provided in regard to the disposal of the first sum of £5000 hereinafter assigned by the said Jane Colquhoun Bell to the said trustees."

Mrs Wallace also conveyed a sum of £5000 to the trustees under the contract—the provisions in regard to the disposal of which after the death of the survivor of the spouses were identical with those regarding the disposal of the husband's £5000. The shares of the sons were in each case to be payable on their attaining majority, and of the daughters on their attaining majority or being married, whichever event should first happen. There was a power to make advances for behoof of minor children.

